Only three weeks after the state election of 1852 came the presidential election on November 2. Pierce and King, Democratic nominees, who carried 27 of the then 31 states, received 780 votes in Dekalb county. General Scott, the Whig candidate, received 391, showing a Democratic majority of 389. In the electoral college Pierce in that campaign had 254 votes against 41 for Scott.

In 1853 and 1854 the Democrats again elected all their candidates, majorities being very large, except in the case of the race for treasurer, where Edward Fosdick led John Ralston by only 27 votes.

In 1852 the new state constitution was adopted, and with the defeat of the Whig party in that same year that political organization retired from the field. In its stead came the Republican party.

In 1856 the new organization named Oliver P. Morton for governor of Indiana in the October election, while the Democrats put forward Ashbell P. Willard. Dekalb county gave Morton 1,111 votes and to Willard 1,191, a majority of 80 for the Democratic nominee. In the state Willard received 117,981 votes, while Morton received 112,139.

With a variation of no more than a dozen votes in any instance, these were given Democratic majorities in Dekalb county in the same election: Robert Lowry, congressman; Sanford J. Stoughton, circuit prosecutor; Miles Waterman, senator; Bushrod Catlin and W. I. Howard, representatives; Theron Storrs, judge of common pleas; Deland H. Stocker, common pleas prosecutor; Jeremiah Hemstreet, commissioner; Samuel W.

Ralston, sheriff; Daniel W. Altenburg, surveyor; and Jeremiah Plum, coroner.

The first presidential election in which the new Republican party appeared was three weeks after the state election in 1856, when James Buchanan was nominated by the Democrats with John C. Breckinridge of Kentucky as his running mate. John C. Fremont of California and William L. Dayton of New Jersey were the first Republican candidates. Dekalb county, not varying from its adherence to Democratic principles, gave Buchanan 1,247 votes and Fremont 1,097, a Democratic majority of 150.

In 1857, while the Democrats were successful, they had mighty little to brag about in the way of majorities. James S. Warden, candidate for congressman, received 975 votes, while Charles Case, his opponent, received 972, the majority being but 3. Amzi Seely, candidate for commissioner, received 983 votes against 963 for his opponent, John Helwig, the majority being but 15. Jacob Helwig, the Democratic candidate for treasurer, led his ticket so far as plurality is concerned, receiving 954, to 875 for his chief opponent, Edward H. Taylor. Helwig's larger lead was due to the fact that there was a third candidate who received but 128 votes.

In 1858 the October election, except in one instance, restored healthy Democratic leads. Reuben W. Dawson for congress had a lead of 110 over Charles Case, his opponent, while for commissioner Christian Sheets and Thomas F. Daily tied, each receiving 1,087 votes.

In the October election of 1859 there was some more close voting, Milton J. Pierce and Albert J. Hunt each receiving 1,136 votes for auditor, while John Ralston received 1,142 votes, and Edward H. Taylor, the Republican candidate for clerk, received 1,137 votes, giving a Democratic majority of only 5.

The campaigns of 1860 were productive of abnormal results politically all over the country. Dekalb county being no exception. The slavery and anti-slavery parties divided the people, rather than old political lines and arguments. For governor Henry S. Lane, Republican, in Dekalb county received 1,517 votes as against 1,372 for Thomas A. Hendricks.

Oliver P. Morton was elected lieutenant-governor over David Turpie, the Democratic nominee. Ordinarily in Indiana, Thomas A. Hendricks and David Turpie could scarcely have been defeated by any candidate on any ticket, but even Dekalb county returned a majority in favor of their opponents. In that same October election there was very slight change in any of the votes for any of the offices. The number of votes cast for the county candidates was very little different from those heading the ticket.

In the November election which followed just one month later, Abraham Lincoln received 1,500 votes, Stephen A. Douglas 1,399 votes, while John C. Breckinridge, the southern Democratic candidate, received but two votes. Lincoln led in Dekalb, as he did in the state and nation.

In the election of October, 1862, Joseph K. Edgerton defeated William Mitchell, their respective votes being 1,450 and 1,178. William H. Dills was elected senator, and Miles Waterman representative over Joshua W. Winslow.

In 1863 the election was especially closely contested. It was one of the closest in the history of the county. Amzi Seely for commissioner received 18 majority over William Mathews. John Ralston, who had been a candidate for office a number of times, always leading by a good majority, on this occasion led his opponent, William M. Mercer, by only 28. That was the largest majority accorded any candidate in this election. For treasurer George Barney had a majority of 2. Moses Gonser for real estate appraiser also had a majority of 2, while for recorder John Butt and George R. Huffman ran an even race with 1,391 votes each. For surveyor David Eberly led Spencer Mills, his Republican opponent, by only 9 votes.

In the election for governor in October, 1864, Oliver P. Morton received 1,503 votes in Dekalb county against Joseph E. McDonald, who was given 1,405. Every Republican on the ticket was elected. The lowest majority was 23 and the largest, excepting that given to Morton, was 48.

One month later Abraham Lincoln in Dekalb county received 1,484 votes against George B. McClellan, who had 1,472, Lincoln's majority being but 12 in the county.

In 1865 and 1866 in the state election the majorities were very small, the Republican lead in 1866 in Dekalb county being about 60 votes.

In 1868 Thomas A. Hendricks, Democratic nominee for governor, led in Dekalb county over Conrad Baker by 55 votes, but Baker won in the State by a majority of 961 votes. Will Cumback as Baker's running mate was elected lieutenant-governor. In Dekalb county this year by comparatively small majorities the Democratic ticket was entirely elected. For congressman, Andrew Ellison; senator, George Milnes; representative, Lewis D. Britton; judge of common pleas, Alexander J. Douglas; common pleas prosecutor, William G. Croxton; commissioner, Daniel Gonser; sheriff, Jeremiah Plum; recorder, Daniel C. Hoffman; land appraiser, John G. Dancer; coroner, George Metcalf. In the same year, three weeks later, U. S. Grant as the Republican nominee for President received 1,750 votes; Horatio Seymour, the Democratic nominee, having 1,726 votes; Republican majority, 24.

The Democrats won again in 1870, but, excepting in three or four instances, the majorities were less than 100.

In 1872 Thomas A. Hendricks was again the Democratic nominee for governor and was elected. In Dekalb county the records show that he received 1,918 votes against 1,886 for his opponent, Thomas M. Browne. John B. Cravens was his running mate, receiving 6 more votes in Dekalb than Hendricks. In the same election Dekalb elected these Democrats: E. Van Long, congressman; James I. Best, circuit judge; Leigh H. Haymond, circuit prosecutor; L. H. Goodwin, judge of common pleas; Daniel Y. Husselman, common pleas prosecutor; William G. Croxton, senator; Samuel S. Shutt, representative; Charles R. Wanemaker and Nelson Griffith, commissioners; William L. Meese, sheriff; Nicholas Ensley, treasurer; Daniel C. Hoffman, recorder; Samuel Learned, real estate appraiser; Chauncy C. Clark, surveyor; James J. Latson, coroner.

One month later, after Hendricks and the entire Democratic ticket had carried the county, Dekalb gave U. S. Grant 1,861 votes against Horace Greeley, Democratic candidate, who received 1,544, Grant's majority being 317.

In 1874 the Democrats again carried the county, Miles Waterman for representative receiving a majority of one vote, and William L. Meese receiving a majority of 671 for sheriff. The other majorities were safe, but not as extravagant as the prevailing party might wish.

In 1876 Dekalb came into its own on majorities for the Democratic ticket when James D. Williams led Benjamin Harrison by 188 majority for governor, and Samuel J. Tilden led Rutherford B. Hayes for president by 172. Strong Democratic leads prevailed in the state election again in 1878 when John B. Stoll for congressman defeated John Baker by 281, and John G. Shankland for secretary of state beat Isaac S. Moore by 240.

In 1880 Franklin Landers, the Democratic candidate for governor, led Albert G. Porter in Dekalb county by 79, although Porter received a safe majority of about 6,500 in the state.

Isaac P. Gray, who was elected governor on the Democratic ticket in 1884, was the running mate of Landers in the 1880 election. Winfield Scott Hancock in the same year received 2,582 votes for president in Dekalb county against 2,441 for James A. Garfield, who was elected president in that year.

In 1882 there was considerable change in the Democratic majorities, being largely increased in this state election. William R. Myers for secretary of state received 2,559 votes as the head of the Democratic ticket, against 2,291 for Emanuel R. Hawn, head of the Republican ticket. For congressman Robert Lowry had the same advantage over Wesley C. Glasgow. In some instances the majorities ranged as high as 800, and no majority was less than 100. Daniel D. Moody for representative and D. Y. Husselman for clerk received the lowest majorities, each having 104 lead. The highest Democratic majority was to L. J. Miller for treasurer, being 793.

In 1884 came the interesting election in which Grover Cleveland met James G. Blaine as his opposing candidate for the presidency. This year the presidential and state elections were both held in November, the October election being eliminated. Cleveland received 2,799 in Dekalb county, and Isaac P. Gray, the Democratic nominee for governor, received 2,798. Cleveland's majority was 348, while that of Gray was 355 in Dekalb county. Moody for representative received exactly the same majority as in 1882, leading his opponent by 104. All other Democratic majorities in this election were from 250 to very nearly 500.

Following the election of 1884, the presidential vote each four years will give a pretty general idea of the trend of politics in Dekalb county.

In 1888, when Grover Cleveland was defeated for president by Benjamin Harrison, the Cleveland vote in Dekalb county was 3,160, and the vote for Benjamin Harrison, 2,179.

Again, in 1892, when the Democrats nominated Grover Cleveland for the third time, and when he for the second time became president of the United States, Dekalb county gave him 2,801 votes, and gave to Benjamin Harrison, Republican nominee, 2,499 votes. The Prohibition candidate in the same year received 198 votes and the Peoples' party ticket, a new element in national politics, received 746.

William J. Bryan was first nominated by the Democrats in 1896, William McKinley being his Republican opponent. While the Gold Democrats in some parts of Indiana and in states farther east had some influence upon general results, they were not sufficiently strong in Dekalb county to make an impression. Bryan received 3,678, while McKinley was given 3,137; Palmer, the Gold Democrat, received but 25 votes.

In his second race against McKinley in 1900 Bryan received in Dekalb county 3,488, McKinley getting 3,218. The People's party on this occasion was reduced to 7 votes.

Alton B. Parker, Democratic nominee, opposed Theodore Roosevelt, the Republican candidate, in 1904, and on this occasion Dekalb county cut loose from its Democratic moorings and gave Roosevelt 3,416, and to Parker only 2,827.

William J. Bryan came back in 1908 as the Democratic nominee, and his running mate was John Worth Kern of Indiana. Bryan and Kern in Dekalb county received 3,624, while William H. Taft, the Republican nominee, received 2,991.

In 1912 came the great Progressive movement, which for the time being completely demolished the Republican party as a national consideration, and elected Woodrow Wilson and Thomas R. Marshall as president and vice president. In that year Wilson and Marshall received 2,766 votes in Dekalb county, William H. Taft, 1,125, and Theodore Roosevelt 1,623.

In the 1912 election the following Democratic officers representing Dekalb county were elected along with the Woodrow Wilson ticket: State senator, Glenn Van Auken; state representative, Edward M. McKennan, who had been the representative beginning with the session of 1909; county sheriff, John P. Hoff; clerk, John Hebel; auditor, A. W. Madden; recorder, Harvey O. Williams, appointed to succeed William McNabb, who was elected in 1912, and died; treasurer, John J. Oberlin; surveyor, A. L. Link; coroner, E. Treesh; prosecutor, James R. Nyce.

In the campaign of 1916, for Woodrow Wilson, Democratic nominee, Dekalb county cast 2,372 votes, and for Charles E. Hughes, Republican nominee, 2,898.

For John A. M. Adair, Democratic nominee for governor, the Dekalb vote was 3,232, and for James P. Goodrich, Republican nominee, 2,857.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF DELAWARE COUNTY

By Frank D. Haimbaugh

IF one were to follow closely the definition of History, as set out in the dictionary, it is very doubtful if there would be very much of a positive character to chronicle about the Democratic party in Delaware county during the past sixty years. In fact, until recent years, years so near at hand that the reader has personal knowledge, the doings of the party in the county would be the chronicling of battles lost to an active and arrogant enemy. In fact, there were times when the contest between the contending political parties could not be dignified, even by the wildest stretch of the imagination, as battles of the ballot. For a long series of years elections in this county, so far as results were concerned, were merely a matter of form and held simply in conformity with the general laws on the subject. Thus it can readily be seen that to one to whom is assigned the task of writing a history of the Democratic party of Delaware county there is spread before him a list of dreary years of constant defeat at the polls.

The history of the Democratic party of Delaware county during the pioneer days is one largely of tradition. No records are obtainable that can throw any light on the pathway of the historian. There is nothing in the nature of documents that contain anything authentic touching upon the political parties of those years of long ago. But the character of the early settlers and the points in the East from which they came lead one to the conclusion that the Whigs were the dominant political organization of the county in the early days. But that there were Democrats in the county in those days is evidenced by the names of some of those pioneers whose descendants are even to this day identified with the good old party. But as to the specific instances concerning the doings of the party as a concrete organization there are no records that could furnish any information of value. During the decade from 1840 to 1850 there evidently was some tangible activity among the Democrats of the county. The reason for the conclusion grows out of the fact that at least for a portion of that period a Democratic newspaper was published in the county. But there could not have been any great number, since the paper had but a precarious life and then passed out of existence. The Whigs were in control of the county until 1856, when the Republican party came into existence, at which time the Whigs abandoned the old party and affiliated with the new organization. With the coming of the Republican party and the new alignment of partisan sentiment the Democracy of the county was more deeply submerged than ever before. This submergence continued for a long series of years. Delaware county was regarded as an impregnable stronghold of the Republican party. This county for many years was an integral part of the old "Burnt District," which was a synonym for the most radical and rampant political enemy against those who held to the faith as exemplified in the Democratic party. The old "Burnt District" dictated the politics of eastern Indiana and made this county a desert waste of political prejudice. In those days political civilization seemed to have departed and Democrats were ostracised both socially and in a business way. In that day it required both physical and moral courage to claim adherence to the party of Jefferson and Jackson. It was no uncommon thing for known Democrats to be driven from the polls on election day and thus be deprived of political liberty and suffer mental humiliation and physical hurt. These outrages were perpetrated by men who claimed that they believed in political liberty. Those were the days that could be rightfully called the "Dark Ages" for the Democracy of Delaware county. It really seemed that the dawn of a better day would never come. In 1884, when the Democracy of the country was triumphant in the nation, with the election of a Democratic President, even into benighted old Delaware a ray of sunshine penetrated which gave promise that perhaps sometime those who had withstood the enemy's jeers and taunts would see the dawn of a better political day.

The Legislature, at the session of 1885, separated the judicial circuit composed of Delaware and Randolph counties and made Delaware county a separate judicial circuit and Governor Gray appointed Hon. O. J. Lotz to the position of Judge in the new judicial circuit. In 1886 the Democrats of the county nominated Judge Lotz to the position to which he had been appointed. The popularity of Judge Lotz and the division in the ranks of the enemy resulted in his election. The election of Judge Lotz was the first time in a half century that a Democrat was on the "bench" in this county. At this same election Thomas Marshall of Perry township was elected a member of the Board of County Commissioners. Although his election was contested by his Republican opponent, he retained his place on the Board. The success of two Democrats at the polls in Delaware county was such an innovation that it produced a profound impression on the opposition party and the leaders of the party decreed that such "a disaster" should not be repeated. How effective this decree proved will be observed inasmuch as no Democrat was again elected to a county office until 1910.

Perhaps one of the potent factors which led to the ultimate success of the Democratic party in this county was the establishment of a Democratic daily newspaper in 1886 by Thomas McKillip and W. L. Davis. This combination held until Mr. Davis sold his interests to Captain W. J. Hilligoss. In 1891 F. D. Haimbaugh purchased the interest of Mr. Hilligoss and continued the publication of the Daily and Weekly Herald until 1904, when Mr. McKillip retired because of failing health and Mr. Haimbaugh became sole owner, having been in editorial charge during the entire time he was connected with the paper. In 1905 Mr. Haimbaugh succeeded in merging the Muncie Evening Times, a Republican paper, and the Muncie Evening Herald. The result of this merger was the Muncie Evening Press, an independent paper. The new paper advocated with much success independence in voting. This doctrine proved not only popular in theory, but likewise in practice. This line of attack on the prejudices of the voters met with such a marked degree of success that eventually the people were led to believe that the best interests of the taxpayers could be served by a change in the political complexion of the men who hold the offices of the county. This was the leaven that eventually was to leaven the whole loaf and make possible the success of the Democratic party in the "rock-bound stronghold" of Republicanism.

The nomination and election of Hon. John A. M. Adair to Congress from the Eighth district in 1906 had a direct bearing on the politics of Delaware county. A large number of thoughtful Republicans of this county voted for Mr. Adair. When these same Republicans discovered that the success of a Democrat at the polls did not cause a hiatus in the economy of nature, when they learned that their act of voting for a Democrat did not prove disastrous, they were willing to try the experiment on the county offices.

In 1910 the Democrats presented to the voters of the county a ticket of unusual strength. The men named on that ticket were men worthy of confidence. The result was seen in the election of Democrats to the offices of County Auditor, Recorder, Sheriff and one member of the Board of County Commissioners.

It was with unusual confidence that the party entered the campaign of 1912. The ticket was a good one and the result was the election of County Treasurer, Coroner and Surveyor; re-election of the Sheriff, State Senator and two Representatives and Prosecuting Attorney.

At the election in 1914 the party was again successful in a marked degree, though not all of the candidates on the ticket were so fortunate as to be elected. But in the main the victory was pronounced, the party having secured the election of the County Auditor, Treasurer, Clerk, Recorder, Prosecuting Attorney, Surveyor, County Assessor, two members of the Board of County Commissioners, making that body entirely Democratic, the first time in the history of the county that such condition existed, elected one Representative, losing only the Sheriff, Coroner and one Representative.

The historian of a quarter of a century hence will not need depend on legends for his facts regarding the Democratic party in old Delaware county. The records will show that there were Democrats in office and that the dawn of a better day had fully come.

It may prove of interest to the future voters of the county to know the names of the men who were the successful candidates of the Democratic party at the elections above mentioned. In 1910 F. M. Williams secured the office of County Auditor. Jesse G. White, Sheriff, came near losing the office due to a mistake in setting the voting machine in one of the precincts, but the case was taken into court, where a decision was handed down in favor of Mr. White. Charles W. Fletcher was elected to the office of Recorder and William Sunderland as a member of the Board of County Commissioners.

The election of 1912 resulted in the election of Mr. G. G. Williamson to the office of County Treasurer, perhaps the first Democrat to hold that office; Jesse G. White, re-elected to the office of Sheriff by a majority of more than two thousand votes; George Gelts, State Senator; John W. Schafer and Charles Barnhart, Representatives; J. Frank Mann, Prosecuting Attorney; Dr. Fred Bunch, Coroner; Horace Weber, Surveyor, and William Sunderland and S. A. Clark as members of the Board of County Commissioners.

When the time came for the election of 1914 the Democrats were ready for the fray and succeeded in electing the following to the offices indicated: F. M. Williams, to be his own successor in the office of County Auditor; G. G. Williamson, who was re-elected to the office of County Treasurer; Charles Bowden, Clerk of the Court; Ross Dowden, County Recorder; J. Frank Mann, to succeed himself as Prosecuting Attorney; Horace Weber, re-elected County Surveyor;

John W. Schafer, re-elected Representative; David Hays and S. A. Clark, re-elected to the Board of County Commissioners.

At the election in 1916, the Republicans were successful at the polls in this county, electing their entire ticket, thus displacing Democrats whose term of office had expired. While the majorities obtained were not large, they were ample to yield practical results.

Again in 1918 the Democrats of this county met defeat at the hands of the ancient enemy and the following offices passed to the control of the Republicans: Auditor, Clerk of the Court, Recorder and the remaining member of the Board of County Commissioners. Thus the county is once more held in the bondage of the Republican party after a respite of some eight years. True the old time majorities that once marked the success of the G. O. P. when it was in the heyday of success are absent. But this fact does not lessen the concern of those who believe in an efficient management of the business affairs of the county.

The reverses that came to the Democratic party in this county, and for that matter, throughout the Nation, were not due to lack of party fealty, but were due to the pro-German sentiment, which was unalterably opposed to the administration of President Wilson. The vote of the pro-Germans was cast for Republican candidates from Congressman to road supervisor as an expression of disloyalty to the Government that has all these years fostered and protected them. It was a vote against the great institutions of this land of freedom. Certainly the Republican party should feel greatly elated and highly complimented to have associated with this band of unpatriotic people. No man with a drop of red blood coursing through his veins but must feel outraged when he realizes that the men who voted against the administration in this time of war were stabbing the boys in the back while they were facing the uncivilized Hun on the field of carnage. The vote at the election of 1918 in this county and in the state places the Republican party in the position of disloyalty to free institutions. It is undoubtedly true that the rank and file of that party are just as loyal as the men of other parties, yet the managers of the Republican party were willing to encourage the traitors and solicited their votes and thus brought odium to the party that all time can not erase.

In this county there was not a large pro-German vote, but it was ample to turn the tide at the polls. Certainly the Republican party is welcome to whatever glory it can obtain from the results of the election of 1918. The fact stands out clear and distinct that the Democratic party, in county, state and nation, is alone today the embodiment of all that means genuine Americanism.

This is the record of Democratic triumphs in the county in recent years. The change in political sentiment was almost in the nature of a revolution, but this change was only the sequence of partisan politics, intoxicated with long years of uninterrupted success at the polls. The change was the logical result of hossism, grown arrogant through long years of control. It fully demonstrated the fact that the people will eventually revolt against the politician and insist on having things change to meet their ideas of honest politics. The change in the political sentiment demonstrated the fact that a political party can hope to remain in control only so long as it serves the best interests of all the people. Whenever a party attempts to go counter to the will of the majority of the party its days of success at the polls are numbered. Put in epigrammatic form, that party serves itself best which serves the public best at all times.

An illustration of how the shuttlecock of politics may vary with the political breezes of the day is seen in the city of Muncie. For years the city had a large Republican majority, though occasionally a Democrat secured a municipal office. In 1891 A. W. Brady served as Mayor and Arthur Shideler as City Clerk and James Williams as City Treasurer, each serving a term. In 1898 Edward Tuhey, Democrat, was elected to the office of Mayor, but all the remainder of the city officials were of the Republican faith.

The most remarkable instance of transfer of municipal political fealty came in 1909 when Edward Tuhey was elected Mayor, John R. Kelly, City Clerk, and the entire membership of the Common Council, all Democrats, were elected. This was the first time in the history of the city of Muncie that every one of the municipal officers was a Democrat, placing the control of the city in the hands of the Democratic party, the party that within the memory of men yet living was ostracized and its members driven from the polls.

At the election in 1913 the Democratic ticket was again successful at the municipal election, the Mayor, R. H. Bunch, City Clerk John R. Kelly, and eleven of the twelve members of the Common Council being elected. The Progressives elected one member to the Council.

There yet remains one oasis in the Delaware county desert of Republicanism—the city of Muncie continues Democratic. At the election for Mayor and other city officials in 1917, Mayor Rollin H. Bunch was re-elected by an unprecedented majority and with him were elected ten of the twelve members of the City Council, as was the City Clerk, Dennis Cleary. This much remains of the work accomplished by the faithful followers of the staunch old party, and the spirit of determination to win future contests has not been quenched—the workers will “carry on.”

Delaware county Democrats never received any recognition from the hands of the State Conventions of the party by having any one from this county placed as a candidate on the State ticket. This order of procedure was broken in 1892 when Hon. O. J. Lotz, who had served on the Delaware Circuit Court bench, was nominated by the convention as a member of the Appellate Court. He was elected at the November election and served with credit to himself by making an enviable record in the Appellate Court by his keen analysis of the cases set down, upon which he was selected to write the opinion.

It may be a bit of digression to make mention of the fact that during the days when the Democratic party in this county was very much submerged, there was enough virility in and fealty to the fundamental party principles of the fathers to organize and successfully conduct a Democratic Club. In 1891 a number of the staunch party men organized the Delaware County Gray Club with a very substantial membership. The first president of the club was Frank Gribben and the first secretary was F. D. Haimbaugh. The first political dinner given by any party in the county was tendered by the Gray Club in February, 1892. A number of the prominent party workers of the State were present, as was a large and faithful contingent of the adherents of the party in this county. The Gray Club had permanent club rooms and flourished for a number of years and exerted a wholesome influence on the party politics of the county. It finally ceased to exist and the party was without club organization until 1909, when the Delaware County Democratic Club was called into existence. This result was accomplished through the efforts of a number of the earnest party workers. This club is in vigorous existence today and wields a substantial influence in all the things that look for party success. The club since its inception has given a dinner each year that is conceded to be among the best of such functions provided anywhere in the State. The advantages of political clubs grow out of the fact that they are perennial in their influences in disseminating the doctrines of the party and stand guard over the destinies of the organization the whole year through.

During all the years of benighted political existence in Delaware county, when to be a Democrat was to be a martyr for political belief, there were a number of stalwart, earnest, sturdy Democrats, who ever had the courage of their convictions. These patriots of principle kept faithful watch at the hearth-stone of the house that Jefferson built. They kindled the fires of party patriotism on that hearth-stone and kept them burning; they made bright the windows of the home in order that when the dawn of a better day should herald the coming of political civilization in Delaware county, a hospitable welcome would be found by those seeking deliverance from the thralldom of an intolerant political dynasty, such as the Republican party for long years maintained.

It would be a distinct pleasure to here record the names of all those faithful adherents of party principles, but the absence of a roster of the names precludes a complete list and memory on the part of one who lived in those strenuous days supplies a partial list:

There was Dr. M. James, who was a host within himself, ever ready to serve the party that he had loved so long and well; Henry Wysor, in the dark days of Democracy in Delaware county stood almost alone as an advocate of the teachings of Jefferson and Jackson; Adam Wolf, always ready to help the party work with wise counsel and in more substantial ways; Martin Galliher, a pioneer in party service; Arthur Patterson, staunch and sturdy for party; Phil Kennedy, a keeper of the faith at all times; “Uncle” George Elliott, always ready with wit and satire in defense of his party; Dr. H. M. Mitchell could be found at his post as a defender of Democratic principles; Lew Sears, ready at a moment’s notice to help in party work; H. Silverburg, father of two Democratic sons, Victor, deceased, and A. C.; Samuel Williamson, constant and faithful worker; H. M. Winans, father and son of the same name and political fealty; L. A. Kirkwood, who waged an unequal warfare through the columns of his newspaper back in the seventies and early eighties; Thomas McKillip, earnest in his Democracy and founder of the Muncie Herald, the first Democratic daily paper in the county. Then there were the Thomas boys, James and William, ever ready to fight for the principles of the party; Dr. E. J. Puckett, stalwart in physical make-up and of equal stature in party adherence; Hiram Messersmith, happiest when pleading the cause of real Democracy; Samuel Martin, always on the defense of party; Eph Smell, faithful through many years of defeat; James Moffett, a wheel horse in party work and an advocate of party principles at all times; Dr. Munsey of Washington township, who never deserted the citadel of his party; Thomas Marshall of Perry township, first Democrat to be elected to be a member of the Board of County Commissioners, elected in 1886; Judge O. J. Lotz, who served faithfully and with distinction on the "bench" in this county and as a member of the Appellate Court; Daniel Kelly, always at the bat for his party.

There were giants in those days, and the names above mentioned are at best but a few of those who kept watch and ward over the citadel of the party in this county. Just a few of those who kept the faith. The roll of honor, were it written in full, would chronicle distinguished service rendered by those unselfish patriots of party. In those days the contest was hopeless, but the fact that by force of circumstances the battle was one-sided did not deter those men from being found at their post of duty.

In those days it was no unusual occurrence for half a dozen of the faithful to meet in "mass convention" and select a ticket to be placed as a sacrifice on the altar of the party. There was no hope of success, but only by such means was it possible to maintain party organization and keep it intact and make success at the polls possible in the future. Many of those who served the party thus are yet living and to all such the party in the county owes a debt of gratitude that can never be paid. Even as late as the period covered by the years from 1890 to 1910 the work of keeping the party organized was done by a few faithful workers, who, at the cost of personal comfort and even business and social standing, stood at their post and directed the party in the channels of modern political thought and action. Had it not been for these men there would have been no Democratic victories in 1910, 1912 and 1914.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF DUBOIS COUNTY

By William Melchior

DUBOIS COUNTY, once a part of Knox county, later a part of Gibson, then a part of Pike county, was organized as a distinct county in December, 1817, when an area of 480 square miles was cut from the eastern part of Pike county.

John Niblack, a former Kentuckian, was appointed county agent, and his duties were to locate and build the new court house and jail. He virtually built these in the forest, and later served with credit as one of the judges of the court. He was a man of ability, that left his name indelibly stamped on the pioneer history of the county. Later his son, Hon. William E. Niblack, served in the county as Circuit Judge for four years, Congressman for fourteen years (1859-61, 1863-75), and later as Judge of the Supreme Court of Indiana for twelve years. He was the Democratic idol of Dubois county for a period of thirty years, and the people today feel that their confidence in him was well bestowed.

The census of 1820 gave Dubois county a population of 1,168, all white but eight. Most of the early settlers read the Western Sun, a pioneer Democratic newspaper published at Vincennes by Elihu Stout, and thus absorbed Democratic doctrine.

The American Eagle, published by Henry Comingore, at Jasper, was the first paper published in the county. It was Democratic and appeared from 1846 to 1848.

The Jasper Courier, established at Jasper in 1858, is the oldest newspaper in the county. It was edited by Clement Doane, who belched forth undefiled doctrines of Democracy for a period of forty-six years, when the editorial robe descended upon his son, Benjamin Ed, who fearlessly continues the task of pushing his pen for Democracy.

In 1867 the Huntingburg Signal appeared, printed in the German language, Ernst Pickhardt being the editor. For thirty-seven years it was a welcome visitor in many homes, and proved its worth as a missionary, spreading the gospel of Democracy among the German-American citizens of the county. Hon. E. W. Pickhardt, son of the former proprietor, is now the editor, and changed the language of the Signal from German to English in 1914, while its other policies remain as heretofore.

The Jasper Herald was established by William C. Binckley in 1895. The Herald prospered from the beginning. The editor, William C. Binckley, fearlessly espoused the cause of Democracy for fifteen years, when he sold the paper to Louis Zoercher, a journalist of Perry county. Mr. Sylvester Smith is now manager and the Herald enjoys a very large and growing subscription list.

The Ferdinand News, published at Ferdinand, entered the field in 1906. Henry Haake is the manager and editor. The News is able and always clean, and merits the large support it receives.

From its organization, Dubois county was Democratic. Colonel B. B. Edmonston, a pioneer and politician who was very popular with immigrants and native-born alike, is entitled to much credit for moulding the political opinions of the early days. For a period of twenty-five years he faithfully served the people as a county official.

The rise of Professor Andrew M. Sweeney of Jasper reads like a romance. By pluck and energy he rose from the railroad camp to the position of teacher, then county superintendent, 1881-89, then nominated for State Superintendent of Schools, and in 1890 he was elected Clerk of the Supreme Court of the State. In 1894 he founded the State Life Insurance Company of Indianapolis, and served fourteen years as first president of the company.

Hon. John L. Bretz of Jasper likewise has had a meteoric career. A farmer's plow-boy first, then a teacher, then a lawyer, then Prosecuting Attorney, then two terms in Congress, 1891-95, and at the present time he is Judge of the Fifty-seventh Judicial Circuit Court.

Another, whose political rise has been phenomenal, is Hon. William E. Cox of Jasper. He was a tiller of the soil, a teacher, Prosecuting Attorney, and at present serving his fourth term in Congress, 1907-1915.

Since 1842 the county officials have been Democrats, with four exceptions—one recorder, one school superintendent, and two county commissioners. A Republican was also elected as county surveyor, but declined to accept the position. Party lines were not closely drawn. Many of the victories achieved by the Democratic party, were in large part due to the quality of the men seeking official positions and the splendid work of a long list of hustling county chairmen, comprising Hon. Bomar Traylor, Senator M. A. Sweeney, Ex-County Superintendent George R. Wilson, Ex-Auditor August H. Koerner, and other leaders such as Hon. William A. Traylor, John Gramel-spacher, George Friedman, Gerhart Eversman, William Heitman, Frank Zimmer, Joseph Buchart and many others, who pushed the issues with vigor.

Our State Senators since 1840 have been: John Hargrave, Smith Miller, Benjamin Edmonston, Benjamin Goodman, W. Hawthorne, Colonel Thomas Shoulders, Allen Fleming, James Barker, William Montgomery, Leroy Cave, Henry Peed, William A. Traylor, James Willard, Oscar Trippet, John Sweeney, M. A. Sweeney, Ephraim Inman, R. M. Milburn, John Benz, Samuel Benz, and Bomar Traylor.

Our State Representatives for the same time include the following list of names: Dr. A. B. McCrillus, Dr. John Polson, B. R. Edmonston, Silas Davis, George Lemonds, Benjamin Goodman, Henry Barker, General John Able, John Martin, Colonel Thomas Shoulders, Dr. M. Kempf, Ephraim Inman, A. W. Porter, S. H. Stewart, Perry McCart, Frank Pinnick, Captain S. Sullivan, Dr. P. L. Coble, David Corn, Horace M. Kean and Robert Kemp.

To name a complete list of Democratic leaders in this county would be a task indeed, for the county is filled with them. Suffice to say, that when voters elsewhere vacillated and followed strange gods, the Democracy of Dubois county continued to be as constant as the north star.

Since 1856, the Democratic majorities have increased from 1,000 to 2,000. Here is an example of continuous party service. Nowhere has the idea of graft been allowed to enter and nowhere has political service been rendered with greater efficiency.

"Men may come and men may go," but the un-terrified Democracy of Dubois county remains forever.

The cardinal principles of Democracy are enshrined in the hearts of our people, and when these are assailed, the Democracy of Dubois county will be found rock-ribbed and true.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF ELKHART COUNTY

By H. S. K. Bartholomew

FROM the organization of the county in 1830 to the present time the rank and file of Elkhart county Democracy has been composed of as true, as loyal and patriotic men as can be found in any portion of the good old Hoosier State.

During the first quarter of a century of the county's history it was in the ascendancy and during that period, too, the men whom it elected to public positions gave a good account of themselves as custodians of the county's business. Since 1860 Democracy has been in the minority and only at occasional intervals has it been able to elect its candidates to office.

During the more than four-score years that it has participated in political contests its nominees for public office have been, almost without exception, among the best representatives of the county's manhood and men eminently worthy of public trust. At no time has it been held together by the "cohesive power of public plunder," but it has been inspired by worthy ideals and has waged its campaigns in behalf of the principles to which it subscribes.

The most eminent representative of the party in the early days of the county's history was Colonel John Jackson, one of the pioneer settlers of Elkhart prairie. Colonel Jackson first came to the county in 1812 with a detachment of General Anthony Wayne's army in pursuit of hostile Indians. Being favorably impressed with the beautiful Elkhart prairie, he then selected the tract of land which he wished for his future home. He settled there in 1829 and at once became a prominent factor in the county's development. He secured the establishment of the first postoffice and was appointed the first postmaster. He was a member of the board of justices during the time when that body had charge of the county's business, and when the board of commissioners was established he was chosen the first Commissioner for the Southern district of the county. While serving on the board of justices he took an active part in locating the county seat at Goshen. In 1832 he was elected representative in the Legislature and filled that responsible position with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of his constituency. For forty years he was one of the leading citizens of the county and doubtless did more for its upbuilding than any other one man of his day and generation. During all those years he enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the people for whose welfare he labored so long and for whom he made sacrifices innumerable. He died in 1873, full of years and honors and his remains repose in the little city of the dead which bears his name. Two of his sons, Ira and Dr. A. C. Jackson, were prominently identified with Elkhart county during their long lives, both remaining steadfast in the political faith of their illustrious father. One of his daughters is still living. She is the widow of Hon. John E. Thompson, who for many years was a Republican wheel horse, but who in 1896 left that party and became a Democrat.

Contemporaneous with Colonel Jackson was Matthew Rippey, who came to the county three years later, settling in the same township and survived him ten years, dying in 1882. Both were farmers, living only a few miles apart; both were engaged in the breeding of improved stock and both gave their support to every movement for the improvement of agriculture in their day. Mr. Rippey served in both branches of the State Legislature. His last public service was in the State Senate, to which he was elected in 1862, in the second year of the Civil War. Though in no sense a brilliant man, he was a man of sterling worth and for a half century was one of the county's substantial citizens. His son, Joseph Rippey, was also a prominent farmer and a staunch Democrat.

Some of the other Democrats of the county's early days were John D. Elsea, who served a term as County Commissioner; Ebenezer Brown, who was Sheriff in the latter 30's and who was one of the founders of the Goshen Democrat; Elias Carpenter, the first man elected as County Treasurer and whose son, John Carpenter, is still living at the age of eighty-nine years; Albert Banta, Jonathan Wyland, Joseph Cowan, Dr. E. W. H. Ellis, Captain Henry Beane, John Longacre and Michael C. Dougherty.

From 1840 to 1850 Dr. E. W. H. Ellis was editor of the Goshen Democrat and in that capacity he served his party with signal ability. He also edited and published the Kinderhook Dutchman during the exciting campaign of 1840. This journal was published solely in the interest of the Democratic party and sometimes was exceedingly bitter in its attacks on the Whigs. Dr. Ellis was a versatile and graceful writer, but sometimes became very caustic, as did most of the editors of those days. In 1841 he was elected Auditor of Elkhart county, filling that office eight years, after which he was elected Auditor of State for two terms of two years each. His race for County Auditor was an exciting one and he afterward wrote a humorous account of it for the columns of the Democrat under the title of "The Pony Race." His Whig opponent in the contest was Charles L. Murray, also a journalist, and for more than thirty years one of the prominent men of the county. It is a rather strange coincidence that Dr. Ellis afterward became a Republican and Mr. Murray became a Democrat, and for several years was associate editor of the Goshen Democrat, serving the party as ably as did his distinguished rival in the 40's.

Judge Ebenezer M. Chamberlain was one of the pioneers of Goshen, locating in what was then a small village in 1833. From that time until his death in 1861 he was one of the most influential men in the county. The city of Goshen is indebted to him for two things which contributed largely toward making it the beautiful city that it is—its wide streets and magnificent shade trees. He was a public-spirited man and took a special interest in educational matters, but was always ready to give his aid to any movement which had for its purpose the improvement of his community, or the welfare of its people. Several years before he died he purchased a tract of land on the north side, in Goshen, and believing that it would be a good site for a school building, he donated two and one-half acres for school purposes. The Chamberlain school stands on this ground, and with its splendid grove is one of the finest school grounds in the city. He also was instrumental in securing the erection of Goshen's first high school. In 1837 he was appointed postmaster, serving until 1841. He also served in the State Legislature, was Circuit Judge for nine years and for two terms represented his district in Congress. In all of these positions he acquitted himself well and earned the esteem which he enjoyed for so many years.

Another conspicuous figure of this period, and for many years after, was Philip M. Henkel. Mr. Henkel came to Goshen in the early 40's and for a short time clerked in the store of DeFrees & Barns. Dr. Ellis soon afterward appointed him Deputy Auditor, a position which he filled so capably that he was elected County Auditor for two terms. He was an excellent penman and an accurate accountant. In the entire history of the county there has probably been no man in its public service who was more capable of filling clerical positions than he. In 1860 he was the Democratic candidate for Congress. From 1875 to 1883, while his son, Charles D. Henkel, was County Auditor, he again served as Deputy. Later he served four years as postmaster at Eau Claire, Mich. He died only a little over a year ago at Clinton, Iowa, at the advanced age of ninety-six years.

For a number of years Robert Lowry was active in the politics of Elkhart county. For a short time he owned the Goshen Democrat, disposing of it in 1855. He also served a term as Circuit Judge, and in 1866 was the Democratic candidate for Congress from the old Tenth district, but was defeated by "Billy" Williams of Warsaw. About 1870 he removed to Fort Wayne, where he engaged actively in the practice of law and for two terms represented the Twelfth district in Congress. He received a third nomination, but the party had two candidates that year, the other being H. C. Stanley of Noble county, and both were defeated. In 1860 he was chosen to preside over the Democratic State convention.

For a quarter of a century, from 1863 to 1888, James D. Osborne was prominently identified with the Elkhart county bar and during a good portion of this time he also took an active part in politics. He first served as Justice of the Peace and when the new Thirty-fourth judicial circuit was erected he was appointed by Governor Hendricks the first judge of the circuit. At the subsequent election he was defeated by William A. Woods. In 1878 he was elected to the State Legislature, where he distinguished himself particularly by his efforts in behalf of a measure for the reduction of official salaries. In 1880 he was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Congress in the new Thirteenth district, but was defeated by Hon. Daniel McDonald of Plymouth. However, he participated actively in the campaign which followed and was in great demand as a speaker. In 1880, when Judge William A. Woods resigned to take a seat on the Indiana Supreme Court, Governor Gray appointed Judge Osborne as his successor on the circuit bench. In 1882 he was elected for a full term of six years, his Republican opponent being John M. Van Fleet of Elkhart. After the expiration of his term in 1888 he never aspired to public office. He spent several years in California, then he returned to locate in Elkhart and engage again in the practice of his profession. He died at Marcellus, Mich., November 30, 1916, aged eighty-six years.

Mention of the Goshen Democrat has already been made in this article. That paper was established in 1837 with Thomas H. Bassett as its first editor. Subsequent editors were E. W. H. Ellis, Robert Lowry, J. T. Bennett, James D. Osborne, H. S. Fassett, Laporte Heefner, M. B. Hascall and C. L. Murray. One man, however, was identified with the paper longer than all of these together, and his name is more widely known in that connection than any of his predecessors. This was William A. Beane, familiarly known to the people of his generation as Billy Beane. Mr. Beane's connection with the Democrat began in 1844, when he entered the office as "devil." With the exception of about five years he was connected with the office in one capacity or another until his death, which occurred in the latter part of 1893. For nearly a quarter of a century he served as editor, and at the time he died he was one of the most widely known editors in the north half of Indiana. He served his party in many campaigns, occasionally to win, but far more often to find himself on the losing side.

During the last quarter of the nineteenth century Llewellyn Wanner was a prominent figure in Elkhart county politics. Mr. Wanner came to the county in 1875 from Reading, Pa. He engaged in the practice of law, in which he continued until his death in December, 1900. In every campaign, beginning with 1876, he was in demand as a speaker and he rendered his party valuable service. In 1876 he was nominated for Prosecuting Attorney, but was defeated by James S. Drake. In 1888 he was the Democratic candidate for Judge of the Thirty-fourth judicial circuit, his successful competitor being J. M. Van Fleet. In 1894 he made the race for Congress, but only to face defeat as before, this time by Lemuel W. Royse of Warsaw. For several years he served as City Attorney of Goshen.

Among the younger men who were prominent for a time in the politics of the county was Otis D. Thompson. Mr. Thompson was a talented man, an eloquent speaker and a good campaigner. In 1880 he was appointed City Judge of Elkhart. In 1882 he was elected County Clerk, serving acceptably in that office for four years, but in the Republican landslide of 1886 he was defeated for re-election. In 1890 he was elected Mayor of Elkhart, serving one term. Upon reaching manhood he took up the study of law, but owing to his dislike of that profession he practiced only a short time. After retiring from the office of County Clerk he engaged in manufacturing, a business which was more congenial to his tastes. He died in 1895 at the age of forty years.

Another citizen of Elkhart, who figured in public affairs at the same time and a little later than Mr. Thompson, was Harry S. Chester, who was elected Clerk of the city of Elkhart in 1886 and 1888, and County Clerk in 1890. Mr. Chester was a capable, obliging and popular official and left behind him an excellent record. He was also an accomplished musician and an amateur poet and wrote a number of poems which would have done credit to poets of greater celebrity. After retiring from office he seemed to drift from one occupation to another and was very unfortunate in some of his business ventures. He died in 1906, aged forty-four years. His brother, Ellis Chester, served a term as Mayor of Elkhart and died the day before his term expired.

There is one commanding figure who towers above all of his contemporaries of the period immediately following the Civil War and mention of whom has purposely been reserved for the last. This is Judge Joseph A. S. Mitchell of the Indiana Supreme Court, better known to Elkhart county people as Captain Mitchell. For more than twenty years Captain Mitchell was the acknowledged leader of the county's Democracy and he was also conspicuous in the councils of the party in the State. He came here in 1859 and began the practice of law. When the Civil War broke out he enlisted and served throughout that bloody conflict. When the war closed he returned to Goshen and took up the work of his chosen profession. Almost immediately the veterans of the far recognized in him a coming leader and his leadership did not wait far in the future. The twenty years from 1865 until his entrance upon the Supreme Court in 1885 were exceedingly busy ones for him. There were few important cases in which he was not engaged and the more difficult the case the more eagerly were his services sought. When Goshen organized its city government in 1868 he became its first City Attorney, a position in which he rendered valuable service in framing its first ordinances. In 1870 he was elected Mayor, serving one term. He was repeatedly urged to become a candidate for important positions, but he turned a deaf ear to these importunities, choosing to devote his talents to the pursuit of his profession. In 1880 he accepted the nomination for Supreme Judge, but suffered defeat with his party, his successful opponent being his friend and fellow-townsmen, William A. Woods. In 1882 he was chosen by the Board of County Commissioners as County Attorney. In this capacity he was employed in some of the most important litigation in which the county was ever engaged. An attempt had been made by a former Board of Commissioners to fasten upon the county a tract of almost worthless marsh land at an enormous price for a county farm. This attempted steal had resulted in a political upheaval, three Democratic commissioners, John A. Smith, William W. McVitty and Brice Larimer being elected. Messrs. Smith and Larimer both took their seats at once and one of their first official acts was to set aside this infamous deal. A stubbornly contested lawsuit followed in which Captain Mitchell's splendid talents were zealously employed in behalf of his client, the county, and with the result that the case was finally won. For this arduous service Captain Mitchell received a salary of $200 a year. In 1884 he was again nominated for a place on the Supreme bench, and this time, in spite of a campaign of misrepresentation and vituperation waged against him, he was elected, taking his seat in January, 1885. He found his new duties congenial to him and himself admirably fitted for the work which lay before him. His judicial decisions are regarded as models and stand as monuments of his incessant industry and his great legal knowledge. He was renominated in 1890 and triumphantly re-elected, but did not live to begin his second term. He died December 12, 1890, after a brief illness. No death ever cast the little city of Goshen into a deeper gloom. Nor was the sorrow confined to his own city, but it was felt throughout the State. Had he lived to serve another six years on the bench, there is little doubt that he would have risen to still higher eminence, but with his single term of service he ranks among Indiana's greatest jurists.

There are many others, both living and dead, whose names deserve honorable mention, but the allotted space has been exhausted. Suffice it to say that in no county in this State can be found a better citizenry than those who make up the Democracy of Elkhart county. As the party has been in power but little of the time during the past sixty-five years, there has been but little opportunity for achievement. Its history, therefore, is a history of men and the men here sketched are among its most conspicuous representatives in their respective periods.

Note.—When I was writing the above article I did not intend to mention any persons now living, as there are so many sterling Democrats in this county that it would be impossible to give each one even a half dozen lines. Following are a number who deserve notice and there are many others who do not now come to mind: Mayor S. F. Spohn, Dr. C. C. Bower, Colonel C. G. Conn, Dr. D. L. Miller, Hon. M. M. Galentine, Piebe Swact, Anthony and B. F. Deahl, J. W. Replogle, George B. Slate, Haines Egbert, Charles E. Freeland, J. J. Zollinger, Edson C. Bartholomew, W. H. Winship, John N. Swart, James Dunmire, George H. Rimpler, A. R. Bemenderfer, W. J. Beasecker, A. E. Weaver, D. M. Bechtel, W. R. Coverstore, Charles Swart, W. W. Showalter, W. E. Girner, E. E. Fisher, Ben Wise, C. C. Raymer, O. M. Conley, J. F. Hauenstein, B. F. Kindig, Frank Leader, Charles A. Aitken, Dr. G. W. Spohn, Judge J. L. Harman, John W. Brown, Elias Fisher, Charles Kohler, J. A. Beane and Aaron Work.

The following who are no longer living also ought not to be omitted: Dr. P. D. Harding, George Milburn, Joseph Zollinger, Edwin M. Wingar, W. W. Wise, Dr. F. L. Putt, Brice Larimer, Henry Bemenderfer, David Logan, Colonel R. M. Johnson, John A. Smith and Samuel R. Miller.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF FAYETTE COUNTY

IN writing the history of Fayette county one hundred years from the date of the act of the legislature authorizing the organization, it is interesting to quote from the writings of some of the earlier historians, which writings are repeated by some of the later guessers in the same line. For instance, here is a short paragraph in a recent publication which fairly summarizes all of those who tried to analyze:

"The first mention of Fayette county by name is to be found in the legislative act of December 28, 1818, which defined its limits and provided for its formal organization on the first day of the following month—that is, four days later. The fact that such a short time was to elapse between the passage of the act creating the county and the time for its actual organization would seem to indicate that the politicians of the proposed county had their plans well in hand for the disposal of the few offices which would be necessary in order to get the county started. Most of the officials named had had some connection with Franklin county affairs and some of them had held offices in that county. Jonathan McCarty and John Conner were undoubtedly the men most responsible for the creation of the new county, Conner being a member of the state senate at the time the act was passed."

If all these historians are right in their conclusions the politicians of those early days builded well and did the work on hand at the start most excellently. Jonathan McCarty was one of the Whig leaders who is constantly mentioned among those present when the offices were being distributed, and the praises which were sounded of him by the Indianapolis Journal in the early days were such that no doubt could be entertained of his party loyalty.

Jonathan McCarty was the first county clerk and Newton Claypool was the first county treasurer, both "Whigs forever." In mentioning these two offices at this time, it is interesting to note that in the first one hundred years of Fayette county history only two Democrats have ever held the office of county clerk, and only two Democrats have ever been given the chance to count the money in the treasury.

The two Democrats who held the office of county clerk were John G. T. Veach, elected in 1874, and William Reeder, who was accidentally elected in 1915. Reeder had to have several counts to determine that he was really elected, and then he had but three votes ahead of his Republican opponent.

The two county treasurers admitting Democracy as their political belief were W. H. Beck, elected in 1853, and Ben W. Cole, who "nosed-in" and defeated his Republican opponent in 1915. In 1915 it will also be remembered that Finley Gray was serving in the congress, by the aid of some other counties in the district.

In looking through the early history, in 1819, in the long list of Whigs holding office appears the name of William W. Wick, one of the early-day Democrats who was conspicuous later in Marion county politics and served in congress. He was subjected to much abuse from the Indianapolis Journal in all his political activities, the chief complaint of the editor being that Wick sometimes made his campaign appealing to voters of all political parties, as he did when a candidate for Congress, and when it was claimed that party lines should rule, the editor declaring it an "immoral act" for a Democrat to ask Whigs to vote for him. However, Wick was elected whenever he chose to run. He was the first prosecutor in Fayette and about the only man in office outside the Whig party who can be clearly recognized as a Democrat at that time or later.

In the city of Connersville the Democrats have been more fortunate than in the county. They have maintained a good working organization and while they have been winning occasionally in the city they have kept the county Republican majority so small that it appears peculiar that they have not often turned the tide and changed general results. There are many counties in the state which are just as reliably Democratic on election days as Fayette is Republican, and on even smaller majorities which are never overcome by the opposition.

W. C. Forrey was for a number of years mayor of Connersville and always a strong Democrat politically. He was elected on the Democratic ticket for several terms, but his personal popularity was sufficient to wipe out much political prejudice. Charles J. Murray, another "all the time" Democrat, also served as mayor, being elected in 1872.

Frank M. Edwards, the county chairman in 1918, is one of the Democrats of the fighting sort who have forced the Republicans to watch all corners of their organization in order to preserve their small margin, which is sufficiently narrow that it would be designated in many counties of the state as decidedly "unsafe."

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF FLOYD COUNTY

By Herman Rave

BROADLY speaking, the earlier history of Floyd county is that of the counties of Clark and Harrison, out of parts of which it was created in 1819 through the efforts of the Scribner family, the founders of the city of New Albany. In those early days the lines between the two parties then in existence do not seem to have been so sharply drawn as they were later, the greater interests of the community of settlers centering in their local affairs and on the question of slavery. The latter seems to have been the main dividing line and the Democracy of the river counties of Indiana followed its first great Governor in this matter and opposed the making of Indiana a slave State and defeated its opponents at every step. In this matter what is now Floyd county stood shoulder to shoulder with the majority.

After the establishment of the county its first years were devoted to a fight for the location of the court house, in which the town of Greenville competed with New Albany, and in which the latter won. As usual in such fights party lines were mostly obliterated. When the court house was at last permanently located in New Albany Floyd became more and more what may be termed a city-county and its politics and papers centered there, although the city itself is Republican normally by some 300 majority, while the outside townships are Democratic with one exception, Franklin.

It was quite natural that Floyd as a separate county should not have had any great and prominent representatives of Democracy until a more recent period. Harrison and Clark, with the older towns of Corydon, Charlestown and Jeffersonville, monopolized the honors and distinctions, but when once Floyd and its capital got into the stride a series of notable men in Indiana history and Democracy succeeded one another rapidly and held the attention of not only the State, but the nation.

The first of these men to appear was Ashbel P. Willard, native of Oneida, N. Y., who came campaigning into the river counties and liked New Albany so well that he settled here and at the age of 36 became Governor of Indiana.

Cyrus L. Dunham, also a native of New York, was another great leader of the Indiana Democracy, and like Willard, fought the wave of Know-Nothingism which swept the country.

There were other prominent and efficient men who led the party locally and made a reputation for themselves, but the greatest of the Democratic leaders to be credited to Floyd county is undoubtedly Michael C. Kerr, who came from Titusville, Pa., in 1852, filled the prosecutor's office and rose to Congress, where he was one of the most noted speakers of that great body.

Astute politicians Floyd county has never lacked since she came into the running politically, and the adjoining counties have contributed quite a number of those who must be credited to Floyd, which became their home with their entrance into politics.

While speaking of the political history of Floyd county from a Democratic standpoint, it may as well be understood that the newspapers have always had an important part in it, especially the New Albany Ledger, which early came to be the mouthpiece of the Democratic leaders of New Albany and the county, and was frequently owned by the men who not only edited the paper, but directed the internal policies of their locality and even of the congressional district and much of southern Indiana. Sometimes its owners and editors even influenced State and national politics. The Ledger is a lineal descendant of the Argus, the first Democratic paper published in Floyd county, founded in the autumn of 1836 by Dennison & Hine. It went through a number of ups and downs and first changed its name to the Democrat, under a new ownership, but in 1841 it was again sold and became the Register under J. C. Jocelyn. In 1843 the outfit was purchased by Phineas M. Kent and the name changed to Southwestern Democrat. Another sale or two finally brought the paper into the possession of Bradley & Lucas, who, after a year, sold out to Norman & Bosworth in 1849. The latter firm changed the name to the New Albany Ledger and it at once took prominent standing as a political paper. Norman was a strong writer, a man of great literary ability and the peer of Prentice in some ways. Bosworth soon retired from the Ledger and Mr. Kent again became one of the owners and put it upon its financial feet. He was a man of means, owned a large mill, and was first president of the St. Louis Air Line, now part of the Southern system. Norman's political influence pervaded this particular section of Indiana and he was acknowledged as one of the ablest of Indiana editors. He died October 30, 1869. His interest was transferred to Lucius G. Matthews, who in 1872 sold to Merrill & Moter, when a stock company was formed and the paper was consolidated with the Standard, the company consisting of C. E. Merrill, C. R. Moter, Josiah Gwin, J. V. Kelso, Charles E. Johnson. Shortly after the consolidation all but Mr. Gwin retired from the ownership and James P. Applegate, Jonathan Peters, Josiah Gwin and Adam Himer became the owners.

The Standard, which had come into the combination, was born in 1871 and was ably edited. Mr. Kelso, one of its owners, was an able lawyer, a shrewd politician and a strong fighter for his own and the opinions of his party. All these men have gone to their last rest, and for a number of years the Ledger was the sole property of Miss Ada Peters, who proved to be one of the best newspaper women of the State, and has the esteem of her community. She sold the paper in the fall of 1916 to Evan B. Stotsberg, who this year (1918) sold to Bruce Ulster, his manager.

The editors of the Ledger at all times played quite an important part in district politics, and its late owner is a well-known figure, not only in district but in State politics as well, having served the unexpired term of the late Attorney-General Milburn and having been a candidate for the office in the late campaign. His father before him, Judge John H. Stotsberg, was also prominent in Indiana politics and was a most polished and cultivated gentleman. Major Kelso, who was connected with the Ledger, is also succeeded by a son, C. B. Kelso, equally as able as his father and an equally staunch Democrat and successful attorney and business man.

In 1881 Josiah Gwin began the publication of the Public Press, also Democratic, under the firm name of Josiah Gwin & Sons. Mr. Gwin has since passed away, but his son, Frank Gwin, continued the publication of the paper, which, as a weekly, had a good circulation, until his death early in 1918, and is now conducted by his widow.

In 1850 a German Democratic paper was established, but soon expired, to be succeeded by others, but their existence was ephemeral, although there were at that time some 5,000 German-Americans in the county, all of whom, probably, could read the German language. The late Otto Palmer was the last German editor to publish a Democratic paper in Floyd county. This fact goes to show how rapidly the population of German ancestry becomes thoroughly Americanized.

Among other notable Floyd county Democratic politicians was Thomas L. Smith, who came to New Albany in 1836 and served one term as judge of the Indiana Supreme Court. He was the only lawyer of the Democratic faith for quite a time to reside in Floyd county. This fact was seized upon by the Floyd Democrats, and they ran him for office whenever possible. He must have been popular, for he was frequently elected.

Judge George A. Bicknell was another attorney of great ability, who served this county politically and judicially, being first elected judge, then to Congress for two terms, and in 1881 serving on a commission which brought up the arrears of cases before the Indiana Supreme Court. He was undoubtedly one of the foremost lawyers of the Middle West.

In Floyd, as in other counties, the profession of law has always figured most prominently in politics, and the present bar may justly be termed the leading political body in the county. A roster of the names of the attorneys means a roster of leaders. Evan B. Stotsberg has served as Attorney-General; C. W. Schindler as county attorney; C. D. Kelso, while holding no office, is a power; Charles Turner, an energetic and entirely self-made man, is at present representative in the Legislature; J. W. Ewing is a power not only in Floyd, but in all the river counties; Col. Charles Jewett, who held the highest judicial office in the Philippines for a time, is not only brilliant in his profession, but strong in politics when he chooses to take a hand, and associated with him is Walter V. Bulleit, who served as prosecutor and was succeeded by Herbert Kenney, another young Democrat.

Outside of the legal circle there is M. C. Thornton, who has served the county as representative for two terms and is now serving as joint senator of Floyd and Harrison. Mr. Thornton is a striking figure and promises to go farther. He is another example of sturdy American Democracy, having risen from a boyhood of poverty and toil.

The veteran in the Democratic ranks and perhaps the hardest fighter, a unique figure, is Capt. Tom Hanlon, who has held office as auditor of the county and various other offices. Everybody in this section knows him. He is at once picturesque and lovable and decidedly a "good scrapper."

Among the officials of the county at present are Judge John M. Paris, quiet, mild-mannered, just and a fine politician; Dr. A. V. Johnson, serving as clerk, who could be elected in several counties at once, if the law allowed; Emile DuPaquier, auditor, whom everybody likes; Claude Sittason, who has held the office of sheriff and treasurer, and made the race for the mayoralty, capable, strong and trusted by the public; Sheriff Charles Long, who has been re-elected in spite of the fact that he could not make a canvass on account of illness; Recorder Williams, who stepped into politics out of the schoolroom, and Victor Herb, county assessor, all of them doing their share to further the interests of the party.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF FOUNTAIN COUNTY

By A. T. Livengood

THE location of Fountain county has much to do with its politics, as it is surrounded on two sides with the waters of the Wabash river, which are pure and contributes much to the health of its citizenship, and the life of the Democratic party.

It is located in the "Bend" of the Wabash where it turns southward from its long sweep across the State from the State of Ohio, where it rises, so that its northern and western boundary line is the Wabash.

The county was organized December 31, 1825, and Covington was established as its county seat on July 25, 1826, but it being on the western side of the county, frequent county seat removals have arisen, first to transfer the seat of justice to a little town near the center of the county, called Chambersburg, and afterward to Veedersburg, which is located near the county's center, but all the past efforts have failed to take it away from Covington, so that city has the court house, which was erected in the sixties, but which is in a good state of preservation.

The old court house has been the scene of many a legal battle and many a prominent lawyer has appeared in the courts of this county, including Abraham Lincoln, Stephen A. Douglas, Daniel W. Voorhees, Edward A. Hannegan, Joseph E. McDonald, Lew Wallace, and many others that could be mentioned.

Fountain county is not a large county, but it contains about four hundred square miles and its surface is mostly level, which well adapts it to agriculture and stock raising. Coal is mined in various parts of the county and it has many beauty spots, such as "The Arch," at Fountain; "The Glens," near Covington; "Ravine Park," at Attica; "Hub Park," at Veedersburg, and the "Fair Grounds," at Covington. The county was given its name in memory of Major Fountain of Kentucky, who was killed in a battle on the Maumee river, near Fort Wayne, Ind., in the year 1790. Its population has remained about the same since 1890, being a little over 20,000, and although it has three thriving cities in Attica, Covington and Veedersburg, and many small towns, yet none of them has grown to any great proportions in the last twenty years, but they are all active and are not losing in population.

The county has a sturdy manhood and womanhood, as the early settlers came from the Carolinas, Kentucky and the Virginias, and are principally of German extraction, and having been followers of Jefferson, Monroe and Jackson in the early days, naturally its early citizenship affiliated with the Democratic party, and for many years no one but Democrats were permitted to fill the offices in the county, and while the Democratic party has a small majority of the voters in the county, yet a few Republicans are elected occasionally.

Prior to 1890 Jackson township, in this county, named in honor of the great President, had only some twenty odd Republican voters therein out of a voting population of 250, and it has always remained steadfast to the Democratic party, as has Troy and Wabash townships.

The Democratic party of this county points with pride to its early leadership, because it was here that lived that great Democrat, the Honorable Edward A. Hannegan when he was United States Senator from Indiana; also the Honorable Daniel W. Voorhees was raised in this county and grew to manhood here and his voice electrified the multitudes in law and in politics and he was the idol of Fountain county Democracy until his death.

Here lived the Honorable Joseph E. McDonald at one time, and the Honorable Lew Wallace, the far-famed author of "Ben-Hur," was a Democrat before the war days, and he lived here also.

The Honorable David Wallace, once Governor of Indiana during the years from 1837 to 1840, is said to lie buried in the old graveyard in the city of Covington with his grave unmarked.

The Democratic party had always been in the majority until the coming in of the Greenback party, when many Democrats joined that party and weakened the ranks of the Democrats, and from that day to this the party majority has been around the one hundred mark.

The Democratic newspapers of the county have been noted for their conservatism and have not been so aggressive in pushing the cause of the great Democratic party as it appears they should have been, but their laxness in that respect is accounted for, because of the fact that there are only two out-and-out Democratic papers in the county, one the Covington Friend, the party organ at Covington, Ind., edited now by John B. Schwin, and established in 1840, and the other the Fountain-Warren Democrat, edited by G. M. Williams, at Attica. A long line of independent newspapers are strung all over the county, the most prominent of all of them being the Veedersburg News, which was for a number of years edited by Charles M. Berry, who was probably the most popular newspaper man in the county, and the Democratic party lost a brave defender when he died, some six years ago. Other independent Democratic newspapers in the county are the Attica Daily Tribune, edited by R. E. Ray; the Hillsboro Times, edited by J. W. Small, and the Kingman Star, edited by R. A. Booe.

The following are the names of some of the Democrats in this county who served the State in the Legislature: Daniel W. Cunningham, Elliott N. Bowman, Bayless Carter, E. Scott Booe, J. Shannon Nave, Thomas N. Lief, Dan R. Young, D. C. Reed, Joe H. Stahl, H. R. Claypool and others could be named.

Among the workers in the ranks of Democracy, many of whom have held important places in public office and leadership, we name the following:

Harris Reynolds, Judge Ristine, David Webb, Horace Hetfield, Stephen Voorhees, Colonel James McMannomy, James A. Sanders, James G. Mofett, Samuel Clark, William H. Miles, Thomas M. Rinn, Joel Watts, H. C. Yount, Alex Hetfield, A. M. Booe, George Glascock, Robert J. Miller, W. W. Luke, and of a later date F. W. Macoughtry, Judge Charles Remster, Judge I. E. Schoonover, Lewis Tinder, D. S. Ferguson, W. A. Wright, A. T. Livengood, Jas. A. Copeland, General William B. Gray, John B. Martin, W. W. Finrock, J. A. Wilt, Leroy Sanders, Thomas J. Dotson, C. G. Wildt, J. G. B. Short, W. N. White, C. W. Dice, T. H. McGeorge, M. F. Livengood, C. B. Philpott, W. R. Massey, W. T. Willett, Hiram Allen, William H. Young, O. S. Clark, Burton VanHook, D. H. Wallace, H. J. Sullivan, G. P. Schwin, W. I. Boggs, Judd Cory, J. B. Thomas and W. B. Myers.

Very few federal appointments have come to the Democrats of this county, other than the offices filled by those mentioned above.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF FRANKLIN COUNTY

By Louis Federmann

FRANKLIN COUNTY is located in the southeastern part of Indiana, bordering on Ohio, and was the gateway through which the pioneers of the East and the South entered into the wilderness of the territory of Indiana. The first entry of lands was made in 1803 and active settlement began in 1804. Two miles to the west of where Brookville is now located was the old Indian boundary line, established at Greenville, Ohio, in 1795, which halted their onward western march; so they settled and builded their homes among the hills and valleys of the beautiful White Water river and here they made ready to take an active part in the development and advancement of Indiana. Here came the Butlers, the McCartys, the Nobles, the Hannas, the Eads, the Wallaces, the Rays, the Templetons, the Stooeps, and many others, several of whom became noted in the official and institutional life of Indiana.

Franklin county was organized February 1, 1811, and was the sixth county organized in Indiana. At the time of its organization it is estimated that the county had a population of about five thousand people; the census of 1815 showed a population of 7,370, being second only to the population of Knox county. Franklin county had been in existence only five years when Indiana was admitted to statehood and had had members in the territorial legislature of the five previous sessions. When the constitutional convention of 1816 met at Corydon, Franklin county had five of the ablest men who sat in that body, viz.: William H. Eads, Robert Hanna, Jr., James Noble, James Brownlee and Enoch McCarty. Two of these men, James Noble and Robert Hanna, later became United States Senators from Indiana, Noble serving from 1816 to 1831, dying in the middle of his third term, when his friend, Robert Hanna, was appointed to serve his unexpired term.

Franklin county was represented in the constitutional convention of 1851 by Dr. George Berry. Whether the county will be represented in the constitutional convention of 1918 is too early to foretell.

Franklin county has been the birthplace or home of many men who won distinction in public and professional life in the earlier history of our State and Nation, and those worthy of mention are as follows, viz.:

James Noble and Robert Hanna, U. S. Senators from Indiana.

John Henderson, U. S. Senator from Mississippi.

Jesse B. Thomas, U. S. Senator from Illinois.

John H. Farquhar, member of Congress, 1864.

James B. Ray, Noah Noble, David Wallace and Abram Hammond, Governors of Indiana; John P. St. John, Governor of Kansas; Stephen Harding, Territorial Governor of Utah; Lew Wallace, Territorial Governor of New Mexico, Minister to Turkey and author of "Ben-Hur."

John A. Matson, candidate for Whig nomination for Governor of Indiana, 1844, but failed to receive the nomination.

Courtland C. Matson, son of John A. Matson, Democratic nominee for Governor of Indiana, 1888, but failed of election.

Isaac Blackford, Stephen C. Stephens and W. F. McKinney, Judges of the Indiana Supreme Court.

R. B. Abbott, President of Albert Lea University, Minnesota.

John P. D. John, President of DePauw University.

Charles W. Lewis, President of Moores Hill College.

Charles N. Sims, Chancellor of Syracuse University.

E. D. Barbour, President of Kansas University.

James B. Eads, son of William H. Eads, engineer, builder of St. Louis bridge, and jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi river.

James N. Tyner, Postmaster-General.

P. A. Hackelman, General U. S. Army.

Oliver S. Glisson, Rear Admiral U. S. Navy.

Proud as the county is of its early pioneer history and of its noted men and women; proud as the county is of the scenic beauty of its rivers, hills and valleys, prouder still is the county of its loyalty and steadfastness to the Democratic party. Since 1844, without exception and under all circumstances, it has given large and substantial Democratic majorities for the National and State ticket and in all this time of seventy-three years but four of the local Democratic candidates have failed to carry the county. While Franklin county is the recognized Gibraltar of Democracy in the State of Indiana, it rarely ever has sought favor or scarcely ever received preferment at the hands of the Democratic party. It has had only one candidate for State office, viz.: in 1902 Captain William H. Bracken was nominated for Judge of the Appellate Court. It has never had a Democratic State officer and but once has it had a Democratic candidate for Congress, Dr. George Berry, in 1864, who was undoubtedly elected, but owing to the throwing out of a Democratic township in Decatur county, failed to receive the certificate of election. Captain William H. Bracken was appointed as Collector of Internal Revenue in 1893 and served four years, and this is the only appointment of note ever given a Democrat in this county, and yet we have always proved faithful, loyal and true to the principles of the Democratic party.

The medical profession has always wielded a potential influence in maintaining the high standards of Democracy in Franklin county. One of the most prominent members of the profession was Dr. George Berry, State Senator in 1849, member of the constitutional convention of 1850, Democratic candidate for Congress in 1864 and County Auditor from 1870 to 1878. It is safe to say no other man in Franklin county was so well known or wielded a greater influence than Dr. George Berry. His son, William H. Berry, while never holding office except that of School Trustee, always took an active part in political affairs and was an enthusiastic worker for the good of the party. Dr. John H. Quick was County Auditor from 1857 to 1864.

Dr. Thomas Gifford of Laurel, Ind., another sturdy Democrat, was elected as a representative in 1858, 1860 and 1862. In 1866 he was elected to the State Senate. As a member of the General Assembly he was distinguished for his untiring efforts in working for the welfare of the county and State. His son, Dr. Samuel A. Gifford, was elected Representative in 1908 and 1910. Dr. Evan L. Patterson was elected to the lower house of the Indiana General Assembly in 1896 and 1898, and was elected as State Senator in 1906. He is now a member of the school board of Brookville. Among those members of the profession who have always worked untiringly in the interests of Franklin county Democracy, but who have held only minor positions, are the following, viz.: Dr. Wallace of Springfield township, Dr. T. F. Bertenshaw of Whitewater township, Dr. Hinkley of Springfield township, Dr. Averdick of Ray township, Dr. Schum of Highland township, Dr. McGuire of Metamora township, Dr. George B. Buckingham, Dr. George E. Squier, Dr. F. E. Seal, Dr. James F. West, Dr. E. M. Glaser and Dr. John W. Lucas of Brookville.

The legal profession has always been active in promoting and developing the Democratic majorities. Henry Berry, Clerk of the Circuit Court from 1860 to 1868, and Fielding Berry, a prominent attorney, were brothers of Dr. George Berry. Henry C. Hanna was Judge of the Circuit Court from 1870 to 1881. Ferdinand S. Swift was Clerk of the Circuit Court from 1876 to 1880 and Judge of the Circuit Court from 1881 to 1905. Samuel S. Harrell was Clerk of the Circuit Court from 1868 to 1876, served in the Legislature four consecutive terms, served as a member of the Democratic State central committee and chairman for a number of years of the county committee. He was always active in Democratic circles and uncompromising in his fidelity to the Democratic principles. William H. Bracken, who, with Samuel S. Harrell, were the most active Democrats in the county, was elected Clerk of the Circuit Court in 1878-1882. In 1892 he was Democratic presidential-elect-at-large and, being an orator of note, made an extensive canvass of the State. In 1893 he was appointed by President Cleveland as Collector of Internal Revenue of the Sixth District of Indiana, in which capacity he served four years. For more than twelve years Mr. Bracken was chairman of the Democratic central committee and under his guidance the county rolled up its largest Democratic majorities. His son, Leonidas L. Bracken, is now the Secretary of the Federal Trades Commission. Stephen E. Urmston served as Prosecuting Attorney from 1874 to 1878 and was elected State Senator 1878 to 1886, and was a very prominent member of that body. Francis M. Alexander was elected State Senator in 1894 and was a delegate to the national convention at Baltimore in 1912 and helped nominate Woodrow Wilson. Mr. Alexander was always influential and a zealous Democrat. James B. Kidney was elected Clerk of the Circuit Court in 1886 and 1890. He served on the school board and was always an active and earnest worker for the cause. I. N. McCarty is of the younger members of the bar and, while never elected to office, has been very active in party politics. Foremost among the non-professional men was Hon. John S. Martin, a progressive farmer and prominent citizen, who for more than fifty years was a tireless worker, an inspiration for the cause of Democracy, and no man in our county wielded a greater influence or gave so liberally of his time and means for the success of his party.

Other prominent Democrats who have been active and loyal in maintaining the substantial Democratic majorities are: Aaron B. Line, Israel Gobel, Caspar Fogel, Thomas Appleton, George F. Maxwell, J. M. Vawter, Cyrus B. Bentlev, John S. Martin, John B. Moorman, Levi W. Buckingham, M. M. Moore, J. T. Meyncke, Edward Goff, Ebenezer Cooley, James Dare, Samuel P. Whitman, John N. Smith, Herman Trichler, Peter Schaf, C. R. Cory, A. J. Heason, William

M. McCleery, John P. Schiltz, G. Ray King, Louis Federmann, Richard S. Taylor, John W. Brockman, William H. Senour, A. J. Reifel, T. J. McCarty, William M. McCarty, Edward Stenger, William J. Zacharias, A. J. Shriner (postmaster), Louis A. Jonas, George Loper, George Miller, Charles A. Miller, Louis W. Koerner, Albert Pierce, Henry Schmidt, W. E. Ensminger, Dr. M. C. Armstrong, Frank J. Baker and William A. Younts. To name all who take more than a passive interest in the affairs of the party would require a list of at least one thousand more names.

It is impossible to obtain the names of the chairmen of county central committees back to the organization of the party. The names of the following persons obtainable who have served as chairmen of the county central committee are John B. Moorman, Ferdinand S. Swift, William H. Bracken, Samuel S. Harrell, G. Ray King, John P. Schiltz, Herman Trichler, Edward Stenger, A. J. Shriner, William D. Moore and F. X. Siebert. For more than ten years William M. Baker, the present Clerk of the Circuit Court, has been the valuable and efficient secretary of the county central committee, having been succeeded in 1916 by A. N. Logan, the present secretary. The dominant force that has backed the work of the county central committee and has done much to sustain the Democracy of the county has been the Franklin Democrat, which was established December 7, 1838, and has continued uninterruptedly until January 17, 1885, when it was changed from the Franklin Democrat to the Brookville Democrat, owing to the confusion from another Franklin Democrat being published at Franklin, Johnson county. The editors of the Democrat from November, 1843, to 1848 were Henry Berry and Benjamin West; from 1848 to 1852, Nelson Abbott; from 1852 to 1863, Cyrus B. Bentley; from 1863 to 1866, Nathan T. Carr; from 1866 to 1869, Cyrus B. Bentley; from 1869 to 1873, William B. Maddock; from 1873 to 1882, Cyrus B. Bentley; from 1882 to 1889, George Downey and Edgar R. Quick; from 1889 to 1891, A. N. Crecraft; from 1891 to the present time, more than a quarter of a century, M. H. Irwin, and is today regarded as one of the best newspaper properties in the Hoosier State.

The present Democratic officials are William M. Baker, Clerk of the Circuit Court; Charles G. Reifel, County Auditor; Charles E. Winscott, County Treasurer; Charles Marlin, County Sheriff; John A. Schum, County Recorder; A. N. Logan, County Assessor; John L. Stewart, County Surveyor; Dr. F. E. Seals, County Coroner, and Perry Appleton and Clifford Jones, County Commissioners.

Owing to the extreme modesty of the Democracy of Franklin county we have received very little recognition from national or State Democratic councils, yet we are proud of the fact that we have always proved true and loyal to the principles of Democracy as instilled into us by our fathers and glorify in the unbroken Democratic victories of three-quarters of a century.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF FULTON COUNTY

IT was in 1834 when what is now known as Fulton county was portions of Cass, Miami and Kosciusko counties, mainly Cass. By reason of the distance and inconvenience of the citizens living within the district in reaching the county seat at Logansport, a petition was presented to the Legislature of 1834-5 praying for the organization of Fulton county out of the territory of the counties named.

The petition was favorably considered and the county's boundary lines were established in accordance with the prayer of the petitioners. This was but a preparatory act. At the subsequent session of the Legislature, held 1835-36, an act to organize the county of Fulton was passed declaring "that from and after the first day of April next the county of Fulton shall enjoy all the rights and jurisdiction which to separate and individual counties do or (may) properly belong." In March, 1844, the county was enlarged by the addition of twelve sections on the east boundary line, taken from Miami county.

PERSONAL PREFERMENTS.

This county never had many claimants for political honors either by election or appointment, although it has had, and still has, many persons who were well qualified for official positions of a high character, yet their modesty or ambition for preferment has not inclined them to seek that which they might have obtained. Only two persons have ever aspired to a seat in the National Congress from this county. One, after two or more futile attempts to obtain that honor, gave up in despair; the other, Hon. Henry A. Barnhart, a Democrat and citizen of Rochester, was more successful. He was elected in 1908 as a Representative in Congress for the Thirteenth Congressional District to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Hon. A. L. Brick, a Republican, whose residence was at South Bend. Mr. Barnhart was a continuous member of Congress to March 4, 1919.

In 1892 Hon. Sidney R. Moon of Rochester, who had been Sheriff of the county for two terms and subsequently represented this county in the lower branch of the State Legislature for one term, asked for and received the nomination for Reporter of the Supreme Court and was elected.

These are the only two instances that this county has ever been favored for congressional or State representation, but the county, however, has been highly favored in the election of many Democrats as State Senators and members of the Lower House of Representatives.

Under the Benjamin Harrison administration Hon. George W. Holman of Rochester was appointed National Bank Examiner for Indiana and was subsequently appointed by Judge Woods as United States Commissioner, both of which positions he filled with credit to himself and the public.

POLITICAL.

When Fulton county was born it was christened a Democrat, and in all presidential contests since 1840 it has generally cast its vote in favor of the Democratic candidate.

From the organization of the county in 1836, with very rare exceptions, the Democrats were successful in electing their county officials at each election until 1860, when the oncoming Civil War and an enlarged population changed its political complexion from a normal Democratic majority of one hundred to a Republican plurality of a like number. Notwithstanding this change of political strength the Democratic party was by no means vanquished. It redoubled its energies and in a majority of the many hotly contested political battles since that time it has been the victor in the choice of national, State and county officials. This political condition still exists and it is only at times when Democrats are most hopeful for success that it is usually swept from local power.

The birth of the Progressive party in 1912 brought about in that year the almost complete overthrow of the local Republicans, and although that party was a prominent factor in the election in 1914, yet by reason of local dissensions among Democrats the Republicans elected all of their county ticket except Sheriff, Recorder, Prosecutor, State Representative and one Commissioner. Four of the eight townships elected Democratic Trustees. This local success by the Republicans, however, is more than balanced by the encouraging vote received by Hon. B. F. Shively for United States Senator and the entire Democratic State ticket, the pluralities for these Democratic candidates ranging from 82 to 106.

At the "off year" election in 1918, by a combination of elements very unusual, the Republicans were entirely successful in the choice of their local candidates.

NEWSPAPERS.

From the organization of the county until 1851 the county was without a newspaper of any kind. On January 12, 1851, Dr. John Q. Howell established a Democratic paper in Rochester and named it the Rochester Weekly Republican. It continued a brief time, when it was removed to Plymouth. Subsequently Dr. Howell returned to Rochester and established the Rochester Flag, but its existence was of but short duration. The county was then without a paper until 1856, when the Republicans established a paper in Rochester, named the Gazette, with Charles Shyrock and William Trimble as its publishers. The Gazette is now known as the Republican. T. Major Bitters was twice the owner of the Republican party organ. His first purchase was made in 1873 and again in 1884, when his son, Albert W. Bitters, was made a co-partner. On February 5, 1886, they established the Rochester Daily Republican. The co-partnership between father and son continued until April 5, 1902, on which date the demise of the senior member occurred, since which time Albert W. Bitters has been its sole editor and publisher and fully maintained the former high character and excellence of the paper.

In the year 1857 a stock company composed of Democrats founded the Rochester Sentinel with David R. Pershing as its first editor. Since the introduction of the two papers last named, each have had a multiplicity of changes in names of papers as well as of publishers too numerous to make mention of all, but both papers are yet maintained. It was not until 1872 that the Sentinel secured any great degree of permanency in its publishing or editorial work. In April of that year Andrew T. Bitters purchased the Sentinel of the McDonald brothers of Plymouth and took ownership and editorial control. He continued in that capacity with marked political success until May 5, 1886, when he sold the Sentinel to Hon.

Henry A. Barnhart, the present Representative in Congress for the Thirteenth district. He launched the Daily Evening Sentinel January 1, 1896, and is yet the owner of the plant, with Dean L. Barnhart, his son, as the publisher and editor.

It may be here remarked as a singular coincidence that two brothers, A. T. and T. Major Bitters, of opposite political opinions, should have published political competitive papers in the same city and county for a period of nine years.

The Akron Globe was the pioneer newspaper at Akron. It was established in 1866 by William T. Cutshall and Andrew T. Bitters. It underwent several suspensions, changes in name and publishers and obtained no great degree of permanency until November 20, 1891, when S. N. Shesler became the owner and publisher and named the paper the Akron News. In the past twenty-seven years he has built up a paper worthy of his labor and the pride of the town and community he served.

In November, 1918, Mr. Shesler sold the plant to Bernard Clayton, who will become its publisher on January 1, 1919.

On April 7, 1870, the initial number of the Kewanna Times, published by John C. Phillips, appeared. It also experienced many failures and reverses and is now published by Frank P. Gould.

The Fulton Leader was established by David O. Hoffman, May 16, 1901. He was succeeded by James H. Moore, the present publisher, January 22, 1908.

The Fulton County Sun is a new candidate for public favor, having been established at Rochester, January 9, 1913, by the Van Trump Company. It is independent in politics and is edited by Harold Van Trump.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF GIBSON COUNTY

THE Democratic party in Gibson county in the last sixty years cast the majority vote for the following candidates for the presidency: Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, Stephen A. Douglas, George B. McClellan, Samuel J. Tilden, Woodrow Wilson. William J. Bryan received more votes than McKinley in 1896. However, 346 of these votes were cast by the Populists. John C. Breckinridge received but 29 votes and John M. Palmer, Gold-Democrat, received but 11. Blaine defeated Cleveland by fewer than 200 votes. Roosevelt won over Parker by 650. This was the largest majority ever cast in Gibson county against a Democratic candidate for the presidency.

There have been many sturdy Democratic families in Gibson county: The Montgomerys, Robbs, Hargroves, Millers, Maucks, Trippetts, Holcombs, Stillwells, Welborns, and others. Smith Miller was elected to the House of Representatives in 1835, and served through a number of sessions. He was afterwards elected to the state senate and subsequently served two terms in Congress. This man won greater political honor than any other Democrat in the history of the county. He was a strong-minded, clear-headed, honest man and served his people long and faithfully.

The Hargroves were frequently represented in the state legislature, in the state senate, and in various county offices. Silas M. Holcomb, a man of distinguished ability, served in the lower house of the legislature and his son, Albert G. Holcomb, served with distinction in the state senate. John C. Holcomb was for eight years auditor of the county.

Caleb Trippett was elected a member of the House of Representatives in 1857, and filled various offices in the county. This family has for more than fifty years been prominent in political life of the county. The last to win preferment was Sanford Trippett, an attorney at law at Princeton, who was twice prosecuting attorney.

S. P. Welborn was treasurer of the county. Dr. W. P. Welborn was for eight years clerk of the circuit court. The strongest representative of this family, however, was the Honorable Oscar M. Welborn, who from 1873 until 1909 was judge of the circuit court of the county. During this long continuous service he presided with dignity, decorum and marked ability. It is doubtful whether there is in the life of the judiciary of the state a more extended service and certainly there has been no judge who had a more exalted conception of his judicial duty and a greater ability to serve his people than this man. He is still living and at the age of nearly eighty is engaged in the practice of the law at Princeton. Various other members of this family have been chosen by the people of the county to official position and on every occasion the duties intrusted to them have been well performed.

The Maucks have added much to the intelligence and high standing of Gibson county. Whether in or out of office the representatives of this family have been earnest, faithful citizens. Perhaps the highest representative of this family was Alfred Mauck, who was born in 1827 and died recently. He was a man of splendid natural ability, fairly well educated in the schools and well educated by private study. He was proud of his Democracy. He left to his children a very substantial fortune and, what is worth still more, a splendid name. His son, Edgar Mauck, but a few years since retired after four years' service as treasurer of the county.

William H. Evans was for nearly a half century connected with the publication of the Democratic organ in the county. He was an earnest, aggressive, open advocate of his views. His political adversaries always had for him the highest respect because they knew exactly where to find him. The only political reward he received for his long service was a term as postmaster at Princeton during Mr. Cleveland's first administration.

Quite as interesting a character is John C. Gorman, who for nearly a quarter of a century has had charge of the Princeton Democrat and who is at the present time postmaster in the city of Princeton. He comes from a long line of Democratic ancestors. In a brief article specific mention can be made of but a few individuals.

If in the last half-century there has been exerted a more marked influence in the community in any one department of its government than in another by the Democrats of Gibson county, it is in the judiciary. This has been continuously in Democratic hands since long prior to 1873. The circuit court sitting in Princeton has been presided over by the Honorable O. M. Welborn above mentioned, by the Honorable Herdis F. Clemmins of Mt. Vernon, and the Honorable Simon L. Vandever, who is at present judge of the circuit. Judge Mallott of Vincennes for a series of years presided over the court prior to the establishment of the present circuit court. The high character of the court has won the praise of adjoining counties. These different judges have exerted a splendid influence not only over the attorneys at the bar, but over the citizens of the county. Political bias has never dared to impugn the motives of any one of these distinguished judges. The judicial ermine has been handed from one to another absolutely unspotted.

The office of prosecuting attorney has been practically at all times in the care and keeping of the Democrats. The influence of these Democratic officials has been such that Gibson county is pointed to by the citizens of adjoining counties as one where the laws are fearlessly and justly enforced.

The Gibson county bar has always had Democratic representatives of marked ability. From about the close of the Civil war until 1910 Clarence A. Buskirk was the acknowledged leader of the Princeton bar. He had a keen instinctive sense of justice, a resourceful mind, great learning and a classic eloquence. When but a young man he was twice elected attorney-general of the State of Indiana. He is still living. James E. McCullough, now of Greenfield, Indiana, practiced law for many years at the city of Princeton. He was a remarkable advocate; fearless, forceful and tireless. While a resident of Gibson county he served four years in the state senate with marked distinction. For about fifteen years William E. Stillwell was one of the leading lawyers of the Princeton bar, and, prior to his location at Evansville, served with ability as state senator. Harvey Harmon, who is now practicing his profession in Princeton, served with ability in the last legislature. He, Sanford Trippett and Henry Kister and others are splendid representatives of Democratic citizens in Gibson county.

For a great many years the public schools in Gibson county have been presided over practically all of the time by Democratic superintendents. William T. Stillwell, father of the senator before referred to, was superintendent for more than twenty years. He was succeeded by Henry A. Yeager, who was known as one of the greatest school teachers of the county, and one of its distinguished attorneys. Thomas W. Cullen, 1918 a candidate for prosecuting attorney, John T. Ballard, and John L. Fulling, later of Philadelphia, and Leland Cunningham, the 1916 to 1918 incumbent, each added something of real worth to the splendid system of public schools of the county.

The Democracy of Gibson county was not very fortunate in electing representatives to congress. Its sons have been honored with a number of nominations, but none of them except Smith Miller was elected prior to 1920.

The representatives of many other families in the county have served in public office and have been honored with nominations by the party. Frequently the Husseys, Ziliaks, DePriests, O'Neals and many other earnest, enterprising representatives of Democratic families have been honored with nominations for public offices. Those that were elected and those that were nominated were but representative citizens of the great party to which they belong.

The Democracy of Gibson county is noted for the high class of its membership. Its intelligence, sobriety, and wealth are known to every one who is familiar with the life and history of that county.

Gibson county has been very well governed by officials of all political parties. There have been few officers that have been guilty of malfeasance in office.

The Republican strongholds are and always have been Princeton, Oakland City and Ft. Branch and communities immediately surrounding each one of these. Elsewhere the Democrats have been rather continuously in the majority. In the south part of the county and in the north and west the Democracy has been in control of the township governments. This was true even of the days when the large negro population of Princeton and the region immediately west thereof enabled our Republican friends to prevail. The town of Owensville, in Montgomery township, has presented a phenomenal changeableness. At first heavily Democratic, the Grangers assimilated a large number of Democrats. A few years after the Granger wave subsided the entire movement in that township practically went over to the Democracy. Again the same community was largely engulfed in the wave of Populism that spread over the county in 1894 to 1900. The body of that movement at its inception was composed of prominent Democrats. In the end, when the Populistic wave subsided, practically the whole body became Democratic and joined the Democracy. In that community, one of the richest and most intelligent in the state, it appears that the people have been unusually susceptible to political vagaries. Since Populism has run its course that great prosperous community has presented a very large Democratic majority.

In the time of the Civil war the Democrats of Gibson county furnished a large body of men to the Union army. Among the leaders of these were Capt. W. T. Stillwell, John Turnage, James H. Paul, Hugh Hussey and many others. Many of those who came as pioneers to the hills and valleys of Gibson county were adherents of the Democratic party. Their sons and grandsons have been reared in the same faith. The tolerant spirit of the Democratic party invited to its folds a large number of immigrants who came to this country from the nations of Europe—Germany,

England and Ireland. The great mass of foreign-born citizens and descendants of the same have been members of the Democratic party. While teaching at all times sobriety, sound morality and industry, the spirit of Democracy has been rather generous. At the outbreak of the world's conflict in Europe, and even when this nation entered into the struggle, so kindly did our foreign-born citizens feel toward the Democratic party and toward their country as a whole that the percentage of foreign-born citizens and their descendants who were sympathizers of the German empire was perhaps smaller than the percentage of any such citizens in any adjoining communities.

Looking backward over the life of the county for a period of three-quarters of a century or more it is manifest that the work and the record of the Democratic party both through its citizenship and its public officials has not only been a vast influence in the community, but that the influence of the party has been helpful.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF GRANT COUNTY

THE student of political history and events, especially if that student be of the Jeffersonian school, might conclude, after analyzing the election returns of Grant county for the past sixty years, that this is one political community long gone past redemption. That it has driven headlong to the demnition bow-bows with nary a chance to help in making the country safe for Democracy.

Democrats of Grant county will be the last to ever concede such a thing as even being near the truth, although they do admit, once in a while, when considering fresh returns, that outsiders may have some basis for their suspicions.

There is, in fact, no place in the state of Indiana where the Democrats, the trench boys, the fellows who love a good scrap, are better organized than in Grant.

The party organization centers in the Jefferson club, one of the livest political bodies in the state, and it has at least kept the Republicans busy as bird dogs holding on to what lead they possess.

The county was not organized until 1831, but away back yonder when the Democratic party was young, when the followers of Thomas Jefferson were full of that enthusiasm which makes any organization flourish (and which gingery characteristics, by the way, still make Democrats conspicuous and different from ordinary men in politics), men who came west and landed in the territory later known as Grant county brought their Democracy with them. It stuck with them and with their boys through many campaigns that are historic.

The "pep" and the sincere belief of these sturdy pioneers in the righteousness of their political belief impelled them to an enthusiasm which convinced a substantial majority of their neighbors and fellow citizens. At least, if results are any indication and good enough to be accepted in the early days, as they are forced to acceptance in more recent times, this must be conceded as true.

While participating in the politics of Delaware county, of which the Grant territory was originally a part, this Democratic tendency and influence was decidedly a factor in determining results. Becoming a county to themselves, they were ready for self-government on Democratic lines.

An election of any sort in the thirties and forties was just about as sure, or a little more certain to return a Democratic majority than it was later to sustain the Republican party.

Among the pioneer Democrats it is interesting in history to preserve the names of a few, the influence of their families still being felt here and in other parts of the state. Among them were James Sweetser, Dr. James Shively, James F. McDowell, Andrew J. Harlan, Col. Asbury Steele, Wiley Wood, George Strange, Samuel R. Thompson, Frank and James Thompson, and Henley James.

When the slavery agitation became so intense that the Civil war appeared a thing that could not be avoided, and during the war and since, some of these left the Democratic party, as must have been the case in order to show the changed results, and became Republicans. They had never belonged to the Whig party.

In the 1840 campaign, when Harrison and Taylor were being accorded most of the votes of the West, regardless of political lines, it being a contest of the East against the West, Van Buren and Johnson lost Grant county, receiving 391 votes, against 470 for Harrison and Tyler, the general Whig favorites.

In 1844, Polk, the Democratic nominee, restored the party to the Democrats, receiving 423 votes, while Clay, the Whig candidate, was given 353. The third party that year, known under the title of "Liberty," received 197 votes. The voters of Grant county have always been an independent lot when it came to third party movements or in their local campaigns.

In 1848 the Democratic candidate for president received 623 votes, against the Republican nominee, who had 325. Van Buren, the Free Soil candidate in that year, was given 359, leading the Whigs.

Four years later, in 1852, Pierce, the Democratic nominee, had 811 votes, against Scott, his Whig opponent, who had 620.

Then came the change, in 1856. About the only thing in the campaign following that to attract special attention has been the growth in the Republican majorities. That was the first campaign of the Republican party. Buchanan and Breckinridge headed the Democratic ticket with 1,035 votes, while Fremont and Dayton, the Republicans, had 1,395.

In 1860, with the country on the verge of war, Abraham Lincoln was given 1,668 votes, against 1,223 for Stephen A. Douglas.

In 1864 the Republican majority was not so large, but was perfectly safe, Lincoln receiving 1,547, against 1,238 for McClellan, the Democratic nominee.

From that time forward, with the population of the county growing, a larger portion of the increase has been counted in the Republican column, both in the presidential elections and in the selection of governors and other state officials.

The independence of Grant county voters is well illustrated in the local county campaign and in the city of Marion in 1913.

In the presidential election in 1912 Woodrow Wilson, Democratic nominee, received 4,390 votes; W. H. Taft, Republican, 3,939; Theodore Roosevelt, Progressive, 2,185. In the county election the same year, although there was no county Progressive ticket, "Uz" McMurtrie, nominee for treasurer, was the only Republican elected.

In the Marion city election in 1913 there were five candidates for mayor. James O. Batchelor was the Progressive candidate, receiving 1,722 votes, and having a plurality of 466; W. A. McKown was the Socialist candidate with 1,256 votes; the Democrats came third with A. E. Gibson as their candidate, receiving 1,202 votes; Republicans were fourth with John O. Wilson, carrying 1,032 votes; James Rowan, on a ticket all by himself and designated as Independent, had 162 votes. The name of the Progressive party in that campaign was simply a convenience for indicating independence, and the dominant party was forced into fourth place. It was only on occasions of this kind, and where Republicans had made notoriously bad nominations, that the Democratic party in county and city campaigns was able to achieve any general victory since the great change came in the campaign of 1856.

The Jefferson club, however, long continued one of the thriving political organizations of the state. Similar organizations of the sort in other counties would mean an eternal recording of Democratic victories. Its efficient work, however, has resulted, naturally, in compelling a strong opposition from both Republicans and Socialists, the latter being for several years a quantity that must be reckoned with in all Grant county campaigns.

In the campaign of 1916, with Wilson and Marshall candidates for president and vice-president, and with John A. M. Adair candidate for governor, the party fared better than in almost any year since 1860. In the years preceding, when the Republican majorities were averaging from 1,000 to 4,000, and even more, the Democratic presidential ticket received 5,827 votes, against 6,059 for the Republicans. Adair, the Democratic candidate, had 5,626 votes, against 6,049 for James P. Goodrich, the Republican nominee.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF GREENE COUNTY

GREENE COUNTY was organized January 3, 1821, and named for General Nathaniel Greene of Revolutionary fame.

The county is bounded on the north by Clay and Owen; on the east by Monroe and Lawrence; on the south by Martin, Daviess and Knox counties; the west by Sullivan. The county is a parallelogram, being thirty miles east and west, and eighteen north and south. It is crossed from north to south by the west fork of White river, dividing the county into two nearly equal parts.

The western half is mostly rolling prairie and drained marsh land of great fertility. There are extensive coal fields in this region underlying the entire western part of the county. The veins are four in number, and vary in thickness from three and one-half to eight feet. The eastern half of the county is very rolling, and contains much coal, iron ore and minerals. The land is excellent for grazing purposes, and noted for its fine fruits of all varieties, there having been more than 25,000 barrels of apples shipped from various points during the year of 1915.

The county has a population of 36,873 and has many thriving cities and towns, of which Linton is the largest, having a population of about 7,000, and located in the heart of the Greene county coal fields. Jasonville is situated in the northwest corner of the county, with a population of 4,000, and also has extensive fields of coal, which here reaches its greatest thickness.

Worthington has a population of 2,000, and is situated in the White river valley, in the center of a fine agricultural and stock-raising community.

Lyons is situated in the marsh land region with a population of about 1,500. Here the land reaches its greatest fertility.

Bloomfield, the county seat, has a population of about 3,000, and is located one mile east of White river, and is the manufacturing center of the county.

There are three railroads crossing the county from north to south and two from east to west, with branch lines radiating to the various mines and other industries. The county is entirely out of debt and had on deposit in the various banks on December 31, 1915, $151,406.22. The receipts for the year were $816,462.12.

POLITICAL HISTORY.

The political history of the county dates from its organization, January 3, 1821; however, much of it is obscure, as no complete records were kept of the early actors. The records show that on January 5, 1821, commissions were issued to the following officers: Thomas Bradford, sheriff; Eli Dixon, coroner; John Stockley, surveyor; Cornelius Westfall, seminary trustee—all of whom were Democrats appointed by the governor. At an election held at the house of Thomas Bradford, one mile south of Bloomfield, the following officers were elected and sworn in March 6: Norman W. Pearce and John L. Buskirk, associate judges; Thomas Warnick, clerk; George Shroyer, recorder. Shroyer did not qualify. The duties of his office were performed by Mr. Warnick, who was commissioned as clerk for seven years. Each officer swore he had in no way been concerned in dueling. These were also Democrats, and the county remained solidly Democratic until 1868 when Grant defeated Seymour by 73 votes, making a gain over the Democrats since the election of 1864 of 376 votes, McClellan having defeated Lincoln by 303 votes. In 1872 Grant defeated Greeley by 363 votes. In 1876 Tilden defeated Hayes by 96 votes. In 1880 the county fell back into the Republican ranks.

STATE SENATORS.

After the organization of Greene county it was placed in a senatorial district with Sullivan, Vigo, Owen and Parke counties, Thomas H. Blake being its first senator, who served until 1822. He was succeeded by John Jencks, 1822-25. Then Putnam county was added to the district, which was represented by John M. Coleman from 1825 to 1826. During his term Hendricks, Morgan, Owen, Montgomery, Vermilion and Clay counties were added. David H. Maxwell was chosen senator, 1826-30. During his term all the counties were dropped from the district except Greene, Owen and Monroe. James Whitcomb was chosen senator 1830-36; David M. Dobson, 1836-44; Monroe now being dropped, John F. Allison, 1844-47; Lovell H. Rousseau, 1847-50; Jesse J. Alexander, 1850-58; Jason N. Connelly, 1858-63; George W. Moore, 1863-67; John Humphreys, 1867-71; Wiley E. Dittmore, 1871-75; Andrew Humphreys, 1875-77; Owen now being dropped and Daviess added, David J. Hefron, 1877-83; Jacob F. McIntosh, 1883-86; Daviess now being dropped and Sullivan added to Greene, L. P. Mullinix, 1886-90; Chas. T. Akin, 1890-94; Andrew Humphreys, 1894-98; Sullivan now being dropped and Monroe and Brown added, Edwin Con, 1898-1902; Cyrus E. Davis, 1902-06; Brown now being dropped and Owen added, Oscar E. Bland, 1906-

10; Joseph Moss, 1910-14; Henry Humphreys, 1914.

STATE REPRESENTATIVES.

Hugh Barnes, 1822, was the first representative of the district composed of Greene, Owen and Morgan counties; Eli Dixon, 1823; David Harris, 1824; John Sims, 1825; (Clay was now added) Eli Dixon, 1826; (Clay was now dropped and Owen added) Thomas F. G. Adams, 1827; John M. Young, 1828; Eli Dixon, 1829; James Galletly, 1830; (Owen now dropped) George Baber, 1831; Drury B. Boyd, 1832; John P. Storm, 1834; Drury B. Boyd, 1837; John F. Allison, 1838; James S. Freeman, 1840; John F. O'Neill, 1841; Lovell H. Rousseau, 1844; John Jones, 1846; Stephen Lockwood, 1847; Richard H. Rousseau, 1848; Andrew Humphreys, 1849; A. Ham, 1851; John W. Ferguson, 1853; Andrew Humphreys, 1857; E. H. C. Cavins, 1858; William G. Moss, 1861; John M. Humphreys, 1863; Thomas Mason, 1867; James A. Minnick, 1871; John R. Isinhower, 1872; M. C. Fulk, 1875; James R. Baxter, 1877; Jacob P. McIntosh, 1881; A. S. Helm, 1882; John D. Alexander, 1887; William N. Darnell, 1889; Richard Huffman, 1891; Thomas Van Buskirk, 1893; Howard Bucher, 1895; Charles E. Henderson, 1897; Wilbur A. Hays, 1899; Cyrus E. Davis, 1901; William J. Hamilton, 1903; C. C. cases on the docket, both of which were dismissed. John L. Buskirk was allowed two dollars ($2.00) salary for one year's service. In February, 1822, the next term was held at the same place by Thomas Bradford and John L. Buskirk, associate judges. Addison Smith was prosecuting attorney. At this term Robert Anderson was naturalized, he being the first in Greene county. The August term was held by William Wick, as presiding judge, and Thomas Bradford, associate judge, at the court house in Burlington, the county seat at that time. The March term, 1823, was held by William Wick, presiding judge, and Martin Wines, associate judge. Smith Elkins was prosecutor. At this term Richard Huffman was fined thirty-seven and one-half cents for fighting. The May term, 1824, was held by Jacob Call, presiding judge, and Bradford and Wines, associates. At the October term John R. Porter was presiding judge with the same associates. The May term, 1825, was held at Bloomfield, Judge Call presiding, with John Law prosecuting attorney, which place he held until 1830. Judge Porter was presiding judge of the October term, which place he held until 1830. This year, Wm. B. Morris appeared as associate judge.

In the year 1826 Levi Fellows and Robert Smith appeared as associate judges. There was no change in the officers for two years. At the June term, 1829, Samuel R. Cavins appeared as associate judge.

Probate Court.

Willis D. Lester was the first probate judge and held the office until 1843; was elected again in 1849 and held the office until the court was abolished, in 1853.

Circuit Court.

In 1830 John Law was elected by the legislature judge of circuit court, E. M. Huntington prosecutor, each for a term of seven years. At the October term G. W. Johnson acted as presiding judge (Judge Law having legislated out of the circuit). Norman W. Pierce appeared as associate judge, succeeding Judge Fellows. In 1832 Emory Kinney appeared as presiding judge and held the office for five years. John Robison succeeded Judge Pierce as associate judge.

In 1834 William S. Cole succeeded Judge Robison and Judge Bradford again appeared as associate judge. David McDonald appeared as prosecuting attorney at one term and John Cowgill at the other. In 1837 E. M. Huntington appeared as presiding judge and remained for two years. In 1838 Judge Fellows appeared as associate judge to take the place of Judge Cole, whose term of office had expired. During this period David McDonald seems to appear more frequently as prosecuting attorney; however, the record seems somewhat confused and shows that C. P. Hester and D. R. Eckles sometime appear as prosecuting attorney.

In 1839 David McDonald appeared as judge and John S. Watts as prosecuting attorney, McDonald remaining in office until 1852. In 1841 L. B. Edwards and Joel B. Sexson were associate judges. In 1843 John R. Stone was probate judge and William G. Quick was prosecuting attorney for the two years following. In 1845 Craven B. Hester was made prosecutor and served until 1849. This year Augustus L. Rhodes was elected prosecuting attorney and Jesse Rainbolt associate judge, and continued in office until it was abolished. Judge William D. Lester was elected probate judge this same year.

At the September term, 1851, William M. Franklin appeared as prosecuting attorney and held that office until 1853. This year James Hughes appeared as judge of the circuit court—the first judge elected by popular vote in this circuit.

There have been in the history of Greene county only two Republican judges and two Republican prosecuting attorneys. At the present time—every officer in Greene county, both elective and appointive, with the exception of representative, is a Democrat.

Some Eminent Members of Bar.

James Whitcomb was admitted in 1822; afterward was governor of the state of Indiana.

John Law, admitted 1823; afterward judge of circuit court and served several terms in Congress.

Tilghman A. Howard, admitted 1831; afterward went to Congress and was Democratic candidate for governor.

In 1833 Paris C. Dunning and Delana R. Eckles were admitted. Dunning later was governor of state and Eckles judge of same court. This year David McDonald also was admitted. He also became judge of the same court and later judge of the district court of the United States and author of "McDonald's Treatises." In 1836 William A. Gorman was admitted; afterward colonel in the Mexican war, general in the Civil war, member of Congress and governor of Minnesota.

Wm. Huntington was admitted in 1837; afterward appointed judge of the district court of the United States.

In 1839 Richard W. Thomson, George G. Dunn and John S. Watts were admitted. R. W. Thomson afterwards was member of Congress and Secretary of Navy. George G. Dunn served several terms in Congress. John Watts was appointed federal judge of New Mexico, where he remained during his life.

In 1841 Lovell H. Rousseau located at Bloomfield and was admitted to practice; was captain of a company of soldiers in the Mexican war; was promoted to major general in the Civil war; served one term in Congress, and at the time of his death was brigadier general in the regular army. In 1844 S. H. Buskirk was admitted and afterward was one of the ablest judges of the supreme court.

In 1849 Wm. M. Franklin was admitted. He afterward was prosecuting attorney, judge of common pleas and circuit courts, and commissioner of supreme court. Augustus L. Rhodes also was admitted this year; afterward was judge of the supreme court of California for sixteen years.

In 1851 W. P. Hammond was admitted, and afterward was governor of the state; also Daniel McClure, who later became secretary of state and afterward assistant paymaster-general in the army.

J. B. Usher was admitted 1852; later became Secretary of the Interior in President Lincoln's Cabinet.

James Hughes was elected judge of the circuit court in 1853. He was the first judge elected by popular vote. Afterward was elected to Congress; was appointed judge of court of claims by President Buchanan. In this year Andrew Humphreys, the "Dean of Democracy" in Greene county, was admitted. He served in both branches of the Legislature and was elected to Congress. In 1858 J. M. Hanna resigned as judge of circuit court, having been elected judge of the supreme court.

BLOOMFIELD DEMOCRAT.

The Bloomfield Democrat dates its origin from 1860. However, it was known as the Greene County Times until 1864, when its name was changed to the Southern Indianian, with the motto: "The Constitution as it is. The Union as it was."

In 1867 its name was changed to the Bloomfield Democrat, which name it still bears. The first editor was E. E. Rose, who edited the paper until 1861. James E. Riley was editor from 1861 till November, 1862, when Henry B. Wools took charge of the paper with success till November, 1863. E. B. Barnard and James C. Nabb jointly edited the paper till 1864. Then Mr. Barnard became sole editor and manager, and continued the publication until January, 1866, when Clark B. Humphreys became editor until March, 1867, when James E. Riley again became editor and changed the name to Bloomfield Democrat. In 1868 J. R. Isenhower became editor and was succeeded in November, 1868, by Ogle & Leek, who continued to edit the paper till 1873, when the management was secured by W. P. Stropes, who conducted the paper with considerable success till July, 1880. William M. Moss took charge until 1882, when he leased the paper to W. L. Slinkard and G. H. Hendren, who conducted it till 1895, when it was taken charge of by C. E. Davis and W. V. Moffett, who edited same till 1897. Then the paper was sold to ——— Barron, who in turn sold to R. McNeil, he selling the same to G. H. Hendren in 1909. Mr. Hendren managed the paper till 1910, when he was succeeded by H. W. Moore, who edited the same till 1911, when W. L. Slinkard became sole editor and proprietor.

The Democrat has been a power in politics since its advent, always being true to the party principles, as well as being the newsiest paper ever edited in the county.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF HAMILTON COUNTY

By Hugh Anthony Maker

WRITING the history of the Democratic party of Hamilton county is a task similar to the one that devolved upon St. Paul when he was called upon to define "Faith." St. Paul defined "Faith" as "The substance of things hoped for; the evidence of things not seen."

The history of the Hamilton county Democracy for the last 60 years is but the annal of a succession of defeats of as noble and self-sacrificing an aggregation of men as ever labored for the enforcement of what they thought to be right and best for the commonwealth in which they lived.

The Democratic history of Hamilton county naturally divides itself into two distinct periods, namely, "the ante-bellum" and the "post-bellum" periods.

It is a tradition that the time was when the Democrats of Hamilton county outnumbered their opponents four to one, but it is only tradition, as the oldest men and women now living cannot recall the time.

The history of the ante-bellum period is in a large measure legendary; nevertheless there are several characters that loom up bright and clear. The foremost of them all is William Conner, the "Father of Central Indiana," who was brought, a captive by the Indians, to where Hamilton county now is about the year 1806. He began his political career as treasurer of the county at its organization in 1823, and served in that capacity for about a year. He, with Elisha Long, represented a district composed of the counties of Henry, Madison, Hamilton and Hancock, and all of the territory north of those counties, from 1829 to 1831. He represented Hamilton and Boone counties and all of the territory north of Hamilton to the Miami Reserve (Tipton county was not then organized, and the territory referred to is what now forms the three southern townships of Tipton county), from 1831 to 1832. He again represented Hamilton county in the lower house of the Legislature for the years of 1831 and 1832; also represented Hamilton county in the same branch of the Legislature for the years of 1836 and 1837, and was one of the commissioners delegated by the Legislature to locate the county seat of Allen county and was instrumental in the selection of Ft. Wayne as the place.

Another figure of those far-off times was General John D. Stevenson, father of the late Judge R. R. Stevenson, who probably held more offices at the same time than any other man who ever lived in the county. He was clerk of the court from 1823 to 1836; recorder from 1823 to 1838, and auditor from 1823 to 1840. He received his title of general from being general of the militia, an honor he received at the hands of the governor of the State. During the last ten or twelve years of his life he affiliated with the Republican party, having broken with his party at the beginning, or shortly prior to the opening of, the Civil war.

William Conner's brother, John, who was made captive by the Indians at the same time that he was, and was treated in a similar manner to William, was the founder of Connersville, Ind. He was the father of William W. Conner and grandfather of the late Hon. John C. Conner, M. C., of the State of Texas, and represented Hamilton county in the Legislature of 1824, but did not long survive that period.

Another ante-bellum character was Dr. Griffith M. Shaw, sire of Dr. Albert Shaw, the present editor of the American Review of Reviews, at New York City, who represented the county in the lower house for the years of 1848 and 1849, but moved from Noblesville to Hamilton, Ohio, where he died in 1863 while lending aid to the Union cause. Dr. Griffith M. Shaw was always a Democrat, yet a strong Union man, and could go among the "Butternuts" of Butler county, Ohio, where no other Union man dared to go. Overwork for the cause threw him into a fever, of which he died.

Another ante-bellum Democrat was William Garver, whose first wife was the first white child born in Noblesville. His second wife was a daughter of James Brown Ray, governor of Indiana from about 1824 to 1830. He practiced law at the Hamilton county bar for more than fifty years; he was prosecutor for one term and state senator for the counties of Hamilton, Boone and Tipton from 1848 to 1852; made a Democratic race for Congress in 1856, but was defeated. The Buchanan administration cared for him as a "lame duck" and made him a special inspector of mails for the States of Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa and Minnesota at a salary of $5,000 a year. He was a delegate to the Democratic national convention at Charleston, S. C., in 1860, that nominated John C. Breckinridge for President, also the "rump" convention that met at Baltimore the same year and nominated Stephen A. Douglas. He enlisted in the Union army and went to the front as colonel of the 101st Indiana Volunteer Infantry. Upon his return from the war he was elected judge of the court of common pleas as a Republican and served in that capacity until the abolition of that court. He was elected to the Legislature in 1876, and was a candidate for the office of representative in 1890, but was defeated for the nomination. He died in the year 1895.

William W. Conner was a son of John Conner, the founder of Connersville, Ind. He was born at that village and was elected to the Legislature as soon as he reached his majority. He was of such youthful appearance that a doorkeeper, on seeing him in his seat in the House, went to him and politely informed him that "boys were not allowed in that place." Later, in bellum days, he was a Republican and was clerk of the court from 1859 to 1863, as well as a captain of "Home Guards" during that period. In 1874 he made a race for clerk upon a fusion ticket, a combination of Greenbackers and Democrats, and came within 83 votes of being elected, and then Governor Thomas A. Hendricks appointed him adjutant-general of the State of Indiana; he served in that capacity from 1874 to 1877. In 1880 he was again a Republican. One veteran in Hamilton county politics said of him at that time: "God don't know what Bill Conner will do in politics," and in that year he made the canvass for Robert Graham, now a member of Congress from Colorado, for state senator from the district composed of the counties of Hamilton and Tipton, in which Mr. Graham was successful. In 1882 he supported Walter N. Evans, Democratic candidate for clerk that year, and was one of his deputies; was a candidate for the nomination of clerk upon the Republican ticket in the year 1886 and made a splendid race. It might be observed that, as much as he changed his politics, he never lost the confidence of the public during his entire life, and was always regarded as being honest in his opinions. After his race for clerk in 1886 he became connected with the Noblesville Gas Company and remained with that company until his death.

During the Civil war there were probably 1,000 Democrats in Hamilton county, and at that time it was worth a man's life to proclaim himself as such; in short, they were so persecuted that no one would own to the fact.

When William H. Boswell began the publication of the Noblesville Independent in 1874 he told me with his own lips that there were about 1,200 Democrats in the county, yet no man would own up to it; they were merely opposed to the Republicans.

In ante-bellum days the Dales were prominent in Democratic politics in the county. Samuel Dale served in the Legislature in the early fifties. His sister was grandmother of the late Judge Theodore P. Davis and his son, Colonel Douglass Dale, was colonel of a Missouri regiment during the Civil war and later held a prominent government position at Washington, D. C.

One of the prominent Democratic families of Hamilton county was that of Aaron Cox, who lived in the county from an early date. Most of his sons were born in the county. He was postmaster of Noblesville during the administration of President Johnson. His son, Jabez S. Cox, was judge of the circuit court of Miami county; his son, Millard F., was judge of the criminal court of Marion county, while another son, Charles E., was judge of the supreme court of Indiana for a term of six years, retiring January 1, 1917.

Milton B. Hopkins, a preacher in the Christian church, who took part in one of the bitterest church quarrels ever staged in Noblesville, lived there during the fifties; was known to be a Democrat, but not a politician in any sense; was elected state superintendent of public instruction in 1872 over B. Wilson Smith, Republican, Mr. Hopkins and Governor Hendricks being the only Democrats elected upon the state ticket that year.

Joseph Messick was a prominent Democrat in Hamilton county before the Civil war; was postmaster of Noblesville just prior to and up to that period. One son, Benton Messick, emigrated to Minnesota and became colonel of the First Minnesota regiment during the Civil war and lost his life leading his regiment in the battle of Gettysburg, Pa. Another son, George Messick, was constable of Noblesville township for more than forty years; throughout all the while he was a Democrat and the township was overwhelmingly Republican, yet he continued to hold the office.

Silas Hare was born in Hamilton county and emigrated to the state of Texas when quite a young man; was colonel of a Confederate regiment during the Civil war; was judge of the circuit court of his district for one or two terms, and has served several terms as member of Congress from the Second Texas district. After he ceased to be Congressman he located in Washington, D. C., and was legal counsel for the state of Montana. His brother, Wesley Hare, always lived in Noblesville, throughout his lifetime a Democrat, and at his death had been in business longer than any one else in the city—something over fifty years. His son, Elbert M. Hare, made a race for the office of clerk of the court in 1886 upon the Democratic ticket, but was defeated; in 1896 he separated with his party upon the financial questions of that period and became a Republican and acted two or three campaigns as their county chairman, but later affiliated with the Progressive party; his present political attitude is probably unknown.

The true status of the conditions confronting the Democrats of Hamilton county since the close of the Civil war is best described in an excerpt from an oration prepared for the ratification of the re-election of President Wilson in 1916, and never delivered, which runs like this:

"Sixty years have not yet passed away since Hamilton county boasted of the banner Republican township of the United States—a township in which every vote, save one, was Republican. Nor has five and forty years sneaked into the past since white Republicans voted twice, and negroes roamed from polls to polls and voted as many times as they pleased, and Hamilton county rolled up her 3,600 Republican majority, while the Democrats were unable to get their ballots in the box.

"But time, the beautifier of the dead,

Adorner of the ruin, sole comforter,

And only healer when the heart hath bled,' hath wrought its miracle. Thanks to the sparing grace of God and the saving grave of Jesus Christ there are today, lingering upon the shores of time, or thrumming harps at the throne of grace, some forty old Democrats who are the proud rivals for the distinguished honor of having cast the one vote; and the township to which we referred has had a Prohibition trustee, and Hamilton county cast a plurality of her popular vote for the presidential electors in the glorious year of 1912, when, for the first time in over sixty years, the Democrats elected their entire county ticket; and but for the machinations of a small coterie seeking to monopolize the patronage, would have repeated the performance in 1914."

Lucius H. Emmons, a practical printer of Eastern birth, came to Noblesville in 1835, and immediately began the publication of a newspaper called The Newspaper. This paper was neutral in politics, the patronage was not large, and as an enterprise did not pay. He discontinued the publication in 1838 and left Noblesville, but returned in 1842 and began the publication of a weekly, called the Little Western, which was Democratic in politics. Its file, still in existence, began with the issue of June 4, 1842, and ended with the issue of January 25, 1845, and as a paper did duty for the Democratic party during the strenuous campaign of 1844. The influence that he and his paper wielded must have done yeoman service for the party, as evidenced by the fact that during the James K. Polk administration Mr. Emmons received a clerkship at Washington, D. C., and resided there until 1850, when he returned to Noblesville. A few days after the arrival of himself and family in Noblesville he was stricken and died of Asiatic cholera. His widow later married a Mr. Longley and became the mother of the first fire marshal of Indiana, W. E. Longley, who was district chairman of the 9th Congressional district during the campaigns of 1910, 1912, 1914, and in 1912 was political manager for Samuel M. Ralston, successful candidate for governor, and his son, Lucius H. Emmons, Jr., has held a place in the government printing office at Washington for about forty years.

Notwithstanding that for a few years after the Civil war the stuffing of ballot-boxes and "beating up" of unoffending Democrats were considered to be prima facie evidence of a Republican's fitness for county office, and the persecution everywhere beset the Democrats, yet the Democracy of Hamilton county has not been without her triumphs. When Republicans began cheating each other at primaries, ballot-box stuffing ceased; when the Prohibition party grew strong enough to have representatives upon the election board, things changed. For instance, at Westfield in 1884, the first time the Prohibitionists had representatives on the board at that place, there were about fifty Democratic votes polled, when prior to that time for many years but one vote had been reported. It may be observed at this time that Westfield in slavery days was an ideal station upon the "underground railroad," whose operations (notwithstanding the repugnance of slavery) were contrary to law, and the youth of that place grew up entertaining the idea that mere caprice was superior to law. As a consequence three county officers and one state auditor—all Republicans—who were reared at that place "have 'went' wrong."

In 1876, with the assistance of the "Greenbackers," Peter Cardwell was elected to the state senate from the counties of Hamilton and Tipton, and his vote was very material to the election of Joseph E. McDonald to the United States Senate.

In 1878, William W. Rooker was elected as joint representative from Hamilton and Tipton counties. Mr. Rooker has a somewhat interesting personal history. He was born about one mile east of the Indiana state fairground, where from his eighth to tenth year he had General Lew Wallace as a boyhood playmate. It was his boast that "I could lick him when I was a boy," but he added further that "General Lew Wallace is now a great man and I am nothing."

In 1882 Mr. Rooker made a race in the Ninth Indiana District for Congress against Thomas B. Ward of Lafayette, he receiving 81½ votes in the convention to Mr. Ward's 82½ votes, and a majority was required to nominate. He told me once, confidently, that he was told by political workers of his county that there were two delegates for sale and their price was $100 each, and he turned down the proposition with the remark, "If I cannot win fair I do not wish to win at all," and added, "I believe that my opponent must have purchased those votes."

The last act of his life was to go to the polls in 1896 and cast his vote for William J. Bryan for the presidency.

Another character of importance was Francis M. Householder. He was elected prosecutor of the district of the Twenty-fourth Judicial Circuit when it consisted of Madison and Hamilton counties, and he served one term. In June, 1881, he was elected county superintendent of public instruction of Hamilton county, for the reason that Rev. A. H. Morris, upon whom it was desired to bestow the honor, had not been a resident of Hamilton county for the year required by law to qualify a person to election to that position. When Mr. Morris' disability was removed, Mr. Householder resigned and Mr. Morris was elected to fill the vacancy. Under the first administration of Grover Cleveland, Mr. Householder became postmaster of Noblesville. His health failing, he resigned this position, and, after lingering some years as an invalid, passed away.

Another great character of that age was Judge David Moss. He was an attorney at the Hamilton county bar for over forty years; represented Hamilton county in the Legislature from 1853 to 1855. Once or twice he was a candidate for the Democratic nomination of attorney-general of the state. In 1884 he was nominated and elected Judge of the Twenty-fourth Judicial Circuit, consisting of Hamilton and Madison counties. He served his term of six years and died soon after his retirement.

Probably the greatest political character of which the Democracy of Hamilton county can boast was the late Walter N. Evans, who was originally a Whig, later a Republican, and in 1874 began to affiliate with the Democratic party. In 1882, when the majority of Hamilton county was somewhere near fifteen hundred Republican, he was nominated as a Democrat, and elected clerk of the court of Hamilton county. Aside from holding the position of clerk, he held no other office, and yet he had a great influence in the Democratic councils of the state and county.

Another character was Francis M. Trissal. Commonly known as Frank Trissal, he was born in Montgomery county, Ohio, on the 30th day of September, 1847, and came to Miami county, Indiana, with his parents in 1850, where, under the instruction of his father, who was a Hoosier schoolmaster, he received a common school education. In 1865 he became a deputy clerk in the Hamilton circuit court in the office of his uncle, John Trissal, who was a Republican, and with whom he disagreed politically. At that time there were less than a thousand Democrats in the county, and they were unorganized; in fact, they were treated with a most brutal intolerance and had to keep quiet. Using Mr. Trissal's own words, "I do not think they had any organization during the war, but Judge David Moss and Judge Earl S. Stone were classed as leaders and (falsely, perhaps) accused of being 'Copperheads.'" In 1866, when ex-President Johnston "swung around the circle" in a speaking campaign defending his reconstruction policies, which resulted in his attempted impeachment, Mr. Trissal became one of his followers and a pronounced Democrat, and a few years later became chairman of the Democratic party. In 1873 the old court of common pleas was abolished by the Legislature and new judicial circuits were created, the counties of Hamilton and Madison forming a circuit, and, being the only Democratic attorney in the county, except David Moss, he was honored by Governor Hendricks by the appointment of prosecuting attorney; he was a candidate for election to the same position the next campaign, but was defeated. These are the words Mr. Trissal used: "It was my privilege to do about as I pleased in managing campaigns, and I was classed as being a 'boss.' I attended all state conventions as a self-appointed delegate and voted the county about as I pleased, and it is among my pleasant recollections that I first met John B. Stoll in the convention of 1870, and was an active supporter of his when he was nominated auditor of state in 1872. The party gained some in respectability from about that time on, because it got some good life-blood from former Republicans. Our number gradually grew until finally, in 1882, we were able to elect Walter N. Evans clerk of the circuit court." Mr. Trissal was Democratic chairman until 1886; in 1888 he was active in politics, but it was the last year in which he participated in Hamilton county affairs, he having moved from the county to Chicago, where he became principal attorney for a railroad entering Chicago. Mr. Trissal now lives in Chicago, but has a large farm near Laporte, Ind., and also maintains a partnership in the law office of Darrah, Roley & Trissal at that place.

Another post-bellum character was Judge Theodore P. Davis, who was born near Westfield, in Hamilton county, in 1855. He began life as a school teacher; later he studied law with Moss & Trissal, and was admitted to the bar in 1876; was actively engaged in the practice of law, and incidentally in politics, until 1890, when he was nominated judge of the circuit court, making so creditable a race that in 1892 he was brought out on the evening of the day before the state convention for judge of the appellate court, nominated and elected that year, serving a term of four years upon that bench. After he left the appellate bench he moved to Indianapolis and formed a partnership with Frank E. Gavin, and conducted the practice of law there until his death, in 1907. At the time of his death he was Democratic chairman of Marion county.

The newspaper representing the Democratic party of Hamilton county was the paper referred to in the reference to Mr. Emmons; and later, in about 1874, William H. Boswell started a paper purporting to be independent, and called the Noblesville Independent. It was in reality a "Greenback," and anti-Republican paper. He continued to publish it as an independent paper until 1880, when it became a Democratic paper, and he later changed its name to the Noblesville Democrat, and so conducted it until 1900, when he sold the good will of the paper to R. M. Isherwood, who conducted it during the campaign of 1900, and later on sold it to some parties from Michigan, who published it for some months and then abandoned it, when Mr. Isherwood returned and directed it for some time. The paper was then sold to James M. Fippen, commonly known as "Calamity Jim," who conducted the paper for about a year, and just prior to the campaign of 1904 sold it to Dawilla Spaneth, who made its policy independent. It was later sold to a syndicate and became the Noblesville Enterprise, and went into the hands of a receiver, later being sold to E. E. and C. F. Neal, and was finally merged into the Noblesville Ledger, the leading Republican paper of the county.

Just prior to the campaign of 1904 W. H. Roney purchased the Atlanta Times, at Atlanta, Ind., and placed it in the hands of Colonel D. K. Taylor, the veteran editor and newspaper man, who was a somewhat peculiar character. He was a Virginian by birth and was related by blood to Zachary Taylor, twelfth President of the United States. He was also related to Mrs. Jefferson Davis, the wife of the President of the Confederacy; also the late Robert L. Taylor, United States Senator from Tennessee. He was for several years telegraph editor of the old Indianapolis Sentinel and as a compositor, worked for some time on the Louisville Courier-Journal, being one of the first to operate a Mergenthaler linotype, the Courier-Journal being the second newspaper in the country to install the linotype. As a journeyman newspaper man he had charge of Colonel Keller's printing office at Tusculumbia, Ala., when the Colonel celebrated his nuptials, incident to his marriage to the mother of the renowned Helen Keller, the celebrated deaf, dumb and blind girl.

Colonel Taylor for a while conducted the Times at Atlanta, but in the spring of 1904 he moved the paper to Noblesville, where he controlled it for some two or three years, until Mr. Roney, becoming involved in financial difficulties, was compelled to sell the paper. It was then purchased by O. H. Downey of Churubusco, Ind., who was a candidate for statistician upon the Democratic ticket of 1896, who, after conducting the paper for something over a year, sold it to R. Philip Carpenter, who later became postmaster of Noblesville under the first administration of Woodrow Wilson, he in turn selling the paper to a company of which Mr. N. K. Harris was the representative; later the paper changed hands again and Mr. Harris' brother assumed control of the paper and is still publishing it.

The Democratic chairmen of Hamilton county since the Civil war are as follows: From the war to 1886, Francis M. Trissal; in 1888, John Durrflinger; 1890 and 1892, George W. Ingerman; in 1894, Julius Joseph, and Daniel Gascho, who near the middle of the campaign succeeded Joseph; in 1896, J. W. Klotz; in 1898, George W. Ingerman, again; from 1900 to 1908, inclusive, Meade Vestal; in 1908, Fred H. Teshler; 1910 to 1914, inclusive, Phil J. Fariss; in 1916, M. L. Cardwell, who still has the honor.

The following from time to time have served as secretary: T. P. Davis, F. M. Householder, Charles D. Pottor, William A. Long, John M. Hays, A. W. Henderson, Irve Bowman and Daniel Presser.

The rise of the Hamilton county Democracy which culminated in the election of Meade Vestal, judge of the Hamilton circuit court, in 1908, and the election of the entire local ticket in 1912, began in the contest for the office of trustee in Delaware township in 1900, when, out of a vote of about 400, President McKinley carried the township by 97 votes and Richard J. Moffitt, Democratic candidate for trustee, won by 46 votes.

Factions arising and various elements combining in the Republican party, resulting in the formation of the Progressive party, gave the Democratic party a "walk-over" in 1912. But, because of the return of the Progressives to the Republican party and the dissatisfaction arising among Democrats from the disposition of the patronage after the election of 1912, in 1916 the opposition had returned to an old-time majority of about 1,500. In short, to be a Democrat in Hamilton county required some nerve and self-abnegation in days past, and it is the boast of the author of this sketch that men of Hamilton county are "Democrats from principle and not for revenue only."

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF HANCOCK COUNTY

HANCOCK COUNTY is located in the central part of Indiana. It is bounded on the west by Marion county. Greenfield, the county seat, is on the National Road, about twenty miles east of the city of Indianapolis. In size it is an average county of the State, being composed of 307 square miles and containing 196,480 acres. It was originally a part of Madison county, and was organized as a separate county in 1828 and named in honor of John Hancock, signer of the Declaration of Independence.

The industrial pursuits of the people are pre-eminently agricultural. The land is level or gently rolling. The soil is fertile and will produce in abundance any crop adapted to this climate. In fact, Hancock county is regarded by its people as the garden spot of the earth, and the sentiment prevails that whoever cannot "make it" on a farm here need not attempt farming elsewhere.

The county has a population of a little over 19,000. Greenfield, the only city, has a population of about 5,000. New Palestine, Wilkinson, Fortville and Shirley are incorporated towns with from 450 to 1,500 inhabitants, respectively, according to the census of 1910.

Politically, the county has for more than a half century had a strong Democratic majority. The county offices during this time have practically always been occupied by Democrats. In one election, 1886, the offices of auditor, clerk and recorder were lost by the Democrats, but with this exception the administration of the county affairs has been entrusted to Democratic officers. In only one township, Blue River, have the Democrats always been in the minority, and only twice has this township elected Democratic township trustees—James New in 1863 and Harry L. Fletcher in 1914. In each instance the opposing party was divided into two camps, thereby enabling the Democrats to elect their candidate. In Jackson township the Democrats have generally been considered the minority party, but the margin has always been so narrow that it has frequently been overcome by a careful selection of men in making up the Democratic ticket. The following Democratic township trustees have been elected in Jackson township:

| Burd Lacy | 1859 |
| Philip Stinger | 1867 |
| James B. Clark | 1871 |
| A. V. B. Sample | 1874 |
| James F. McClarnon | 1880 |
| A. V. B. Sample | 1882 |
| George C. Burnett | 1904 |

In Brandywine township the history of Democracy has been unbroken in local affairs. All of the township trustees have been Democrats. In Brown, Buck Creek, Center, Green, Sugar Creek and Vernon townships the administration of local affairs has been under the control of the Democratic party, with but very few interruptions, since the organization of the county.

DEMOCRATIC MASS CONVENTION, 1843

In an old copy of the Greenfield Reveille, published in April, 1845, we have possibly the oldest report of a political mass convention in the county. It was a Democratic convention, but the Reveille was a Whig newspaper, and, of course, the proceedings of the convention are made to appear as ridiculous as possible. It is worthy of notice, however, that even at that early date there was opposition within Democratic ranks to local delegate conventions. Following is the report:

"In accordance with a previous notice a mass convention was held on the 26th inst., the proceedings of which would no doubt be interesting to our friends generally and edifying to our readers.

"About 10 o'clock a. m. the untiring Democracy were seen emerging from the beech woods which surround our peaceful village. True, the woods were not entirely darkened by their numbers, yet every avenue leading to the neighborhood of Esquire Franklin's restaurant was not unbroken.

"On the arrival of a number from the country we heard an eternal warfare sworn against the proposal for a convention to nominate county officers—dissensions that at first view seemed incurable presented themselves from different points. Independence of opinion and action was asserted, and how well maintained will appear in the sequel. Against 2 o'clock the refractory portion being whipped into the traces, the Democracy retired to the court house. General Milroy being called to the chair, he endeavored to explain the object of the meeting, which he, however, failed to do to the satisfaction of some of his friends.

"On motion a committee of three were appointed, but their duties not explained. After some misunderstandings had been explained, the said committee was increased to five; again after another consultation it was thought best to have a committee from each township in the county. When the townships were called four were unrepresented. (Afterwards one or two were represented.) The committee were then ordered to retire, consult and report to the meeting. But when about retiring one of the committee, more thoughtful than the rest, called on the chair to know what they should report, as he had yet to learn what duties were assigned to the committee. The chair endeavored to explain by informing the committee that 'the enemy was abroad in the land,' that 'those levelers, the Whigs, were on the alert and must be kicked sky high!' (He did not call them public defaulters, as we awfully feared he would do in the warmth of his feelings.) He said he was a Democrat, commencing with the days of Jefferson, and was still a Democrat, and the committee could retire.

"The committee, although their duties did not seem explained by the chairman, retired to guess at them, we suppose.

"Whereupon Dr. Hervey moved, 'Dr. Cook make a remark.' Dr. Cook was excused for the time, and Dr. Hervey proceeded in effusing the most —. He is a whole menagerie, and kicks, pushes, strikes and everything else manfully. He brings to our mind that beautiful line of the poet: 'Bulls aim their horns and asses lift their heels.'

"He said that 'before the presidential election the Whigs were opposed to annexation,' but asks with an air of triumph, 'Where is now one found to oppose the admission of the State of Texas? If such an one could be found he could be laughed at till he put comic almanacs out of fashion.' We leave others to judge of his political discoveries. But he proceeded: 'No, Democracy, like the rolling stream' (casting up its filthy sediments) 'has an onward (progressive) course, and in fifty years there will be fifty united states.'

"The doctor is evidently a man of deep research. He spoke of Cæsar crossing the 'Rubico,' and of the 'navigable ocean,' asked where is the man in Indianner that would say he was a 'reprudreater'? (We thought of his friend Chapman, an avowed repudiator, but no difference, all discordant elements harmonize in the general name of Democracy!)

"W. H. Anderson, a gentleman particularly distinguished for advocating the sentiment 'that God is a Democrat,' and therefore wants his friends 'to be on the Lord's side,' was called on to address the meeting, but declined doing so.

"R. A. Riley was then called and responded in a short address, endeavoring to justify the acts of violence done to the people's will and a total disregard of their rights by the State Senate in staving off the U. S. senatorial election.

"A series of resolutions were introduced by Esquire Riley, proposing to hold a convention on the first Saturday in June to nominate county officers, which were adopted.

"We, however, discovered some of the old and anti-progressive Democrats whose arms and voices were raised in opposition to this proceeding. One of them explained the 'Almighty made everything else, but never made a convention' to dictate. They were opposed to it because it was anti-Democratic because it was dictating to and whipping Democrats into the traces contrary to their better judgment. They were opposed to it because two individuals assumed to control the whole matter, made every motion of importance, and that with an eye to their own particular interests—because the county was not represented; whole townships being without a voice in the matter, and at no time more than sixty persons present, including Whigs, Abolitionists and little boys; because two individuals acting in concert for their mutual interest, should not dictate to, control and rule at pleasure seven hundred freemen!

"But our opinion is that the Democracy will hold a secret caucus and back out from this one-sided convention. It matters not, however, as the Whigs will make a clean sweep this year in Hancock. Chapman will crow no longer, although in his concluding remarks he offered the olive branch to the Whigs! We know how to meet that old arch-intriguer. We have not time for a further account this week. More anon."

Among the men who were active in the interests of Democracy in the very early days of the county Joseph Chapman should probably be named first. Joseph Chapman came to this county from Ohio in 1829. In 1832 he was elected county clerk and served his county as representative in the Lower House of the Legislature in 1837, 1839, 1840, 1842 and 1843. He was an astute politician, of magnetic personality, and a gifted speaker. He not only stumped this county in campaign after campaign, but with his oratorical power he rendered his party invaluable service in all parts of the State. The Democracy of Hancock county found efficient leadership in him, and it is difficult to estimate now how much the continued loyalty of the county to Democratic standards is due to his early enthusiasm and his untiring efforts in behalf of his party.

To Chapman belongs the honor of having given to the party its national emblem, the rooster. It was in the campaign of 1840, after the financial panic in Van Buren's administration, when things looked gloomy for the Democracy of the country, that George Pattison, editor of The Constitution, a Democratic newspaper of Indianapolis, heard of a serious defection from the Democratic ranks of Hancock county. He wrote William Sebastian, postmaster at Greenfield, and one of the Democratic leaders of the county, the following letter:

"Indianapolis, June 12, 1840.

"Mr. Sebastian:

"Dear Sir—I have been informed by a Democrat that in one part of your county thirty Van Buren men have turned for Harrison. Please let me know if such be the fact. Hand this letter to General Milroy. I think such a deplorable state of facts can not exist. If so, I will visit Hancock county and address the people relative to the policy of the Democratic party. I have no time to spare, but I will refuse to eat or sleep or rest so long as anything can be done. Do, for heaven's sake, stir up the Democracy. See Chapman; tell him not to do as he did heretofore. He used to create unnecessary alarms; he must crow; we have much to crow over. I will insure this county to give a Democratic majority of 200 votes. Spare no pains. Write instanter.

"GEORGE PATTISON."

This letter accidentally fell into the hands of the Whigs, who published it on June 16, 1840, in the Indianapolis Semi-Weekly Journal, the leading Whig newspaper in the State, for the purpose of ridiculing the Democrats. In this it failed utterly. "Crow, Chapman, crow!" became the slogan of the local Democracy in that campaign. It soon spread over the State, and when the Indiana State Sentinel, a Democratic State newspaper, was launched on July 21, 1841, it contained at the top of the front page the picture of a proud rooster and under the picture the words, "Crow, Chapman, crow!" The phrase caught the popular ear, and the rooster was soon adopted as the emblem of our great Democratic party. The story of our national emblem is full of interest and should be read by every loyal Democrat. Its fuller history, together with letters, photographs and newspaper clippings of the time, has been written and published in very artistic form by John Mitchell, Jr., of the William Mitchell Printing Company, of Greenfield, Ind. It is only fair to say of that loyal Democrat, Joseph Chapman, however, that he was just as patriotic and loyal to his country as he was to his party. For many years now he has rested in an unmarked grave on one of the battlefields of the Mexican war.

Among the wheel-horses of the Democracy of that time should be mentioned John Addison of Jackson township; Joseph Wright of Buck Creek township; William New of Blue River township; Benjamin F. Reeves of Brown township; Wellington Collyer of Brandywine township, and John Dye of Sugar Creek township. All of these men, and many others, were active in the interest of Democracy in that early day, and up until the time of the Civil war. True, party lines were not as closely drawn in the thirties and forties as they are now, and men who were well known over the county were elected to office regardless of party affiliations. In 1856, however, the county went solidly Democratic and remained Democratic until during the Civil war. With the Civil war came a new alignment of parties. The leadership of the old alignment of the Democratic party was left in the hands of such men as Thomas D. Walpole, George Atkison, Morgan Chandler, Berry W. Cooper, John C. Atkison, William New, James L. Mason and their co-workers, while a wing of the Democracy of the county, known as the War Democrats, or Union men, was led by David S. Gooding, Henry Swope, Lysander Sparks and others. The War Democrats allied themselves with others of their own political convictions and formed the Union party. In 1863 the Union party put a ticket into the field made up as follows:

For Auditor—Lysander Sparks, Democrat.

For Clerk—Henry Swope, Democrat.

For Treasurer—Nelson Bradley, Republican.

For Recorder—Amos C. Beeson, Republican.

For Sheriff—William Caldwell, Republican.

This ticket was elected. But with the close of the war all party factions disappeared. War Democrats and Democrats were again amalgamated into one Democracy, whose strength has always been such in this county that the nomination of its candidates has been equivalent to election. In 1896 the party aligned itself with much enthusiasm under the banner of William J. Bryan and ever since that time has given the principles enunciated by him the most ardent and loyal support.

During the Civil war period, and for many years prior thereto, David S. Gooding was one of the most prominent party leaders of the county. He was portly, of strong personality, an able lawyer and a powerful speaker. He was chairman of the County Democratic Central Committee from 1856 until 1863. As an orator he was in demand in all campaigns from Maine to California. As early as 1847 he represented his county in the lower branch of the State Legislature. In 1848 he was elected county prosecuting attorney. In 1852 he was elected common pleas judge, in 1856 state senator, and in 1861 was again elected common pleas judge. In 1866 he was appointed United States marshal for the District of Columbia, which position he held until 1869. Upon returning to his home at Greenfield he again became an active worker in the interests of Democracy and stumped the State in every campaign for another quarter of a century. Among the co-workers of Gooding in county politics during and immediately after the Civil war mention should be made of Henry Swope, who was the Democratic county chairman for a period of eight or ten years, who was also clerk of the common pleas court, and who was prominent as a Democrat and a citizen of this county for many years. Among others were Dr. Noble P. Howard, Sr.; Noble Warrum, Adams L. Ogg, Dr. S. A. Troy, E. H. Faut, Alex K. Branham and Jesse Allen.

Among the younger men who grew into prominence in the councils of the party after the Civil war Charles G. Offutt served his county with distinction in the Lower House of the State Legislature in 1872 and as judge of the Hancock circuit court, 1894-1900; Ephraim Marsh served as clerk of the Hancock circuit court, 1874-1882, was the Democratic county chairman for several years and was later secretary of the Democratic State Central Committee; Stokes Jackson, one of the most untiring Democratic workers in the county, was the Democratic county chairman for several years, was chairman of the State Democratic Central Committee and was sergeant-at-arms of the Lower House of Congress at the time of his death in July, 1912.

Among the Democrats now living who have been elected or appointed to positions of honor and trust are Edward W. Felt, on the appellate bench, and Omer S. Jackson, a deputy in the office of the Attorney-General, both of the State of Indiana. At present Mr. Jackson is chairman of the State Democratic Speakers' Bureau.

For more than a half century the party has had the advantage of a strong local press. During the fifties The Hancock Democrat was founded by a stock company with David S. Gooding as its editor. In 1859 William Mitchell, master printer and publisher, bought out all the stockholders and took full charge of the paper. Since that time the Democrat has remained in the family of the Mitchells. In 1876 John F. Mitchell, an elder son, after a long apprenticeship, assumed the management of the plant. In 1907 John F. Mitchell, Jr., entered the firm with his father, and they now own and publish the paper.

From the day that William Mitchell bought the establishment to the present its columns have been full of bristling Democracy. Under the efficient management of the Mitchells the Democrat is much quoted by other papers and is recognized as one of the leading Democratic papers of the State.

Another Democratic newspaper that was published in the county was The Jeffersonian. The first issue of The Jeffersonian was printed in June, 1878, by R. G. Strickland. The policy of the paper was well expressed in its name. Mr. Strickland remained its editor and proprietor until 1890, when he sold his interest to Eugene Lewis. Later the paper changed hands several times, and after 1897 it was published as The Herald. Its publication was discontinued in 1907.

Among the men who have directed the local policies of the party as chairman of the County Democratic Central Committee since 1860 are the following:

- 1860—J. A. Hall.
- 1861—Benjamin F. Caldwell.
- 1866—John W. Ryon.
- 1867—Alfred Potts.
- 1868—M. L. Paullus.
- 1868—Jacob Slifer.
- 1870—William Frost.
- 1870—Jacob Slifer.
- 1872—George Barnett.
- 1874—George Barnett.
- 1876—George Barnett.
- 1878—Morgan Chandler.
- 1880—Ephraim Marsh.
- 1882—Ephraim Marsh.
- 1884—Andrew Hagan.
- 1886—Andrew Hagan.
- 1888—U. S. Jackson.
- 1890—U. S. Jackson.
- 1892—I. A. Curry.
- 1894—E. W. Felt.
- 1896—George W. Ham.
- 1898—E. W. Felt.
- 1900—Charles J. Richman.
- 1902—George Crider.
- 1904—H. D. Barrett.
- 1906—Lawrence Wood.
- 1908—Lawrence Wood.
- 1910—Richard Hagans.
- 1911—Clint Parker.
- 1912—William Service.
- 1914—Thomas Seaman.
- 1916—R. L. Ogg.
- 1918—Plutarch Montrose.

The following are the men now entrusted with the administration of county affairs:

COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

- Roland Jessup, Eastern district.
- John Burk, Middle District.
- Pleasant T. Paush, Western district.
- Representative—George H. Cooper.
- Judge of Hancock Circuit Court—Earl Sample.
- Court Bailiff—Ed. Hope.
- Court Reporter—Charles Walker.
- Prosecuting Attorney—George L. Tindall.
- County Attorney—John Hinchman.
- Auditor—Harvey J. Rhue.
- Clerk—Horace E. Wilson.
- Treasurer—Thomas A. Seaman.
- Recorder—John T. Rush.
- Sheriff—John Mulvihill.
- County Assessor—Eli A. Parish.
- County Surveyor—Charles Boone.
- Coroner—J. B. Ellingwood.

County Health Commissioner—Dr. William H. Larrabee.

County Road Superintendent—Charles N. Warren.

County Superintendent of Schools—George J. Richman.

The following are the Township Trustees, who by virtue of an Act of the General Assembly of 1911, have continued in office for a term of six years:

Blue River Township, O. J. Coffin.
 Brandywine Township, William A. Scott.
 Brown Township, Ord Kuhn.
 Buck Creek, John F. Wallace.
 Center, Abram W. Frost.
 Green, Daniel J. Warrum.
 Jackson, William T. Orr.
 Sugar Creek, John Burkhart.
 Vernon, R. C. M. Smith.

All of the men named above except the Trustees of Blue River and Jackson Townships are Democrats. John F. Shelby and Clarence Luse have both resigned from the office in Buck Creek Township, and John F. Wallace finished the term.

The following men were elected to the office of Township Trustee and assumed the duties of the office on January 1, 1915:

Blue River, Harry L. Fletcher.
 Brandywine, Orlen F. Thomas.
 Brown, James A. VanDuyn.
 Buck Creek, William Humfleet.
 Center, Rufus Temple.
 Green, Walter A. Jackson.
 Jackson, Marshall N. Hittle.
 Sugar Creek, Scott Brandenburg.
 Vernon, William C. Vanlaningham.

All are Democrats except the Trustee of Jackson Township, who is a Republican. Though the county is strongly Democratic and the Republican Trustees are in the minority, the County Board of Education, composed of the Township Trustees and others, in the management of school matters and in the general execution of its duties is non-partisan. The Board considers all matters on their merits, and acts as a unit, without thought or consideration of politics, for the best interests of the schools.

BRYAN AND FREE SILVER.

Following the nomination of Bryan at Chicago in 1896 the Democracy of the county rallied enthusiastically to his support. Stokes Jackson was delegate to the national Democratic convention and was also a member of the "notification committee" that brought to Mr. Bryan the news that he had been nominated for the presidency by the Democratic party. No party in the county has ever given any candidate a more enthusiastic and more loyal support than the Democracy of the county has given to Mr. Bryan in each of his campaigns.

The Democrats of the county were thoroughly imbued with the idea of free silver, and on June 6, 1896, just a few days prior to the Center Township Democratic convention, copies of the following notice were sent to practically all of the Democratic voters of the township:

"Greenfield, Ind., May 30, 1896.

"Dear Sir—The township Democratic convention for the selection of delegates to the state, congressional, senatorial and joint representative conventions will be held at the court room in the city of Greenfield, on Saturday, June 6, 1896, at 2 o'clock p. m. You are earnestly requested to see your friends and neighbors and urge them to be present, as it is important on account of the action which is desired to be taken, instructing all delegates to vote for platform and candidates who are in favor of the restoration of silver to the position it occupied before its demonetization in 1873 by the Republican party. Free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 is the battle-cry of the Democracy for 1896. There is likely to be an effort made to carry the convention for a gold standard, but if all of the friends of silver attend this convention and do their duty silver will win the day.

"FRIENDS OF SILVER."

All the Democratic township conventions adopted resolutions during the summer of 1896 in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and the defeat of Mr. Bryan at the polls did not shake the faith of the county. "Sixteen to One" was affectionately remembered for many years and the "peerless leader" remained the idol of the party. Through the influence of Mr. Jackson Mr. Bryan was brought to Greenfield on July 27, 1899. Great preparations were made for his reception. The city was decorated, a large cannon was procured and it seemed that the entire county turned out en masse to hear him. He spoke at the fair-ground, and it was estimated that 20,000 people were present to hear the address. On June 22, 1903, Mr. Bryan again made two addresses at Greenfield, one on the east side of the court house and another at the opera house. On October 3, 1906, he spoke at Fortville, and then with a party came to Greenfield by automobile. The city was again decorated and an immense throng filled the streets on the east side of the court house to hear him. It is most likely true that Mr. Bryan has not had a more loyal county in the United States than Hancock.

A few Democrats in the county, including Ephraim Marsh, Judge Offutt and E. H. Faut, were opposed to Mr. Bryan's theory of "free silver" and supported the National Gold Democratic ticket. This ticket, however, polled only 15 votes in the county, of which 1 was in Brandywine, 8 in Center, 4 in Sugar Creek and 2 in Vernon.

In the ranks of the Democracy of the county today are many men whose faces have been familiar in the party's councils, and whose judgments have directed the local policies of the party through many years and through many battles. We cannot mention all of them, but no picture of a general Democratic meeting of this day at the county seat would be complete without the faces of Elbert Tyner, John Hayes Duncan, Michael Quigley, George W. Ham, William Elsbury, Isom Wright, Horace Wickard, John Manche, George Crider, Charles Barr, William H. Thompson, Matthew L. Frank, William A. Wood and others.

With these men who have labored unceasingly through the years and who have borne the burden and the heat of the day, stand also the men of middle age and the younger men, enthusiastic and loyal to their party, and willing to give of their time and energy that its banner may not trail in the dust. Among the faces that are very familiar we see our honored judge, Earl Sample, whose eloquence, and whose finished and forceful periods, have carried conviction to many a jury, and have charmed audiences throughout the State. During the present war the Judge has been making patriotic speeches throughout the length and breadth of Indiana. Harry Strickland has served his county for six years in the Lower House of the Legislature, and is now the Democratic candidate for Congress in the Sixth Congressional District; John F. Eagan, John B. Hinchman, William A. Service, Samuel J. Offutt, Edward W. Pratt, Jonas Walker, Charles L. Tindall, Robert L. Mason, Edwin T. Glascock, Charles Cook, Arthur C. Van Duyn, John A. Anderson, Sherman Smith, Lemuel Moore, George Matlock, Thomas Hope, Charles Scott, Louis H. Merlau, William G. Lantz, John F. Shelby, F. M. Sanford, Clint Cauldwell, John Mooney, Quincy A. Wright and many others.

But no picture of any general or business meeting at the county seat within the last quarter of a century would be complete if it omitted from the foreground the likeness of the genial secretary who is practically always called to the table—Elmer T. Swope.

Yes, we have our differences of opinion in these days, but our Democracy of today has this message for posterity: that, though we have differences of opinion, we settle our difficulties in council; when our principles have been adopted, and our candidates named, we present to our opponents the solid front of one united, organic Democracy. During the great world war the party has given its undivided support of the policy of President Wilson to prosecute the war with all the strength at our command until an honorable peace can be obtained and the world made safe for democracy.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF HARRISON COUNTY

HARRISON COUNTY was the fourth county formed in the State, Knox, Clark and Dearborn being earlier. It was organized and carved out of a portion of the territory theretofore included in Knox county in 1809. It was named after General William Henry Harrison, who was the first territorial governor of Indiana, and who afterwards became President of the United States. General Harrison owned a large tract of land in the county and operated a grist mill on Blue river.

Among the earlier prominent Democrats was William M. Saffer, who was a candidate for governor in 1856, when he was defeated by A. P. Willard, and Peter N. Zenor, who was a member of the state constitutional convention in 1850. Mr. Saffer and Mr. Zenor both served several terms in the state legislature.

The following residents of Harrison county served in the lower house of congress: Hon. Simon K. Wolfe, 43d session; Hon. S. M. Stockslager, 1880-1884, and Hon. William T. Zenor, 1896-1906. Captain Stockslager was also land commissioner during the first term of President Cleveland.

In recent years Harrison county has had two resident state senators who were Democrats—Iverson Lynn, who served from 1890 to 1894, and Smith Askren, who served from 1902 to 1906.

The following Democrats from Harrison county served as members of the state legislature in the lower house in recent years: Daniel A. Cunningham, elected in 1878; Jonathan Hottell, 1880; William D. Mauck, 1882 to 1884; Smith Askren, 1886, 1888, 1908 and 1910, and also joint representative in 1892; Jacob F. Wright, 1890 and 1892; Jacob L. O'Bannon, 1896 and 1898; Andrew J. Lopp, 1900 and 1902; Thomas Conlee, 1904; Remy Bierley, 1912, and William Habermel, 1914.

Harrison county is now and has usually been regarded as a Democratic county, although at times the Republicans elected all or a part of their ticket. Along in the eighties and nineties the usual majorities were about 500, although there were exceptions to this majority in 1886, when the Republicans elected their ticket; and again in 1894, the year of the Republican landslide, the latter party was successful. From that time until 1906 the Democrats won, but at the election in that year the Republicans again defeated them, and were fortunate enough to retain several offices again in 1908.

It was noticeable that upon the adoption of the Australian ballot the Democrats made remarkable gains in nearly every precinct of the county at the following election in 1890. The following newspapers have been published in the county, two of which, the Corydon Republican, now edited by Frank Self, and the Corydon Democrat, now edited by Lew M. O'Bannon, are being regularly published at this time; the Corydon Democrat having a circulation of over 3,500 and being one of the leading weekly newspapers in the State.

The Indiana Gazette, established November, 1818. The Corydon Press, September, 1829, Dr. D. G. Mitchell, editor.

The Corydon Investigator, 1835.

The Corydon Whig, 1840, Dr. A. M. Jones and George Robertson, editors.

The Harrison Gazette, 1843, Ignatius Mattingly, editor.

The Southern Indianian, 1847.

The Western Argus, March 11, 1851, T. C. Slaughter, editor.

The Corydon Democrat, established 1856, S. K. Wolfe, editor. Followed by A. W. Brewster, Askren and Stockslager, G. K. Gwartney, C. W. Thomas and C. B. Ellis and the present owner and editor, Lew M. O'Bannon.

The Corydon Argus, 1861, George W. Beard, editor.

The Corydon Weekly Union, 1863, Andrew Broadus, editor.

The Farmers' Advocate, W. H. Hudson, editor.

The Old Capitol, Lemmon and Askren, editors.

The Comet, C. L. Dick, editor.

The Corydon Republican, established August, 1868; editors, Henry Jordan and W. T. Jones, followed by Self and Adams and George W. Self, who was succeeded by his son, Frank Self, the present owner and publisher.

The Harrison County Democrat, 1886, by D. J. Murr and C. W. Thomas, editors.

Corydon, the first state capital, is the county seat of Harrison county. The territorial government was located there from 1812 until the adoption of the first constitution and the admission of the State into the Union in 1816. It continued to be the capital until 1825, when the seat of government was removed to Indianapolis.

The old capitol building still stands. It is owned by Harrison county and is used for a court house. There is a growing sentiment that the State should buy and preserve this old building in order that future generations may view its simple grandeur. A bill to that effect passed the senate during the 1915 session and was defeated in the house by but a few votes; a similar bill will probably be presented to the next General Assembly. It would be a fitting memorial of the one hundredth anniversary of the adoption of the constitution and the admission of the State to the Union for the State to purchase this ancient building, the construction of which was begun in 1810. In the same town is the "Constitutional Elm," where the first constitution was drafted and adopted.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF HENDRICKS COUNTY

HENDRICKS COUNTY was organized in 1823, and at the first general election thereafter, in 1824, returned a Whig majority of twenty-four votes for Henry Clay over Andrew Jackson, they receiving thirty and six votes, respectively.

The stand the county then took in recording its political favoritism as opposed to the Democracy has been consistently maintained down to the present time, the only exception being in 1828 and 1832, when Jackson had a plurality over Clay of forty votes in the former year and of 109 in the latter, and in 1912, when the split in the Republican party enabled Woodrow Wilson to receive a plurality of 842 over Roosevelt, the latter running second in this county.

The Democratic vote of the county since its organization, as recorded at presidential elections, has been as follows: 1824, 6; 1828, 204; 1832, 483; 1836, 389; 1840, 651; 1844, 844; 1848, 775; 1852, 980; 1856, 1,378; 1860, 1,083; 1864, 832; 1868, 1,462; 1872, 1,626; 1876, 1,912; 1880, 1,994; 1884, 2,069; 1888, 2,081; 1892, 2,028; 1896, 2,365; 1900, 2,359; 1904, 2,174; 1908, 2,546; 1912, 2,337; 1916, 2,453.

The Republican pluralities in the county since the war have ranged from 935 to 1,511 at the various presidential elections.

From 1860 to 1908—almost a half century—there was not a Democrat elected to a county office, and during this period only one Democrat carried the county, Judge Jacob B. Julian receiving a majority of twenty-nine votes in 1878 over his Republican opponent, who was elected Circuit Court Judge through his plurality in Marion county, which, with this county, comprised the judicial circuit.

In 1908 the Democrats were able to place the first member of their party in the court house in over fifty years, when John W. Ader was elected Sheriff. He was re-elected in 1910 and at the same election Democrats were elected as Auditor and Treasurer in the persons of Lewis W. Borders and George Macomber. In 1912 the entire Democratic county ticket was elected, John Dugan of Middle township being the first and only Democrat ever sent to the Legislature from Hendricks county. George W. Brill was elected as Circuit Judge, James P. Snodgrass Prosecutor, George Macomber Treasurer, James W. Gentry Sheriff, and John Moran and Henry S. Cox as Commissioners. The 1914 election resulted in the defeat of the Democratic candidates for Auditor and Commissioners, but added two more Democrats to the list of county officers, A. P. W. Bridges being elected as Clerk and John A. Flynn Recorder.

The twelve townships of Hendricks county are practically evenly divided as to politics, but not until 1908 were the Democrats able to obtain a majority of the township trustees, and with it the privilege of naming the county superintendent of schools. This choice fell upon Theodore T. Martin, who proved such an efficient officer and capable school man that he has been re-elected for a term of four years, receiving every vote of the County Board of Education regardless of politics.

This, in brief, records the results attained by the Democracy in the county since its organization. Meager they are, it is true; but the spirit of political devotion that has maintained organizations and made sacrifices in the face of predetermined defeat has been of much benefit to the party throughout the State. A Hendricks county Democrat has been one who is always ready to serve, even if the fruits of victory are not in sight. Today the Democratic State Committee of thirteen members has on its roster of membership two native Hendricks county Democrats, both of whom (meaning John W. Cravens of the Second district and Arthur Hamrick of the Fifth) are of Hendricks county Democratic ancestral stock and both of whom received the impulse to play in the game of politics through family traditions and associations of young manhood in this county. Dr. O. B. Johnson and Marion Bailey, both of Union township, were delegates to the Democratic national conventions of 1896 and 1904, respectively. During the sixteen years of defeat that was visited upon the Democratic party in Indiana from 1894 to 1910, Edward Barrett was his party's candidate for State Geologist, going down to defeat with his party in each instance during that period and winning with it in 1910 and 1914. In 1906 and 1908 Hendricks county furnished the Democratic candidate for Auditor of State in the person of Marion Bailey. It was in Hendricks county that Charles Greathouse, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, got his first lesson in profitable politics when he landed his first position as a school teacher in Brown township, the banner Democratic township of the county. Governor Ralston, Philip Zoercher, Judges Webb Felt and John Spencer, George Crane and numerous others who have served the party through weather fair and foul, have been identified at various periods, while students of the Central Normal College at Dan-village, with the Hendricks county Democracy—an association that was undoubtedly of value to all.

The first Democratic paper published in Hendricks county was the Butcher Knife, established at Danville in 1856, with George Gregg as editor, which existed some four or five years, being snuffed out by the strong war feeling that prevailed in the community. The Indianian was established in 1870 and survived until the fall of 1875, being under the control during that period of Dr. Haggart, the Ray brothers and C. N. Walls. The latter was an editor of the fire-eating variety and made things so warm for his political opponents that it was necessary for him to use shooting-stick and mallet as weapons of self-defense as well as in locking up his newspaper forms. The Democrat was established by E. D. King in February, 1878, and sold in August, 1879, to M. A. Barnett, who in October, 1881, disposed of the property to the owner of the Republican paper. The Danville Gazette was established by E. D. King in 1880, who retired from the paper in 1885 to accept a government position at Washington, D. C. The paper then passed to the control of W. A. King, who continued as its publisher until December 1, 1914, when it was leased to Alvin Hall, the present publisher, W. A. King having been appointed as postmaster at Danville.

To no one is the party more indebted than to the men who have served it as chairmen of the County Central Committee. This position in a county like Hendricks calls for an amount of personal labor and sacrifice of time and money that those in a county where there is a possibility of victory do not have to meet. The following persons have filled this position in Hendricks county during the past forty years: 1876, Nathan J. Scarsee; 1878, John Mesler; 1880-2, H. B. Lingenfelter; 1884, James A. Wilson; 1886, Levi A.

Barnett; 1888, Dr. John L. Marsh; 1890, John M. Hays; 1892, James R. Williams; 1894, Joseph G. Bowen; 1896, W. A. King; 1898, Henry Underwood; 1890-4, Marion Bailey; 1906-14, David A. Higgins; 1916, Dr. A. P. W. Bridges.

Hendricks county Democracy suffered its severest blow through the agitation of the slavery question and the Civil war that followed. Many leading men who formerly had been Democrats joined the new Republican party, which grew so strong that it dominated the political affairs of the county without question, practically, until 1908.

This condition of affairs precluded the possibility of a Hendricks county Democrat becoming prominently identified with public life, but that the material was here and failed to develop solely because of untoward political conditions is proven by Hendricks county Democrats who have made their mark in public life elsewhere. Congressman Bailey of the Johnstown (Pa.) district was a product of this county. John R. Brill, a leading lawyer, and one of the live wires of the Democratic organization at Evansville, is proud of the fact that he is a Hendricks county boy and never loses an opportunity to speak of the kind of Democrats the county produces. Portland Chase Hunt, a student under Dan Voorhees, was one of the leading Democratic orators of the Pacific Coast.

But with President Wilson and the new era for the Democratic party that his administration has ushered in, the party in Hendricks county has been strengthened and it now faces the future with a firmer belief in the principles of Jefferson and Jackson, and the knowledge that the Republican party even in Hendricks county is not invulnerable to defeat.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF HENRY COUNTY

By Walter S. Chambers

THE second term of James Monroe, President of the United States, extending from March 4, 1821, to March 4, 1825, was then known and is to this day referred to as the "Era of Good Feeling," there being, so far as surface indications were concerned, but one political party in the United States.

It was during this era of good feeling, in 1822, that Henry county was organized, so that there were no political divisions in the county. This condition continued, at least on the surface, until 1832, when the first national convention to nominate candidates for the presidency was held in Baltimore, Md. The followers of Henry Clay were known as "National Republicans" and those of Andrew Jackson as "Democratic Republicans." The vote in Henry county was 767 for Clay and 580 for Jackson.

With the campaign of 1836 political divisions became complete in Henry county. The two leading parties were known as "Whigs" and "Democrats." The vote of the county for President was: Harrison, "Whig," 1,394; Van Buren, "Democrat," 712. The Whigs continued largely in the ascendancy in the county until 1850.

With but two exceptions during that period all county officials elected were Whigs. In 1837 Col. Miles Murphy, then a Democrat and a leading and popular citizen, was elected a member of the lower house of the General Assembly, and in 1839 Thomas Ginn, a Moderate Democrat, was elected county sheriff. In 1850 there were to be elected three delegates to the proposed convention to form a new constitution of the State. The Whigs nominated as delegates to the convention Daniel Mason of Wayne township, Isaac Parker of Franklin township, Dr. George H. Ballingall of Fall Creek township; for senator, William A. Rifner of Prairie township; for representative, William W. Williams of Spiceland township; for sheriff, Samuel Hazzard of Henry township. In opposition there was a union of Democrats, Free-Soil Whigs, Prohibitionists and Abolitionists, who nominated as delegates Isaac Kinley and Daniel Mowrer of Henry township and John F. Johnston of Prairie township; for senator, Ezekiel T. Hickman of Prairie township; for representative, Isaac H. Morris of Wayne township; for sheriff, Joshua Johnson of Henry township. Every candidate on the Democratic fusion ticket was elected except John F. Johnston. The Democrats in this fusion took the lion's share, for every candidate on the ticket was a straight, out-and-out Democrat except Isaac Kinley, who stood as the lone representative of the Abolitionists, the Free-Soil Whigs and the Prohibitionists.

In 1856, when the Whig party became the Republican party, the vote of Henry county for President was: Fremont, Republican, 2,741; Buchanan, Democrat, 1,229. The population of the county was then approximately 18,500; total vote, 4,019. The Republican plurality that year was 1,512. The highest plurality given a Republican candidate for President in the intervening campaigns was in 1868, when it reached 2,020. There was a gradual slump in Republican pluralities from that time on and in 1908 the plurality was 1,067. In 1912, owing to the vote of the Progressives, the plurality was in favor of Wilson, Democrat, by 208, the first time in the history of the county that a Democratic candidate for President received a plurality of the votes, a period embracing elections for ninety-four years. The presidential election of 1916 resulted in a plurality for the Republican candidate of 826, party lines in this year having assumed normal proportions. The Republican vote for President was 4,386 and the Democratic vote 3,560, both parties casting the largest vote in their history. The population of the county at this time was about 32,000.

From 1850 to 1912 not a single man other than a Whig or Republican succeeded in being elected to office from Henry county alone and only in four instances was any one other than a Republican elected from any district in which Henry county formed a part, the exceptions being in the election of A. R. A. Thompson and Exum Saint, on fusion tickets, in 1874 and 1878, respectively, to the lower house of the General Assembly; and Charles M. Butler of Knightstown, elected prosecuting attorney and Calvin W. Thompson of Anderson, elected district attorney for the common pleas court. In 1876 Hon. D. W. Chambers of Henry county was the nominee for representative in Congress from the Sixth Congressional District and was defeated by only 216 votes. He was the Sixth district member of the Democratic state committee in 1886 and 1888.

In 1912, when the Republican party was badly demoralized on account of defection to the Progressives, or "Bull Moose" party, the Democrats succeeded in electing a representative to the lower house of the State Legislature, _____ of Knightstown; James Wallace, county treasurer;

James Bouslog, county sheriff, and John H. Myers and Al W. Fatic, members of the board of county commissioners. Finley H. Gray, Democratic nominee for Congress from the Sixth Congressional District, also carried the county by a small plurality. In 1914 Walter S. Chambers, editor of the Newcastle Daily Times, and son of the Hon. D. W. Chambers mentioned above, was elected joint senator from Henry and Madison counties.

In the above is set out only the successes of the Democratic party in Henry county since the organization of the county ninety-five years ago. It does not convey in full the energy, love of party and militant spirit of Henry county Democrats. Although largely in the minority from the beginning they have entered each succeeding political campaign with vim and determination to win. Defeat did not dampen their ardor nor cause them to lessen their efforts, and such has been the reward of their zeal that although they still have a plurality of about 800 against them, they have faith that the near future will place them at least on an equality with their long-time antagonists.

In the past fifty years several Democratic newspapers have had existence at the county seat and each labored zealously during its brief lifetime for the Democratic cause; but the patronage was limited and emoluments sparse, so that they did not long survive. About 1895 Walter S. Chambers purchased the Newcastle Democrat and after a few years' struggle had it firmly established in the homes and hearts of Henry county Democrats.

In 1909 he began publication of the Newcastle Daily Times, which has had a successful career, and both publications have greatly helped in spreading the doctrine of Democracy and have been largely instrumental in reducing the Republican pluralities. Mr. Chambers is the Democratic chairman of the Sixth Congressional District and as such is a member of the Democratic state central committee. He is also joint senator from Henry and Madison counties.

The history of the Democratic party of Henry county would not be complete without mentioning Dr. F. A. Bolser, who for twenty-five years has been one of the active and effective workers and organizers. He has served as county chairman and in all other positions in the party. Under Governor Matthews he was appointed state veterinarian and held the position for five years. Under Governor Ralston he was the first assistant to the state veterinarian, serving four years.

Edward Smith, the present postmaster and former county chairman, has been an active factor in the county Democracy for thirty years, being an alternate delegate to the national convention at St. Louis in 1916. Other men who have done much for the party in years past were James Brown, who was once a candidate for supreme judge; Thomas B. Hunt, who was a candidate for the nomination of treasurer of state; Loring Bundy, Horace G. Yergin, Frank A. Wisheart, Charles D. Morgan of Knightstown and George W. Goodwin.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF HOWARD COUNTY

By C. H. Havens

"Sweet are the uses of adversity,
Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in its head."

FROM 1840, when that district which now comprises two townships (Ervin and Monroe) of Howard county cast twelve votes for Martin Van Buren, Democrat, and twelve votes for William Henry Harrison, Whig, for President, to 1912, when the Democratic party of Howard county felt that it had at last come into its own, is a far cry.

Yet in all these years, more than the allotted three score and ten of man's life, through the organization of the county as the county of Richardville in 1844 and its reorganization as the county of Howard in 1846, to the year of grace before mentioned, but two Democrats had succeeded to county office, though both of these were twice elected.

But from the memorable campaign of "Tippecanoe and Tyler, too," marking the temporary overthrow of the Democratic party in the nation after a continuous rule of forty years, a militant Democratic organization has been maintained in the county. It had been unfed even by the crumbs of official pottage. It had been led by men firm-grounded in the imperishable principles of Democracy, who hoped on, fought on, if not to win, to feel more worthy winning.

For all that the prophet was not without honor save in his own country. Men from the ranks of the party in the county had been successful as candidates for State, legislative and judicial office. Notable among them were Milton B. Hopkins, twice elected (1870-1872) State Superintendent of Public Instruction; Addison F. Armstrong, elected (1870) State Senator for the district then comprising Howard, Miami and Carroll counties; John W. Kern, Democratic majority leader in the United States Senate from 1911 to 1917, and once a candidate for the Vice-Presidency, elected (1884) Reporter of the Supreme Court; Judge C. N. Pollard and Judge Lex J. Kirkpatrick, elected (1873 and 1890, respectively) Judge of the Thirty-second Judicial Circuit, comprising the counties of Howard and Tipton, and J. O. Henderson, twice elected (1890-1892) Auditor of State.

It is a fact of frequent comment that in all these seventy-nine years no other political organization in Howard county—Whig, Free Soiler, "Barnburner," "Know-Nothing" or Republican—had been honored by a nominee for State or congressional office, save in a single instance. In 1874 James A. Wildman was nominated by the Republican party and elected Auditor of State.

And in all these years there was never a campaign in which the Democrats did not put up a valiant fight. Times there were when they all but drove the wedge of battle through the impregnable lines of Whig or Republican in an effort to "reach the court house" or a coveted seat in the General Assembly of the State.

In 1847 Dr. Jacob H. Kern, father of former Senator John W. Kern, contended with Dr. Corydon Richmond, the former a Democrat and the latter a Whig, for the seat in the Legislature. Dr. Kern was defeated by but seventeen votes. Again, in 1870, John W. Kern, who did not reach his majority until after the convening of the General Assembly in the winter following, was a candidate for the same office against Captain Thomas M. Kirkpatrick, a popular soldier idol and a strong man in every way with the electorate. Mr. Kern was defeated by less than 250 votes, though the normal Republican majority in the county at that time was approximately 1,200.

Delving again into the mighty past, in 1858 certain territory, now in the main Honeycreek township, formerly attached to Clinton county, was annexed to Howard county. In the October election which followed the result in the contest for County Auditor between Peter B. Hersleb (Democrat) and James A. Wildman (Republican) hinged on whether the votes in the recently annexed territory should be counted. With these votes eliminated, the Democratic candidate would have won. They were counted, however, and Mr. Wildman, twelve years later elected Auditor of State, succeeded to the office.

The second clerk of the court in Howard county was Adam Clark, a Democrat. He was appointed by the County Commissioners to fill the unexpired term of Franklin S. Price (Whig), elected in 1844 and re-elected in 1848, and who died in office. He was elected to the office in 1854 and succeeded himself in 1858. Jackson Morrow, a Democrat, was elected County Surveyor in 1890 and was re-elected in 1892. These two men represent the full extent of county office holding by Democrats until 1912, when the entire Democratic county ticket was elected by pluralities ranging from 16 to 1,044.

The campaign of 1860 marked the alignment of political parties in the county much as they would stand at this time by substituting the Republicans for Whigs. The Whigs and Democrats had, of course, constituted the leading parties, and with this campaign the Free Soilers, hardly more than a negligible political quantity, were wholly absorbed. There were some pro-slavery men, an inconsiderable number. Early in the canvass the Democrats were willing to concede that the Republicans would carry the county for the national ticket. Wagers were made, however, that the plurality for Abraham Lincoln over Stephen A. Douglas would not exceed 300. Not a little surprise attended the announcement of the result, the plurality for the Republican candidate for President being over 600. John C. Breckinridge, the pro-slavery candidate, received less than a score of votes. The exact figures for the vote in the county in this election are not available from records preserved at the court house.

The election of Judge Lex J. Kirkpatrick as Circuit Judge in 1890, the unusual manner in which his nomination was made and the surprisingly successful result of his industrious personal canvass, are to this day the basis of stories rehearsed at almost every gathering of Howard county Democrats. The Republicans in a large and exceptionally imposing convention held in Tipton had nominated J. C. Blackledge, one of the oldest and ablest members of the Howard county bar. The normal Republican majority in the district was over one thousand and the nomination was regarded as equivalent to an election. The "convention" which nominated Judge Kirkpatrick, comparatively a young man, who had been in the practice but a limited number of years, comprised exactly nine persons. They met in the lumber room under the stage of the old opera house building. In the absence of Judge Kirkpatrick, and without his knowledge or consent, he was declared the Democratic candidate in opposition to the older and more experienced barrister, of whose success at the polls no one had the shadow of a doubt. Then, as now, Judge Kirkpatrick was thorough in everything he attempted. It is doubtful whether in the beginning he had the remotest hope of election, but this did not give him pause in his determination to make the best showing possible. Judge Kirkpatrick had his own method of campaigning. Among other things "community meetings" were held, usually at the home of some Democrat, throughout the district, and the candidate was brought in personal contact with almost every voter. It was late in the canvass before the formidable character of Judge Kirkpatrick's candidacy began to be realized. He was elected by a plurality of 221.

It was not until 1870 that the Democracy was represented by a newspaper in the county, the Republicans having the advantage of the able assistance of the Kokomo Tribune from 1850.

As early as 1848, however, the Pioneer, Howard county's first newspaper, was published at the village of New London, which had aspired to be the law seat of the county. Originally it was published as a Free Soil advocate by Dr. Moses R. Wickersham. A year later arrangements were made with the publisher by which the Whig and Democratic parties had representation in its meager columns. The late Colonel Charles D. Murray championed the cause of the Whigs and Dr. J. F. Henderson and Dr. James Barrett took up cudgels for the Democrats. Later the plant was moved to Kokomo, it being purchased by John Bohan and Harless Ashley. Colonel Murray was made its editor and it supported only the Whig contentions. In 1857 T. C. Phillips, one of the most forceful political writers the press of Indiana has known, became its publisher and editor. From that day it has been an able and strictly partisan Republican newspaper.

In 1870 William J. ("Jap") Turpin came to Kokomo from Tipton, where he had for some time published a Democratic paper, the Tipton Times. He was known as "the Tipton Slasher," and for other reasons than that he hailed from the "slashes" of Tipton county. As a political writer he had developed a style to which the term "slashing" aptly applies. He was without means. He began the publication of the Radical Democrat on "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen." The paper was printed at the Tribune office. The writer hereof recalls that he carried the entire initial edition from the Tribune office to a room rented by Turpin a short distance up the street, where he folded the papers for mailing and distributed the "carriers' list" about the court house square. Senator John W. Kern was a frequent and a virile contributor to the Radical Democrat, which, after the second issue, dropped the prefix "Radical," as was John M. Goar, who afterward became its editor.

In that year Dr. J. F. Henderson had the Democratic nomination for Congress "wished on him." It fell to his part to keep the Democrat financially afloat. At the conclusion of the campaign he had the satisfaction of knowing that he had made a most creditable though an unsuccessful race, the honor of having fought a good fight—and a newspaper. A man of rather large affairs, he continued the publication of the Democrat, becoming its editor, much as a diversion. For all that there have been few more strikingly original and in many ways more forceful publications in the history of Indiana newspapers than was the Democrat under his administration.

In 1874 the paper passed into the hands of two sons of Dr. Henderson, John O. and Howard E. Henderson, who continued its publication until the death of the latter in June of 1914. In 1876 the name was changed to the Kokomo Dispatch. It had an excellent mechanical equipment for that day. Under the editorship of J. O. Henderson it had become a recognized force in the Democratic party not only in the county, but in the congressional district and the State. The party was neither unmindful nor unappreciative of this fact. In 1884, upon the election of President Cleveland, J. O. Henderson was appointed internal revenue collector for the district comprising the northern counties of the State, with practically the undivided support of the leaders of the party in these counties. In a few months, however, in the consolidation of internal revenue districts, Mr. Henderson was "consolidated" out of office. In 1890, when the publication of the Dispatch as a daily newspaper was begun, Mr. Henderson was a candidate for nomination as Auditor of State and was honored by the Democratic convention of that year with this nomination on the first ballot. He was again nominated and elected in 1892. C. H. Havens, who had been with the Dispatch in one capacity or another since his childhood, and who had relieved Mr. Henderson of some of the editorial work during Mr. Henderson's incumbency in the office of Internal Revenue Collector, was made managing editor of the paper. He continued in this position until his appointment as postmaster for Kokomo, in March of 1914. The Dispatch is now owned by a stock company, in which George W. Charles and A. G. Seiberling are leading spirits. Victor J. Obenauer is the managing editor. It has recently been housed in a magnificent new building and its plant is one of the finest in Indiana.

In the election of 1914 the candidates on the Democratic ticket in Howard county "fell outside the breastwork," as they did in many other counties of Indiana where they had been successful two years before. But there is no failing in the militant spirit of the party of Howard. A compact and energetic organization, with James R. McReynolds as county chairman, John R. McIntosh as secretary and A. B. Armstrong as treasurer, is maintained.

Unfortunately there is no existing record of the earlier officers of the Democratic county central committee. Dr. J. F. Henderson, H. B. Havens, James Davis, James Haggard, T. L. Faulkener and Captain George D. Tate were among the earlier chairmen. In later years John M. Leach, John W. Kern, George W. Duke, Milo W. Barnes, Charles J. Hammil and G. W. Johnson have served in this capacity. B. C. Moon, Charles Humerickhouse and C. H. Havens served as secretary of the committee through a long series of years.

To no man does the Democratic organization of Howard county owe more than to Orin Simpson, the county chairman in the successful campaigns of 1908 and 1912, when a magnificent showing in voting strength was made, the Democrats carrying the county by a substantial plurality in the last named year, electing the entire county ticket.

J. R. ("Jim Bob") McReynolds was elected County Chairman in March of 1914. In the general election that followed in November the county was lost to the Democrats by very narrow pluralities. The genius for organization of Chairman McReynolds was notably in evidence in the campaign and election of 1916, however, when the Democrats of the county made a net gain of 1,158 over the combined Republican-Progressive vote of 1914. Had this gain been uniform in the several counties of the State, Indiana would have been carried for the Democracy by over 100,000. John R. McIntosh has served as secretary of the county committee since 1908 and has won well-merited praise not only as a good organizer, but as an effective campaigner in an oratorical way.

In the city of Kokomo the Democrats have been far more frequently successful than in the county. When Kokomo was incorporated as a city in 1865 Judge C. N. Pollard was made City Attorney and Milton Bell succeeded him in this office. It was subsequently filled by John W. Kern (1871-1876 and 1883-1884). The first Democratic Mayor of the city, Dr. Henry Clay Cole, was elected in 1881, his tragic death following a year later. He was succeeded by W. S. Armstrong, Democrat, who was re-elected in 1883, serving until 1885. Dr. J. B. Kirkpatrick, Democrat, was elected in 1889, Dr. J. B. Puckett in 1910 and George W. Stidger in 1913. George W. Duke, Democrat, served as City Clerk from 1877 to 1882; Joseph Kelly, Democrat, served as City Marshal from 1875 until 1879, and Albert Burns, Democrat, was elected to this office, serving from 1882 to 1884.

When there was not a Democratic majority in the city council, as there was following a few elections, there was an energetic Democratic minority, and as a whole Democrats have had a large share in the administration of the affairs of the city from the day of its organization.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF HUNTINGTON COUNTY

HUNTINGTON COUNTY, located in the Wabash valley, not only has been a liberal contributor to historical events, but has taken active and prominent part in the affairs of the Democratic party.

Prominent among the party workers in Huntington country prior to and immediately following the war were L. P. Milligan, James R. Slack and John R. Cofroth. These men were each lawyers of more than local reputation. James R. Slack represented the district in congress, and L. P. Milligan at one time was a candidate for governor. Samuel Winters at that time was publisher of a local Democratic newspaper and was regarded as spokesman for the party. He is now located in the city of Peru, conducting the Peru Chronicle. W. J. Hilligas was also a newspaper man, a tireless party worker, whose influence extended beyond the confines of the county.

In later days Judge J. C. Branyan, Judge O. W. Whitelock, Judge S. E. Cook, J. Fred France, D. D. Yingling and L. G. Trixler have each been active in party affairs. J. Fred France is now serving his second term as clerk of the supreme court. L. G. Trixler for four years served as deputy clerk of the supreme court under Mr. France, and is today postmaster of the city of Huntington.

The county has always been close politically, shifting from one control to another. Although the county is regarded as normally Republican, the militant Democracy of the county has been successful in capturing either a part or all of the county offices at each election. The city of Huntington, also normally Republican, has had as its head a Democratic mayor for the last seven years.

Congressman George W. Rauch, now serving his tenth year in congress as representative of the Eleventh congressional district, is a native of Huntington county, having been born and raised at Warren, Huntington county.

There are published in Huntington county six newspapers, four weeklies and two dailies. The Huntington Press, morning daily, established February 11, 1912, by M. H. Ormsby, is the only paper in the county of the Democratic faith.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF JACKSON COUNTY

By Cornelius S. Mercer

JACKSON COUNTY has always been loyal to the Democratic party. Only for a brief interval in the fifties was there any serious interruption of Democratic supremacy, when the Whigs elected their ticket and controlled county affairs for a few years. The Democrats returned to power before the breaking of the Civil war, remained loyal throughout that trying period, and with very few exceptions have elected Democratic local tickets ever since. No Republican presidential candidate ever carried the county.

This unflinching loyalty may be largely attributed to a few early settlers of prominence who were largely interested in local and national affairs. First among these deserving of special mention is Colonel George W. Carr, who was born in Clark county, Indiana, October 7, 1807, and came with his father's family to Vallonia in 1811, where the family resided for several years, part of which time was spent in the old fort at that place because of Indian hostilities. In 1818 he moved to Pea Ridge, in Carr township, where he married and reared a family. He served in the Indiana Legislature through several sessions in the forties and fifties. He was a member of the constitutional convention which met at Indianapolis in 1850-51, and was elected to the presidency of that body of men, and as such exercised a great influence in shaping the present constitution of the State. With the breaking of war in 1862, he joined the Ninety-third Indiana Regiment Volunteers and served as Lieutenant-Colonel, afterward returning to private life on his farm near Medora. He died at Crawfordsville on May 27, 1892, and was buried at the family cemetery near his old home. Colonel Carr was an ardent Democrat from principle, having formed his connections at a day when Democracy was on trial, and throughout his long career was faithful to the cause he espoused. There were times when he felt that the Democratic party was not faithful to the cause it represented, and when he so believed he found himself in opposition to it. His impress was strongest in the western part of the county where he resided and where his neighbors and friends looked to him directly for counsel and advice.

In the eastern part of the county Meedy W. Shields towered above all other political characters in Jackson county from the beginning of the third decade until his active life came to a close in 1866. He was a business man of wonderful resource and ability, but amidst his many business affairs he had time to devote to the public interest and did more to build up the great Democratic majority in Jackson county than any other man of his day. He was born at Sevierville, Sevier county, Tennessee, July 8, 1805, of Cavalier stock: He came to Indiana with his parents and settled at Corydon. In 1816 they moved to Jackson county, in the virgin wilderness, where now stands the city of Seymour. In 1820 to 1832 he was variously employed as a farm hand and then proprietor of a small fleet of flat boats from the village of Rockford to New Orleans. In 1832 he volunteered service in the army that suppressed the Indian depredations known as the Black Hawk wars, and became the Captain of a company. In 1833 he was married to Eliza P. Ewing. It was at this period of his life that he became active in public affairs. Being deprived of the opportunity to obtain an academic education in his youth, he acquired it in his mature years. He soon became proficient in history, science, political economy and government politics. With a keen analytical mind he was quick to detect sophistry and his sound mode of reasoning established him as a safe counselor; his sterling integrity established him as a safe friend. These were the fundamental factors upon which he predicated his political career. He was never ambitious for office, but served his county in the Legislature, where he devoted his great abilities wholly to constructive measures, giving little heed to strictly party affairs. His counsel crystallized into drainage laws, educational development, equal taxation of property, safety in railroad travel, stability of State and national credit and the control of public utilities. He introduced and secured the enactment of the first law of the State requiring all railroad trains to come to a full stop before crossing another railroad.

While Jackson county was yet but partly settled, and with its now fertile valleys covered with virgin timber, Colonel Cyrus L. Dunham emigrated from Cortland, N. Y., and cast his fortunes with her people, locating in Hamilton township, where he bought a large tract of timber land and established his primitive home. He engaged in the practice of law in Brownstown, and also maintained a law office in Salem and was the foremost member of the bar in both places. He was a scholar and a student with greater devotion to intellectual matters than to the more sordid things that engrossed the minds of men. As a lawyer he never had a superior during his long legal career in Jackson and surrounding counties, and as an orator but few in the councils of the nation were greater than he. He espoused the cause of Democracy and was loyal to his party throughout a long and honored career. He was elected to Congress in . . . , where he very soon took rank with the ablest men in the councils of the nation. No Democrat in Congress was more quoted in the public press of his day than was Cyrus L. Dunham. He saw the evils that honeycombed the political structure of the time, and with unerring prophecy sought to avert the great cataclysm that soon followed. As a bulwark against the forces of privilege, then rapacious and bold, he stood towering above many of the giants of his day and to him belongs much of the credit for the success of Democratic principles which are now crystallizing into law. Like many a patriot before him, it was not Cyrus L. Dunham's privilege to live to see the flower of his philosophy. The seed which he planted in the councils of the nation was doomed to lie dormant throughout a long period when war and reconstruction shoved higher ideals aside for a season. But in later years that seed brought forth a Cleveland, who stood for national integrity; a Bryan, who stands for national morals, and a Woodrow Wilson, who stands for national wisdom. For these things, and all of them, Cyrus L. Dunham battled in Congress, in political convention, in private council, and the files of newspapers all over the Union contain extracts from his speeches, fervent with eloquence and zeal in behalf of the rights of man. Local histories are strangely silent concerning this great man. They reveal to us a portion of his war record only. From that source we learn that in 1861 he was commissioned a Colonel to organize the Fiftieth regiment. Although he was then a resident of New Albany, the regiment consisted largely of Jackson county people. Early in the war it saw service in the South, and because of improper recognition at Washington, Colonel Dunham resigned his command and retired to private life. While the written pages of history do not disclose the fact, the larger book of national political life is brightened by his genius. He was never married and left no family name to care for his memory. That duty has fallen to the hands of strangers and this tribute to his memory is written by one who was yet unborn when he passed into the great beyond.

Among the powerful factors making for Democratic supremacy in Jackson county in an early day was Major Samuel P. Mooney, who came to the county from the South at the close of the Mexican war, where he served and gained his military title. There is no written record of him and the place of his origin is unknown at the present day. He married a Spanish girl in New Orleans, brought her here and set up in plantation style. He was tall, rough-featured and bold. He did not domineer, but led men by a power that could not be defied. He was a political boss, who ruled the affairs of the county for a decade, or from the closing of the Mexican war until the Civil war period. He was a farmer and lived from the products of his farm, never acquiring wealth, but well-to-do. He belonged to no profession, but spent a great deal of time in politics, which he enjoyed for the excitement of it. Being a Southerner, he was a hereditary Democrat and stood with the Breckinridge element. Although never an office seeker, he served one year in the Legislature and was twice elected County Treasurer. He was strong with the politicians and his influence penetrated the ranks of the Whigs to such an extent that it was impossible to defeat his nominees at the polls. Nominations were then made by mass convention, the opposition dividing into groups to be counted. Major Mooney was always the center of the biggest group. Political bossism may be more sinister in modern times, but certainly it is not more positive in results than it was then, and Major Mooney will always be remembered most for the political "machine" which he built up and controlled with perfect precision for many years.

No history of Jackson county would be true to political facts which omitted mention of Hon. Jason B. Brown, whose career, both professional and political, was largely confined to Jackson county. Born in 1839 in Dearborn county, he grew to manhood there. He went to Indianapolis before he was of legal age, where he studied law under Hon. Cyrus L. Dunham, who was then Secretary of State. In 1860 he engaged in the practice of law in Brownstown, and soon became prominent at that bar. Six years later he was admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of the United States. In 1862 and 1864 he was elected to the Legislature. In 1870 he represented his district in the State Senate. He was appointed by President Grant on March 26, 1873, Secretary of the Territory of Wyoming, which position he held until his resignation. In 1875 Mr. Brown became a resident of Seymour, where he made his home until he died, in 1899. Mr. Brown was elected to Congress in 1888, 1890 and 1892, where his abilities received recognition by his appointment as chairman of the committee on elections. He was a candidate for re-election in the primaries in 1894, but was defeated by Mr. Stockslager, who was defeated in the election. Mr. Brown was always a Democrat, but did not support Horace Greeley because he did not consider that nomination as consistent with his views as a Democrat.

Influential in local political history of Jackson county we name the following men and regret that space forbids more extended notice. Brownstown was the home of Judge Ralph Applewhite, a native of Mississippi, who spent a long and active life in the political affairs of Jackson county, contributing to Democratic policies at all times, but never a self-seeking politician.

John H. Burrell, a soldier in the Black Hawk war and in the Civil war, was long prominent in the councils of the Democratic party in Jackson county and lived to a ripe old age upon his farm near Brownstown.

Others who were equally prominent were James F. Carr of Carr township, Judge Frank Emerson, Colonel John J. Cummins, James K. Hamilton, Hon. John R. Hamilton and several members of the Robertson family, all of Brownstown and Hamilton townships.

Of the earlier Democratic politicians of Jackson county none are now living. Hon. Alexander A. Davidson is perhaps the oldest and his memory goes back over the greatest range of political activity. From him much of this material is gathered. He has been active in politics of Jackson county for more than fifty years and is now living, sound, hale and hearty, honored by many citizens for his manifold talents and hearty good nature.

If space would permit extended notice would be given Hon. Thomas M. Honan, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and later Attorney-General of the State; Hon. Joseph H. Shea, until recently Judge of the Appellate Court and now U. S. Ambassador to Santiago, Chile; Senator Edward P. Elsner, Hon. O. O. Swails, now Judge of the Circuit Court, and Hon. S. A. Barnes, all of whom are now living in Seymour.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF JASPER COUNTY

By William R. Nowels

DURING the session of the Legislature of 1834-35, the question of the disposition of the unorganized area of the Northwest Territory came up and after some discussion and investigation an act was passed forming the counties of Jasper, Newton, Pulaski, Starke, Marshall, Fulton, Adams, Wells, Whitley, DeKalb, Noble, Kosciusko, Steuben and Jay, of which the following is in relation to Jasper and Newton:

Section 12. That all the territory within the following boundary shall constitute a county to be known by the name of Jasper. Beginning at the southeast corner of Section 33, Township 24 north, Range 6 west, thence west to the line of the State of Illinois, thence north with the State line thirty miles, thence east with the line dividing Townships 28 and 29 north to the northeast corner of Section 4, Township 28 north, Range 6 west, thence south with the section line thirty miles to the place of beginning.

By these boundaries it will be observed that the original county of Jasper included the whole of Benton county, the present townships of Carpenter, Jordan and so much of Marion and Newton townships south of the line dividing Townships 28 and 29 north, together with the townships of Grant, Iroquois, Jefferson and Washington in the present limits of Newton county.

In 1836 Porter county was organized and in the year following Lake county, each of which took all the territory north of the Kankakee river.

In 1838 Jasper, which had been attached to White county, was organized as an independent county, Newton county being attached for some purposes and for others subject to White. In the following year, however, the Legislature passed "an act relative to the location of the county seat of Jasper, and for other purposes."

It was made the duty of the commissioners, in addition to the duties assigned them, to examine the survey of Jasper and Newton, with a view to their being consolidated, and if, after examination the commissioners are satisfied that the interests of the two counties would be promoted by the union of the same, they are hereby authorized to fix the seat of justice in said enlarged territory, taking into view the peculiar situation of said territory in regard to prairie, timber, water privileges, and the known wishes of the citizens of different parts of Jasper county being attached to other counties, and the seat of justice if consolidated shall be called Newton. This act was approved January 29, 1839.

The commissioners thus appointed found the plan of consolidating the two counties feasible, and accordingly located the county seat at the Falls of the Iroquois river with the name of Newton, thus striking the county of that name from the map of the State. In 1840 the county of Benton was formed, taking its territory from Jasper, the latter receiving by way of compensation thirty sections adjoining the southeast angle and now principally contained in Milroy township. In 1859, however, Newton county was revived, though shorn of much of its early dimensions, leaving Jasper in its present shape, and having a dimension of 975 square miles.

AGRICULTURE.

The chief products are corn, barley, wheat and the usual varieties of vegetables found in this range of climate. Wheat was in early years sown upon the first plowing of the sod and bore good crops, but of late years this practice has not been successful. Wheat is not found so well adapted to the soil as to form a staple crop in recent years, and while it is still sown to a considerable extent, it is not the crop upon which the farmers place the most dependence. The county is especially adapted to the raising of stock. As a grazing county it has scarcely an equal. Grass grows here in abundance and truly cattle "lie down in green pastures."

SETTLEMENT OF THE COUNTY.

The first actual settler within the present limits of Jasper county was William Donahue. Attracted by the fur-bearing game to be found here in great abundance and the prospect of trading with the Indians who possessed the land in considerable numbers, he came to what is now Gillam township as early as 1832. The next settlement was made at the falls of the Iroquois (now Rensselaer) in 1834 by Jos. Yeoman, John and David Nowels, and in the latter part of the year a settlement was formed in the eastern part of the county by Thomas Randle and George Culp. Owing to a confusion of dates it is difficult to name all who might be considered pioneers.

Owing to the destruction of the records it is impossible to give a full and correct list of those who have occupied official positions in the county. George W. Spitler (Democrat) was Clerk from 1838 to 1856 and was Recorder until 1856, serving as Clerk, Auditor and Recorder at the same time. Those who were elected as Democrats were Charles Price and John F. Majors. For Auditor since George W. Spitler have been Ira W. Yeoman, Henry Barkley and Ezra C. Nowels, all Democrats. As Recorder since George W. Spitler is Judson Hunt (Democrat). Two Democrats have served as Treasurer, Jacob Merkle and William Hoover, Sr. For Sheriff the present incumbent is William I. Hoover, Jr.

Two Democrats have been Surveyors, Wesley Spitler and Daniel B. Miller. Four Democrats have held the office of county commissioners: George H. Brown, George Major, Charles F. Stackhouse and ——— Hershman.

THE PRESS.

Up to 1853 political lines had not been closely drawn. At this date the Jasper Banner was established as a Democratic journal. In the campaign of 1856 the lines between Democrats and Republicans were sharply drawn and the Banner strongly espoused the cause of Democracy. The Jasper Banner ceased publication in 1861, and from this date until 1877 the county was without a Democratic organ. In 1877 the Democratic Sentinel was started by James W. McEwen, who continued its publication until the infirmities of old age compelled its suspension. In April, 1898, the Jasper County Democrat was established by Frank Babcock and is now the recognized organ of the party. The Wheatfield Review is published in Wheatfield, Ind., by John Buoe. Its politics is Democratic and the paper is ably edited.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF JAY COUNTY

THE history of a nation is ordinarily written around the lives of a few great men, and so it is with the history of Jay county Democracy. A few strong, rugged men, guided by the ideals of Jefferson and Jackson, have left an indelible imprint upon the political life of their county.

Probably the strongest individual force in the building of Jay county Democracy was Robert Huey. He came to Jay county in the early thirties, built his cabin in the clearing, where only the howl of the wolf or the scream of the panther broke the silence of the trackless forest. His was the spirit of the pioneer. Meeting every obstacle, enduring every hardship with indomitable courage, he assisted in the building of a civilization which is the greatest heritage ever bequeathed to the human race.

He was a physical giant and his defeat of "Wabash Jones," the then undefeated champion of eastern Indiana, is as famous in the annals of Jay county as was the overthrow of the giant Goliath by the youth David in the annals of biblical lore.

Bob Huey, as he was commonly known, surrounded himself with a group of men, strong both mentally and physically, who earnestly believed in the principles of Democracy as understood by Jefferson and Jackson, and who, during those early days, unselfishly and courageously maintained and defended those principles, by physical force if need be. He was elected sheriff of Jay county in 1843, served three sessions in the lower house of the general assembly, one term in the state senate, and in 1868, when criticized upon his opposition to the granting of the franchise to the negro, he resigned from the senate, went back to the people upon that issue and was triumphantly re-elected. His life was unselfishly devoted to rebuilding his county and advancing the cause of Democracy, and has been a splendid inspiration to succeeding generations. Among his contemporaries who were most prominently associated with him were: Samuel O. Shoaff, George W. Templer, Joseph J. McKinney, John Coulson, Lott Coulson, John J. Adair, Daniel Atkinson and Jason Whipple.

Mr. Huey was also actively identified with all movements beneficial to his county, was trustee of Liber college and built the first court house for Jay county, for which he received the magnificent sum of $125.

With such a rugged character as Bob Huey as an example, it is only natural that Jay county should develop a host of strong, capable Democratic leaders, and Mr. Huey lived to see such men as John M. Smith, William Harkins, William Humphries, John Hayes, Palmer J. Smith, Joseph B. Wilson, John T. Hanlin, and many others take up the work which he had laid down. Probably the strongest character during this period was John M. Smith, who was elected to the state senate in 1880 and served in the sessions of 1881 and 1883. He was later elected to the circuit bench, where he served with distinction, and later was elected to the lower house of the general assembly, where he served during the session of 1909.

Jay county democracy during her entire history has only had three representatives in the state senate, those being Bob Huey, John M. Smith and James R. Fleming, but all of these men have splendidly upheld the traditions of the Democratic party and have been recognized as leaders in their county and state.

Probably Jay county's most picturesque character at the opening of the twentieth century was Jacob F. Denney, whose independent spirit has been a source of joy and sorrow to his many friends. As the Democratic nominee for Congress in 1916, he set an entirely new precedent by advocating the things he believed, instead of the doctrines which seemed to be the most popular. This was such a radical departure that it encompassed his defeat; but, "Too fond of the right to pursue the expedient," he went down with colors flying and opinions unchanged. Possessing a rare degree of literary genius, he wrote a series of political articles for the city campaign of 1913, which displayed all the genius of a Swift or a Pope, and assisted materially in the election of the ticket. He believes, with Izaak Walton, that "Those who have eaten, and drank, and laughed, and angled, and sung, and slept securely, and rose next morn, and cast away care, and sung, and laughed, and angled" are those who enjoy the richest blessings which God, or this old earth, can bestow.

Probably no county in Indiana has produced a more virile and unselfish Democracy than Jay county. This may result from the fact that the party has never attracted to her ranks any men of great wealth. Thus the dominant controlling factor has been the maintaining and advancing of the principles of Democracy as understood by our forefathers. We have believed that the Democratic party could better serve our country than the Republican party, that a public office was a public trust; and have insisted that honesty and efficiency should be the standard by which the acts of all Democratic candidates should be measured. As a consequence, no Democratic official of Jay county has ever borne the stain of a dishonest official act. Thus the history of Jay county Democracy is a history of achievement, and, although Jay county down through the years has been normally Republican, the Democrats have elected a majority of their county candidates. In 1904, in common with almost every other county in the state, Jay county went Republican by a large majority, but in 1906, through the magnificent efforts of the county ticket, led by John A. M. Adair, as a candidate for Congress, Jay county went Democratic by a large majority; and since that time the Republicans have elected only a very few men to office. When the Democrats took charge of affairs on January 1, 1907, Jay county was deeply in debt, the tax rate was high and many public improvements were needed. Under Democratic management, all the indebtedness was paid, many improvements were constructed, the tax rate was materially lowered, and by the end of 1913 a surplus of more than $130,000 had accumulated in the treasury. By this time Jay county was feeling the need of a new court house, and a movement was started to procure the same. Public opinion favored it, architects were employed, plans were adopted, and in 1916 the contract was let to the Dawson Construction Company of Pittsburgh, Pa. This magnificent structure is now almost completed and is generally conceded to be the finest court house in Indiana. However, the thing most pleasing to Jay county Democrats is, that this splendid structure was honestly built by Democratic officials without having to borrow a dollar, and for every dollar that was expended a dollar in value was received.

This same spirit has been manifest in the administration of the affairs of the city of Portland. In 1908, although the city is normally about 300 Republican, the Democrats carried the city by a majority of approximately 500, electing Dr. C. A. Paddock mayor. When the Democrats took control, the city was in debt approximately $100,000; the electric light and water works, which was municipally owned, was losing money; thousands of dollars of city warrants were held by banks, marked unpaid for want of funds; and the financial future of the city seemed almost hopeless. During Mayor Paddock's first administration, the electric light plant was rebuilt; many needed public improvements were made; the tax rate was materially reduced; more than half the city debt was paid; and the electric light and water plant from being a money loser had become the best money earner in the city. At the close of the first term Mayor Paddock and the entire Democratic ticket were triumphantly re-elected, and at the end of their second term the Democratic administration turned over the city to their successors with every penny of indebtedness paid and with $14,000 in cash in the treasury and a record of public achievement probably unexcelled by any administration in Indiana or elsewhere.

In recent years Jay county has developed a host of capable Democrats, the most prominent of which is John A. M. Adair. Elected many years ago as city clerk of the city of Portland, later as clerk of the circuit court, then a member of the general assembly of Indiana, and advanced to service in Congress, where he served for five successive terms, then as the nominee of his party for Governor of Indiana, his record has been one of brilliant achievements.

Another of our most prominent citizens is Judge James J. Moran, who has served as judge of the circuit bench, was appointed to the appellate bench by Governor Ralston, and is now the nominee of his party for the supreme bench of Indiana. He is a jurist of recognized ability and a tower of strength to his party.

One of the most active figures in Jay county, since his nomination and election as prosecuting attorney in 1906, is Senator James R. Fleming. Re-elected to that office in 1908, he was elected to the lower house of the general assembly in 1912 and in 1914 was advanced to the state senate, serving with distinction in the lower house in 1913 and in the sessions of 1915 and 1917 as state senator, in which capacity he was a recognized leader.

One of the strongest characters developed during this period was Matthew H. Hart of Dunkirk, whose chief ambition was not to serve himself, but to serve his country, his party and his friends. He was not politically ambitious, and the only political office held by him was as mayor of Dunkirk, in which position he made the best mayor Dunkirk ever had. As a delegate to the national convention at Baltimore he assisted in the nomination of Woodrow Wilson. He was intensely loyal to his party and to his friends. His heart was as big as the whole outdoors. He possessed that spirit of charity, kindness and sympathy which sweeps the existence of time and opens the gates to everlasting and eternal happiness. When he died, in September, 1917, Jay county Democracy lost a son whose kindness found an outlet in noble deeds.

Jay county for many years has had probably the most active Democratic party organization of any county in Indiana. As soon as one campaign is over, it begins to prepare for the next; as a consequence the county has been organized down to the grass roots and possesses more active fighting Democrats per capita than, probably, any other county in the state. This makes it impossible to mention all of our prominent Democrats in this limited space, because Jay county has developed not only one, but a thousand "village Hampdens who with dauntless breast" withstood the shock of the Republican columns and earned undying fame.

During the past decade, the men who have been largely responsible for the achievements and success of the Democratic party in Jay county are the following: Malcomb V. Skinner, now district chairman of the eighth district, and formerly prosecuting attorney for two terms and city attorney under the last administration; Frank Gillespie, now county chairman and a member of the law firm of Moran and Gillespie, and formerly clerk of the circuit court for eight years; Judge E. E. McGriff, who now occupies the circuit bench; O. A. Rawlins, ex-county chairman and postmaster; E. A. McKee, the genial editor of the Portland Sun; Grover Bishop, clerk of the circuit court; John Bonifas, county auditor; Alpheus A. Adair, ex-county chairman; W. Lea Smith, ex-county auditor; Samuel J. King, ex-county sheriff; Joseph B. Wilson, ex-county recorder; Lawrence Hayes, ex-treasurer; R. H. Hartford, county attorney; Thomas Fleming, the present sheriff; John W. M. Cunningham, ex-sheriff, C. E. Schwartz; Dr. Schwartz; Dr. Mark M. Moran; Dr. J. E. Nixon; Clem Wilson, deputy auditor; John E. Adair, oil inspector; and many others. Jay county during this period has given to her county many of her favorite sons, and Captain Ralph Ewry, Lieutenant John J. O'Neill (ex-prosecuting attorney) and aviators Fred Becholdt and Tod Whipple have enlisted in the hosts of freedom and soon

"Will strike for liberty blow on blow
Where the battling war gods ride."

It is only natural that Jay county should have given birth to such a sterling Democracy, for in the early day Jay county was covered with trackless forests and impassable swamps, over which for years the hostile savage held undisputed sway. In those days, one of the most famous Indian battles was fought near the eastern borders of the county, the Battle of Old Ft. Recovery, the Indians under Little Turtle and Tecumseh marching through Jay county to reach the battle-ground. The overcoming of these hardships, the building of those frontier homes, each of which was a milestone that marked the pathway of human progress and advancement, made certain the development of a sturdy manhood and womanhood the like of which had never before been known. Realism or romance furnishes no more striking and picturesque figure than the early pioneer who bulldozed those frontier homes.

It was due to their wisdom and courage, their faith and their virtue, that the spirit of liberty, equality and opportunity which had been planted in the virgin soil of the American wilderness was preserved to bear richer and riper fruit.

Those forests have now been cleared away. Those swamps have been drained. Where once the savage red man pursued his prey are golden fields covered with the ripening grain of a bumper crop. On the site of those frontier homes, modern dwellings have arisen, containing all the conveniences of city life. The old prairie schooner has given way to the ubiquitous Ford or the six-cylinder touring car. The blazed trail through the wilderness was only a forerunner of the hundreds of miles of "ribbon-smooth" highways. The poetic Salamonia and Limberlost, which have been made historic in song and story, no longer wind and ripple through the overhanging elms and sycamores, but on either side, as far as the eye can reach, stretches forth the green and fertile fields of as rich and as happy a countryside as can be found under God's footstool. Those thousands of liberty-loving homes which dot this countryside, many of them with a service flag in the window, bear silent promise to the fact that this nation, under God, and with the leadership of Woodrow Wilson, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

In closing it is fitting to paraphrase the words of Dr. Boteler and say that "Doubtless God could have made a better county than Jay county, or a more sterling Democracy than that of Jay county, but doubtless God never did."

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF JEFFERSON COUNTY

JEFFERSON COUNTY was originally a part of Clark county—it was organized as a separate county by Act of the Legislature of the Territory of Indiana in 1811—this new county then embraced the territory now composing the counties of Jefferson, Scott, Jennings, Ripley and Switzerland. In a few years these counties were set apart from Jefferson and made into separate county organizations, the last being Ripley county, which was organized in 1818. Since that time Jefferson county has not been changed in boundary. The town (now city) of Madison has always been the county seat of this county. It was laid out and platted by John Paul, a revolutionary soldier, a native of Pennsylvania, but coming to Madison from Hardin county, Kentucky.

The early politics of Jefferson county, especially as to local matters, was personal rather than partisan. Colonel Paul filled every office in the county at some time, and was never opposed by anyone for election to such offices. Colonel R. C. Talbot was Clerk of the Court for many years and never had an opponent for that position. The Meeks, Alexander A. and Noble, Williamson Dunn, George Logan and perhaps others filled the most important and responsible offices in the county from time to time, and were elected without opposition. Some of these men were Democrats and some were Federalists originally, and afterward Whigs, but none of them ran for office upon a party ticket. In National and State elections Jefferson county at the first showed a decided predilection toward the Federalist party, and afterward toward the Whig party, and latterly toward the Republican party. Never until 1910 did the Democratic party, as a party, elect a majority of the candidates upon their county ticket in this county.

About 1828 party lines, in local affairs, began to be drawn. The Whigs, having the majority in the county, elected practically all the county officers—once in a while a popular Democrat would be elected, or an unpopular Whig would be defeated. The Democratic leadership at this time was centered in United States Senator William Hendricks. Mr. Hendricks was a son-in-law of John Paul, the founder of the city of Madison, and the most wealthy and influential citizen of the county. He came to Madison in 1814 and entered at once actively into the practice of the law, and also edited and published the first newspaper issued in Jefferson county, the Eagle. This paper was a Democratic party organ in name, but in fact it was more Mr. Hendricks' personal organ. William Hendricks was a man of good ability, and at once became a political leader with a large following and great influence, not only in the county but in the State as well. He was an uncle of Thomas A. Hendricks, who in later years was the undisputed leader of Indiana Democracy. Mr. Hendricks was first elected to the Territorial Legislature in 1814—he also held, either by election or appointment, two or three county offices. In 1816 he was the secretary of the convention called to frame a constitution for the new State, and from 1817 to 1823 was the Representative of the State in Congress. From 1823 to 1825 he was Governor, and from 1825 to 1837 United States Senator. When he retired from the United States Senate he also retired from politics, and thereafter the Democratic party in Jefferson county followed a new leadership. Jesse D. Bright, a young lawyer, who came to Madison from the State of New York with his father, David J. Bright, and his brothers, Michael G. and George M., about this time, forged to the front as the Democratic leader in the county. It is too much, perhaps, to say that he was the leader in 1837, for he was then a very young man, but twenty-four years of age, but he was even then one of the most active and aggressive among the Democratic politicians of the county. Hon. David Hillis was generally looked upon as the Democratic leader during the five or six years immediately succeeding the retirement of Senator Hendricks. Mr. Hillis was a farmer living near the city of Madison—he had been an officer in the militia and was personally the most popular Democrat that Jefferson county produced before the Civil War. He was elected to the Legislature first in 1828, and in the '30's served two full terms in the State Senate. In 1837 he became Lieutenant-Governor of the State. Gathered around him was a coterie of active and popular men, such as Michael G. Bright, an elder brother of Jesse D., a man of fine legal attainment and a shrewd politician withal, and it was he who pushed the younger brother to the front.

The Whig party during this period, viz., from 1828 to 1840, was led by a number of very able and influential men, chief among whom were Williamson Dunn, a farmer living near Hanover, and the father of William McKee Dunn, who later represented the district of which Jefferson county was a part in Congress, and then became Judge Advocate-General of the United States Army. General Milton Stapp, a lawyer and business man of Madison, and Joseph G. Marshall, a lawyer, who located at Madison in 1828, were also conspicuous in the leadership and control of the Whig party.

Beginning with the year 1840 Joseph G. Marshall had succeeded to the acknowledged leadership of the Whigs in Jefferson county, and it was only a few years until he was the acknowledged leader of the Whigs in the State of Indiana. He soon drew to him a number of very active workers, who afterward became celebrated locally as leaders of the new Republican party. Among these young men were John R. Cravens, who represented Jefferson county in the State Senate for many years, first as a Whig and then as a Republican; William McKee Dunn, who represented Jefferson and the adjoining counties in Congress in 1861 to 1863, and again from 1865 to 1867; David C. Branham of North Madison, who was a member of the Indiana House of Representatives for many years, and sometimes Speaker of that body. Cravens and Dunn were lawyers and Branham was a business man. In 1843 Jesse D. Bright was elected Lieutenant-Governor of Indiana. He had now become the acknowledged leader of the Democratic party in Jefferson county, although he was but thirty years of age. In 1845 he was elected to the United States Senate, and re-elected in 1851, and again in 1857. In 1861 he was expelled by that body, it having been shown that he wrote a letter of introduction for a friend who desired to see Jefferson Davis, the President of the Confederate States, for the purpose of introducing an improvement in firearms. Jesse D. Bright was a most virile and energetic leader, and up until the time of the Civil War his word was law and his acts were gospel with the Democrats of Jefferson county. Rolla Doolittle, John Kirk, John Marsh, Robert Right Rea and a dozen other local politicians executed his commands without questioning, and they maintained a good organization at all times and gave the Whig party determined battle at every election. Once in a great while they succeeded in electing a county officer, or a member of the Legislature, but not often. In 1844 Nathan B. Palmer, a farmer and business man of the county, was elected State Treasurer. In 1846 Joseph L. White, a lawyer practicing in the city of Madison, was elected to Congress. He was not re-elected, and was afterward appointed a Minister to one of the Central American countries, and died there. He was a man of fair ability, but was not an organizer and made no special impress upon the politics of Jefferson county. Senator Bright, as one of the leaders of the Democratic party in the State, antagonized Governor Joseph A. Wright, and the rivalry between them became very bitter.

In 1852 Michael C. Garber, editor of the Madison Courier, which was at the time the Democratic party organ of Jefferson county, referred to Governor Wright in a very complimentary manner. This favorable notice of his rival irritated Senator Bright, and he wrote a letter from Washington, D. C., where he was in attendance upon the sessions of the U. S. Senate, to Judge William M. Taylor, a lawyer at Madison, in which he excoriated Garber and declared he would drive him out of the Democratic party. There were two men named William M. Taylor living at Madison, and the letter was not delivered to the man of that name for whom it was intended, but to the other Taylor, who gave it to Mr. Garber. Mr. Garber at once came out in his paper for Governor Wright and against Senator Bright. Shortly afterward Senator Bright came home and called a meeting of the Democrats of the county. At this meeting the Senator delivered a two-hour speech, denouncing Garber as a pretended and not a real Democrat and demanding that he be publicly read out of the party, and at the conclusion of his speech he offered a series of resolutions to that effect. Mr. Garber was present and spoke in defense of his actions. He declared that he was as good a Democrat as Senator Bright, but boldly stated that he would not submit to the dictation of the Senator. He read a letter from Governor Wright attesting to his democracy, but the Democratic party leaders there assembled had followed Senator Bright in a number of hard-fought campaigns and they refused to leave his leadership, and the assembly adopted the resolutions offered, only three votes being cast against them. Mr. Garber continued to support the Democratic national and State tickets, however, but opened up a vigorous warfare upon Senator Bright and the local organization. In 1854 Mr. Garber took the Courier into the newly-formed People's party, and from there, in the next campaign, into the Republican party, and that paper, under his management, and under the management of his son, Michael C. Garber, Jr., who succeeded to its control in the 70's, has continued to this day to be a tower of strength to the Republican party of Jefferson county. It is probable that if the unfortunate rupture between Senator Bright and Michael C. Garber had not occurred in 1852, Jefferson county would have been placed in the Democratic column before 1860, as Senator Bright was an alert and vigorous leader and had formed an organization constituted of active and shrewd party workers—a much better organization than the Whig party ever had in the county and a better organization than the Republicans were able to perfect until after the Civil War, but the open breach in the party, led by Mr. Garber, was a serious handicap to the party's success. The Courier was the second Democratic paper established in the county. The Eagle, edited by William Hendricks, had ceased publication in the county in the 20's. In the 30's the Courier was established and it had done good and valiant work for the cause of democracy. Rolla Doolittle, one of Senator Bright's staunchest henchmen, was the editor for a while, then Samuel F. and John I. Covington had charge of the paper and maintained it as a Democratic organ. In 1849 Mr. Garber took control, and soon thereafter occurred the trouble between him and Senator Bright. To replace the Courier a new paper was established in 1852 and named the Madisonian. This paper lasted less than a year, but while in existence proved to be a snappy and spirited advocate of Democratic policies and principles. Its editor was a bright young Irishman, named Robert S. Sproule. Despite the fact that Jefferson county was normally Whig and then Republican by a safe majority, and further that the Democracy had no strong and reliable newspaper organ, still the organization led by Bright, and counseled by his brother, Michael G. Bright, and sustained by Kirk, Doolittle, Marsh, Rea and others, was enabled to hold the opposition down to a narrow margin of a majority in national and State elections, and sometimes it succeeded in electing a Democrat to local office. Joseph W. Chapman, quite an able lawyer of Madison, was elected to the bench. Tyree A. Pogue, a well-known business man, was elected County Treasurer, Robert Right Rea was Sheriff for several years, and John Kirk was elected Commissioner twice, and there were other Democrats elected to office in the county besides these men, but generally as the result of the dissatisfaction of the opposition with their candidates.

In 1851, when Senator Bright was a candidate for re-election to the United States Senate, he was opposed for this office by Joseph G. Marshall, who had been his opponent when he was a candidate six years before. Marshall was the leader of the Whig party, not only in Jefferson county, but in the State as well. He had been the candidate of his party for United States Senator in 1843, when the Legislature was Whig on joint ballot, that party having a majority in the House of Representatives that overcame the Democratic majority in the Senate by two votes. The Senate had refused to go into joint session with the House for the election of a Senator, and in this manner prevented the election of anyone to the United States Senate by that Legislature. The next Legislature was Democratic, and it elected Mr. Bright to the Senate. From that time on the personal relations between Bright and Marshall were not cordial, so, during the campaign of 1851, Senator Bright took exceptions to some remarks made by Mr. Marshall in the course of a speech delivered at Ritchie's Mill, some miles out in the country from Madison. Mr. Marshall, in effect, charged Senator Bright with bad faith upon a public matter then under discussion. Bright resented this charge, Marshall reiterated it, and Bright wrote him a letter that was regarded by Marshall as insulting. Marshall replied in a letter that was, in effect, a challenge to fight a duel. The two gentlemen, accompanied by some friends, went to Louisville, Ky., for the purpose of arranging a meeting place and time for the duel, but their friends intervened. The matter was amicably adjusted, and they returned home without coming together upon the field of honor, but they never spoke to each other afterward.

The Whig party and its great leader in Jefferson county died about the same time, as Joseph G. Marshall passed away in 1855. The new-formed Republican party succeeded to the full strength of the Whigs in the county and at once became the leading party. The four men who were recognized as the all-powerful leaders of this party, from 1855 until the Greeley campaign in 1872, were John R. Cravens, William McKee Dunn, David C. Branham and M. C. Garber. They were all men of unusual ability and good standing, and aided by the patriotic feeling developed by the Civil war, which they exploited to the full, they built up a very powerful political organization and absolutely controlled both nominations and elections in the county during the period named. Cravens served nearly all that time in the State Senate, and was the President of the Senate and ex-officio Lieutenant-Governor from 1861 to '65. Branham was a member of the House of Representatives during the greater part of that period and Speaker of the House a portion of the time. Dunn was elected to Congress in 1860, defeated for re-election in 1862 and elected again in 1864. At the expiration of this last term he was appointed assistant judge advocate-general of the United States army, later becoming advocate-general, which caused his removal to Washington City and permanent retirement from the politics of the county in the late sixties.

Mr. Garber held the very responsible position of paymaster with the United States army during the war, but continued to edit and publish the Courier, and through its columns dealt the Democracy of Jefferson county many a savage blow.

During the first part of this period, that is, from 1855 to 1861, Senator Bright remained in the saddle as the leader of the local Democracy, but when he was expelled from the United States Senate he left Madison and some time thereafter went to reside in the State of Kentucky. Henry W. Harrington, a very able lawyer, who had come to Madison from the State of New York a few years before, was put forward as the titular leader of the party in place of Bright, but the real control of party affairs, for twenty years, remained in the hands of Senator Bright's cabinet, as his faithful henchmen, Doolittle, Kirk and Marsh, were termed. Of this trio Mr. Kirk, commonly known as Captain Kirk, was easily the leader and the more influential and resourceful in political matters. Kirk was a building contractor and a good business man. He was uneducated, being barely able to read and write, but he was a man of fine presence, cool and deliberate judgment, sterling honesty and worth and a born leader of men. As the years went on he became the one and controlling master mind of the Democratic organization. Harrington was elected to Congress in 1862, defeating Dunn. In 1864 Dunn defeated him for reelection, and in 1866 Harrington was again elected, but was defeated in 1868 by General Morton C. Hunter. Shortly thereafter he left the State, going first to St. Louis, thence to Indianapolis, where he died in 1879. Among Captain Kirk's most valuable lieutenants and party workers in the Democratic organization, from 1861 to the early eighties, were M. A. Gavitt, an auctioneer; Isaac C. Earhart, a farmer and business man of Kent; Horace Byfield, a farmer and miller of Lancaster; Hiram Francisco, Sr., a farmer and business man of Wirt; Charles A. Korbly (father of ex-Congressman C. A. Korbly and Hon. Bernard Korbly of Indianapolis), a lawyer of ripe attainments and the son-in-law of Michael G. Bright, and William Howard, who was the city treasurer of Madison during nearly all the seventies. Howard was short in his accounts and was made the butt of vicious attacks in the columns of the Star, a Republican newspaper published in Madison during the late seventies and early eighties by John D. Simpson. Howard resented these attacks and got into an altercation with Simpson in 1879, which resulted in Simpson shooting him to death. In 1872 John R. Cravens, who had come to be recognized as the most influential among the Republican leaders of the county, followed Greeley into the Liberal Republican party, and after that campaign affiliated with the Democrats until his death, which occurred in 1899. At this time the removal of Mr. Dunn to Washington, the appointment of Mr. Garber as postmaster of Madison and his retirement from active party control, to an extent, and the impairment of Mr. Branham's activities by reason of approaching age and ill health (he died in 1876) left the Republican party of Jefferson county practically leaderless for a short time. As a result the well-disciplined Democratic organization, under Captain Kirk, scored a partial victory in the election of 1874 by electing M. A. Gavitt sheriff, Charles W. Allfrey recorder and Messrs. Fred Harper, J. W. Shadday and James Jackson commissioners. Four years previous Hiram Francisco, Sr., had been elected senator and two years later James J. Sering, the only Democratic member of a large and powerful Republican family, was elected clerk of the circuit court, so at this time there were more Democrats holding office in the court house at Madison than at any period in the history of the county before that time, and more than at any period in the history of the county after that time until 1910. In 1876 the Republicans got together and elected all their county ticket except treasurer, the Democrats succeeding in electing John W. Scott, who was the last Democrat to hold office in the county until 1902. In 1878 the Democrats nominated a popular ticket, and there was considerable dissatisfaction among the Republicans on account of some of their nominees, and Captain Kirk and his aides worked unceasingly to wrest the county from the control of their opponents. In this they were very effectively aided by the Hon. Charles L. Jewett, who was then a young lawyer practicing at Scottsburg. Jefferson and Scott counties had composed the Fifth Judicial Circuit for some years and Mr. Jewett, supported by the large Democratic majority of Scott county, had succeeded in being elected prosecuting attorney from 1873 to 1877, and in this year, 1878, he was the Democratic nominee for judge of the circuit. Vincent P. Kirk, a young attorney, and the son of Captain Kirk, was the nominee for prosecutor with Mr. Jewett. William H. Rogers, druggist, of Madison, and a very popular man, was the candidate for representative, and the old wheel-horse, Isaac C. Earhart, of Kent, for sheriff; Mr. Scott being the candidate for re-election to the office of treasurer and Mr. Allfrey for re-election to the office of recorder. The Republicans did not have a strong organization, but they had some shrewd and not overly scrupulous politicians in charge of their organization, conspicuous among whom were Dr. W. A. Collins, James Y. Allison, judge of the court and candidate for re-election, and John W. Linck, a prominent attorney. The Democrats at the spring election had elected James Brennan, a shoemaker, trustee of Madison township, the township in which the city of Madison was located. This was before the day of the Australian ballot, and there were but two precincts in the whole township, including the city, and Brennan, by virtue of his office, was the inspector at one of these precincts. Nearly 1,500 votes were cast in this precinct and Brennan was bribed to take out of the box 200 Democratic tickets and substitute therefor 200 Republican ballots. This he was enabled to do by the inefficiency of the other Democratic members of the board, and in this manner the Democratic candidates for judge, prosecutor, representative, sheriff, treasurer and recorder were counted out and their Republican opponents counted in. The fraud was suspected at once, and an investigation ordered, but Brennan denied the facts, and nothing came of it. Brennan rapidly went to the bad, resigned his office in disgrace and before his death acknowledged his guilt, and gave full details of the matter. In 1880 the Republicans of the county perfected an organization that had been growing for some time. It was composed of a group of exceedingly shrewd and active men, foremost among whom were the Graham brothers, Thomas, William P. and James, the two former business men and the latter just a plain politician and officeholder, but the keenest and shrewdest organizer, perhaps, that the county has ever known in all its political history. A. D. Vansdol, lawyer; M. C. Garber, Jr., who had succeeded to the management of the Courier, and James H. Crozier, a business man, were the other most prominent members of this organization. These gentlemen, in addition to their political tact, were men of high standing in the community and, as a result, they built up an organization that increased the Republican majority, in fact, practically doubled it, as compared with the majority given to that party in the seventies. As this effective Republican organization grew up the Democratic organization weakened and fell to pieces. Captain Kirk was getting old, and he soon died. His faithful lieutenants mentioned herein were likewise getting old, and they all dropped out of the political game within a few years, excepting Mr. Korbly. In the place of leadership there was chaos. By this time John R. Cravens, familiarly known as Judge Cravens, had come to be looked upon as a Democrat of standing. His scholarly attainments and high character naturally drew many to follow his lead, but he was now getting to be an old man, and while he took part in the councils of the Democracy for many years, indeed until his death, he did not exhibit that virility and power that marked his career as a Republican leader. Joseph T. Brashear, for many years mayor of Madison, was another leader of some prominence. He was a mechanic and a man of considerable natural force, but his political influence was confined to the city of Madison. Joseph C. Abbott, owner of the Madison & Milton Ferry, who had immigrated to Madison from Kentucky in the late seventies, now began to take an active part in the party affairs, and in 1882 was elected chairman of the Democratic county central committee. Abbott was a shrewd and forceful character, but he was not an organizer—in fact, he was just the reverse, and in a short time he incurred antagonisms that rent the party into warring factions. The first great mistake made was the abandonment of a party ticket in 1882 and the putting forth of an independent ticket in the county, composed in part of Republicans and in part of Democrats, endorsed and supported by the Democratic organization. This was commonly known as the Kickapoo ticket, and it was ingloriously defeated by the regular Republican ticket at the election, excepting only the candidate for state senator, James Hill, a wealthy farmer of Brooksbury, and a Republican, who defeated Rev. James W. Lanham of Manville, the Republican candidate. This was caused by the temperance issue, which was injected into the campaign, Mr. Hill being supported by the liberal element, as Rev. Mr. Lanham was avowedly for the prohibition amendment to the Constitution of the State, which was then pending in the Legislature. Another element in local politics now appeared in the person of Martin A. Barnett. Mr. Barnett, in 1881, came from Danville, Ind., and purchased the Madison Herald, the local organ of the Democracy, from Lin C. Jones. The Herald had grown out of the Progress, a paper started early in the seventies by Nicholas Manville, and which was the first pronounced Democratic paper in the county since the Courier had deserted to the opposition and the Madisonian had suspended publication in the early fifties. Upon Mr. Manville's death, in 1876, Mr. Jones had taken over his outfit and changed the name of the paper to the Herald and continued to publish it as a Democratic paper until 1881, when Mr. Barnett purchased it. The Herald was then a weekly paper, but soon afterward Mr. Barnett added a daily edition to it. Barnett, in 1885, was appointed postmaster at Madison by President Cleveland, and this made more trouble. Captain Kirk, the old Democratic wheel-horse, who had practically retired from politics, and who was nearing the end of his life, was an applicant for the office, and he and his friends took the failure of the President to appoint him very much to heart, and there were charges and counter-charges of double-crossing by the local leaders made by Kirk's friends and hurled back by Barnett's. In 1887 Barnett sold the Herald to one J. C. Bartlett, from southwestern Indiana, and he to Lin C. Jones, the former proprietor. In 1889 these parties and Mr. Barnett himself all became involved in a lawsuit over the ownership of the paper, and pending its settlement John Adams, a stove and tin merchant of Madison, and a staunch Democrat, purchased a new printing outfit and installed Mr. Jones as editor, and the latter issued the paper therefrom, leaving the old outfit in litigation—it finally going to Mr. Barnett, who died the next year at Vevay, Ind. By this time the local political situation, as far as the Democracy was concerned, had gotten into a fearful snarl. The Republicans had increased their majority until it registered from 600 to 1,100 at every election and the Democrats were divided into hostile camps, Mr. Korbly leading one considerable faction and Joseph C. Abbott the other. Mr. Adams and Mr. Jones brought the Herald to the support of Mr. Korbly's faction. This angered Abbott and his friends, conspicuous among whom were John McGregor, a young lawyer of Madison, and Joseph M. Cravens, son of Judge John R. Cravens, and destined to be the future and most successful leader the party in Jefferson county ever had; so they induced Alonzo S. Chapman, who was publishing a trade paper called the Sorghum Growers' Guide, at Madison, to launch a new daily and weekly Democratic paper in opposition to the Herald. This Mr. Chapman did, and the new paper was styled the Madison Democrat, and it made its initial appearance in the autumn of 1889, and for years thereafter the Herald and the Democrat continued to represent two unfriendly forces in the party.

In 1892 the party again abandoned the custom of putting out a local ticket, and a hybrid Independent aggregation, representing both Republicans and Democrats, endorsed and supported by the Democratic organization, was put forth, only to meet defeat more decisive and overwhelming than ever before, or since for that matter, administered to a regular Democratic ticket. In 1894, the year of great Democratic defeat everywhere, the Republicans maintained their lead in Jefferson county by some 800 votes. In 1896 a somewhat new alignment appeared in Jefferson county. Of the old Republican organization, Messrs. William P. and James Graham were dead, Thos. Graham and A. D. Vanosdol practically retired from political management, and only M. C. Garber (the junior Garber) active, but a new power had been growing up in the county, Marcus R. Sulzer and Perry E. Bear, lawyers located at Madison, and Thomas McNutt, a farmer of Saluda township, who had been elected County Recorder two years before—these three latter gentlemen worked together and practically filled the court house with their henchmen. Messrs. Sulzer and Bear both had been Prosecuting Attorney for two terms and Sulzer had been a member of the Legislature, and this year Bear was elected Judge of the Circuit Court. McNutt was county chairman and two and four years later was a member of the Republican State Central Committee. In the Democratic party there were changes, too. Mr. Korbly had gone to Indianapolis and Joseph C. Abbott had died, and the fierce warfare that had existed within the ranks of the party was abating, but the party was practically leaderless, and continued leaderless, and therefore ineffective, for several years. In addition to this condition the free silver campaign of Mr. Bryan brought its defections, far outnumbering its accessions, in this county, as well as elsewhere, and so the Republicans were again successful, electing their entire county ticket by majorities running from 600 to 1,000 votes. This was practically repeated in 1898 and 1900.

In 1897 John B. Niesse and Moses H. Cochrane purchased the Herald from John Adams, and Lin C. Jones retired from newspaper writing and from politics for all time, and the new management ceased all factional warfare, as against the Democrat, and that part of the party supporting it—they made the Herald consistently and mildly, but not aggressively, Democratic, and they have maintained the paper in that attitude ever since and until this day. Mr. Chapman continued the Democrat as a nominal Democratic paper for some years, all the time becoming more and more independent in its political action, and finally, in 1912, he turned it into a Bull Moose organ and it supported the policies of Mr. Roosevelt's party again in 1914.

In 1902 came the Democratic revival in Jefferson county. It was not a favorable year for Democrats in the State and Nation, but it was a great year for the Democracy of Jefferson county. Under the leadership of Messrs. Garber, Sulzer and Bear, for six years the Republican party had continued its invincible hold upon the county affairs, but the jealousy and unrest that always follows close upon the heels of success was at work within the ranks of that party. Bear was seeking re-election as Judge and Sulzer was asking for another term in the Legislature, and the hammers of the disappointed ones in their party were making music like an anvil chorus. In addition to this, the Democratic party, for the first time in many years, perfected an excellent organization. Factional feeling had died out and new leaders came to the front. Joseph M. Cravens was nominated for Representative and made an active and thorough canvass of the county and brought all his personal popularity, which was very great and very widely diffused with the voters, to the support of the entire ticket. Curtis Marshall, a young lawyer of Madison, was the County Chairman, and John B. Lawler, a business man of the same place, was one of his most valued aids in organization work. This trio—Cravens, Marshall and Lawler—in this campaign established the reputation as political leaders and ingratiated themselves in the affections of the Democratic workers of the county, that made them the controlling force in the party from that day until the present time. At the election Cravens was elected over Sulzer by more than 500 majority; Hiram Francisco, a son of the elder Hiram Francisco who was elected State Senator in 1870, defeated Perry E. Bear for Judge, carrying the county as well as the circuit; a Democrat was elected County Treasurer, and one Commissioner was also successful. The remaining candidates on the county ticket were defeated by their Republican opponents by less than one hundred votes. The next campaign, 1904, was a hard-fought contest, Cravens running a tie with his Republican opponent and winning out in a special election for Representative, the rest of the Republican ticket being successful but all having less than 200 majority and Jefferson county being one of only three counties in the State that increased the Democratic vote over the returns shown in 1900.

The campaigns of 1906 and 1908 were hard fought and closely contested. Mr. Garber had practically dropped out of the management upon the Republican side, and Mr. Sulzer, now postmaster at Madison, was the nominal leader of the party, but factionalism had weakened his organization until it was no longer an effective force. The naturally large Republican majority enabled that party to elect most of the county officers, but by very small majorities, and the alert and militant Democracy, well organized and well disciplined, elected Cravens to the Legislature again in 1906 and Francisco Judge in 1908.

In 1910 Mr. Sulzer, wearied of the fight he was making almost alone and unaided, and perhaps disgusted at the petty jealousy and ingratitude of many of his partisans, withdrew practically from the leading part in Republican politics in the county and the party drifted here and there and at the election went down before the well-drilled forces of Democracy, headed by Cravens and Marshall and Lawler. All the county offices voted for, except Treasurer, were captured by the Democrats and Cravens was elected again to the Legislature by more than 700 majority.

In 1912 it was the same story, and in this year all the Democratic candidates were elected by good majorities, and for the first time in the history of Jefferson county every office in the court house was filled by a Democrat and never in all the history of the county were the officials more competent or accommodating. The Auditor was A. M. Taff; the Recorder, Wm. J. McBride; the Assessor, B. W. Noell; the Sheriff, Frank McKay; the Coroner, Dr. Robt. W. Cochran, and Commissioners, Edw. J. Wolf and L. G. Rodgers, all elected in 1910, the Sheriff, Coroner and Commissioner Wolf being re-elected in 1912. The Clerk, Edw. M. Prenatt; the Treasurer, Edward Jeffries; Surveyor, Edw. J. Gasaway, and Commissioner Clarence T. Custer elected in 1912. Besides these court house officials Joseph H. Hanna was the Superintendent of Schools, Joseph M. Cravens Representative in the Legislature for the fifth term, and in the judicial circuit composed of Jefferson and Switzerland counties, Hiram Francisco, Judge, and Curtis Marshall, Prosecutor, both in their second terms. It was indeed a Democratic atmosphere that enveloped the county. When the early days of 1914 came—in fact, late in 1913—mutterings of discontent were heard. In 1912 the nation, the State and the county all elected Democratic officers and what patronage was left to be distributed, after considering the bar of civil service, was to go to the Democratic workers. Never before had the boys in Jefferson had such an opportunity and many of them came forward seeking the pie counter—postmasterships, internal revenue collectors or agents, rural route carriers, etc., were sought from the national administration—places in the militia and pure food inspection department from the State—road superintendents, high and low, poor farm, court house janitor and other appointments in the county—of course, all could not be appointed, not one in six could be appointed, and there was much disappointment, and the leaders of the local organization were blamed. (As the disappointed Republicans had done years before, the disappointed Democrats now began doing, knocking against their organization and leaders and seeking to defeat their candidates—an illustration of the old story of the dog in the manger—they could not get the offices themselves and they did not want any other Democrat to have them. Added to this state of dissatisfaction and encouraged and prompted by it, Judge Hiram Francisco, who had been elected twice by the Democrats, announced himself for re-election to that office as an independent candidate. Curtis Marshall had been nominated by the convention, but perceiving that some discontent existed, a part of which was directed toward him personally, he declined the nomination, and then the convention unanimously turned to Hon. F. M. Griffith of Vevay and nominated him. Mr. Griffith was an ex-Congressman and a Democrat of national as well as State reputation and, living outside of the county, it was believed he would be acceptable to everybody. But the disappointed ones would not be appeased, and they got behind Judge Francisco's candidacy and under this cover fought the whole ticket, and had the Republicans been well organized and under capable leadership, they would have easily triumphed, but they were not—they were fairly harmonious and hopeful, but weak in organization and leadership, while the Democrats were never more effective in their organization and leadership—the party workers from all over the county responded nobly to the call to arms, and the hardest-fought battle in all the years was waged—and when election day came and passed away it was shown that the Democracy generally had won a victory. Mr. Griffith was elected judge, defeating Mr. Sulzer, the Republican candidate, by a comfortable plurality in the circuit, although the latter carried Jefferson county by a small plurality. Francisco ran a very poor third. The prosecutor, recorder, assessor, treasurer, sheriff and surveyor were elected by the Democrats, while the Republicans elected the representative, auditor, coroner and two commissioners by small majorities, defeating Joseph M. Cravens for representative and A. M. Taff for auditor, the two men that the disaffected ones among the Democracy had especially fought, but on the whole it was regarded as a decided Democratic victory.

When the 1916 campaign came about political matters in Jefferson county had resumed their normal condition. The Madison Democrat had sold its good will and subscription to the Herald, and there were now but the two papers, the Herald and the Courier. It was a hard-fought campaign between the parties, with little factional trouble in either party. As in former campaigns, the Democrats had the better organization and the Republicans had the larger number of voters, and the election resulted in a draw, the Democrats electing Joseph M. Cravens Representative (with Scott county, which had been added to the district), Edward M. Prenall clerk and George A. Monroe sheriff, the two latter re-elected. The Republicans elected the Treasurer, Surveyor, Coroner and two Commissioners.

What the outcome of the 1918 campaign will be no one knows.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF JENNINGS COUNTY

By Fred C. Lockwood

JENNINGS COUNTY, named in honor of Indiana's first Governor, Jonathan Jennings, is situated in the southeastern part of the State and comprises an area of 240,000 acres of land. The county was organized under an act of the legislature approved at Corydon on the first Monday in December, 1816, and a year later the county seat sent its first representative to the Legislature in the person of Zenas Kimberlan. Almost the whole of Jennings county was obtained from the Indians by what was known as the "Grouseland Purchase" in the year 1811, while eight years later, which is to say 1819, the Indians, including the Delawares, Potawatomes, Miamis and Weas extinguished their sole right of ownership by what was known as the "New Purchase," which made all land in the county subject to entry.

The early settlers were their own manufacturers and the loom and grist mill were brought into requisition, supplying their own wants and demands the best they could. Generosity and kindness were paramount features with the early settlers, which had a tendency to mitigate much of the hardships experienced. The work of clearing the heavily timbered lands and building log houses required assistance and often the settlers lent a hand at house-raising, log-rollings and wood-choppings, which was invariably the occasion for much good feeling.

About one hundred and twenty-five inhabitants were within the bounds of Jennings county at the time of its organization. The first county officers were: James Scott, clerk and recorder; John Vawter, treasurer and marshal of the State; Maurice Baker, sheriff; Frederick Bonons, coroner; Samuel S. Graham, Samuel Campbell and James Shepherd, commissioners; John Test, judge of the circuit court; William Prather and Chapman Denton, associate judges; Jeremiah Sullivan, prosecuting attorney.

The early settlers did not concern themselves with national and local politics. They were busy in their forest privacy in a desire to clear their lands. The presidential election of 1824 was a contest with a personal color. The candidates were Adams, Crawford, Clay and Jackson, and there was a mixture of adherents on account of personal preferences. After the organization of the Whig party Jennings was a Whig county, though not by a very large majority. Then, after the organization of the Republican party, the county had been mainly Republican, but is now solidly Democratic with the exception of one county official—the recorder.

The present county officials are: James Tolen, treasurer; Lloyd G. Hudson, clerk of the circuit court; G. J. Bernhart, auditor; William Riley, recorder; J. Dudley Stemm, surveyor; M. B. Hudson, coroner; John W. Morrison, assessor; Clem V. Bridges, sheriff; Joseph W. Verbag, prosecuting attorney; Robert A. Creigmile, judge; Shepherd Whitcomb, superintendent of schools.

Jennings county residents who have held important positions in the public services of the State and nation were: Jephtha D. New, elected twice to Congress, first in 1874, second in 1878; and Lincoln Dixon, the present Congressman from the Fourth Congressional District, elected in 1894; Alonzo G. Smith, attorney-general of Indiana, 1890-1892; Thomas W. Brolley, state statistician; Thomas J. Reilly, appointed collector of internal revenue under the Johnson administration, and John Overmyer, speaker of the Indiana House of Representatives at the regular and special sessions of 1877.

The newspapers of Jennings county since its organization have been The Vernon Visitor, established by Willoughby Conner and Richard Randall in 1836; Jennings Democrat, established by Samuel McKeenan and E. H. Ransom in 1856; Anti-Bolter, established by M. H. Andrews in 1858; Jennings County Times, established by John Vawter in 1840; Vernon Banner, established by William Steinback in 1850; Little Jewel, established by W. S. Prather and Peter Thienes, Jr., in 1875; Die Post (German publication), established by Peter Thienes, Jr., in 1875; Republican, established by Lincoln Harrington in 1892; The Daily Tribune, established by J. E. Allison in 1899; The Vernon Journal, established by Edward Wagner in 1892; The Vernon News, established by N. C. Euler in 1906; The Vernon Herald, established by E. A. Grimes in 1909; The Butlerville News, established by Butlerville News Publishing Company in 1909.

The present newspapers of the county are The North Vernon Sun, established by Samuel W. Holmes in 1872; present editor, Fred C. Lockwood; owners, James N. Culp and Ernest Klingner; The Plain Dealer, established by A. S. Conner and James M. Mayfield; present editor and owner, C. C. Klingner; The Vernon Times, established by a stock company in 1913; present editor, J. R. Carney.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF JOHNSON COUNTY

THE State Legislature in session at Corydon in December, 1822, passed an act enabling and providing for the organization of the county of Johnson. Most of the territory included in this new county had been a part of Delaware county. Opponents of the move charged that the signatures secured to the legislative petition by George King were fictitious or the names of persons long dead. However that may have been, the Legislature passed the act and the county was organized with the county seat at Franklin, being named in honor of Benjamin Franklin at the suggestion of Samuel Herriott, who was the first clerk of the county.

At the first election, held on the 8th of March, 1823, Israel Watts and Daniel Boaz were chosen judges, Samuel Herriott clerk, William Schaffer recorder, William Freeman, John S. Miller and James Ritchey commissioners.

George King, leader in the movement for a new county, had secured the site for a county seat in advance, and this was selected by the commissioners and named Franklin. Necessary property was donated to the county by King.

When Johnson county was organized Jonathan Jennings, the first governor, was still in office, and the population of the state was 147,178. James Monroe was president of the United States, having received five electoral votes from this state for his second term. James Noble and Walter Taylor were serving as United States senators. Governor Jennings, who resigned as governor to become a member of the congress, was the first to receive the vote of Johnson county for that position, in 1824.

While partisan politics played very little part in the election of the local tickets in Johnson county prior to 1830, up to that time there being none but Democrats in the county, from the election of Andrew Jackson, in 1828, there has been no occasion when Johnson county has not come to the front with a rousing Democratic majority. Party lines have been pretty closely drawn, and no issue to a large majority of the residents of Johnson county has been sufficient to change the political complexion of the returns. Even in the most exciting elections preceding, during and following the Civil war, when hero worship was an important element in determining many questions, Johnson county has never swerved from its Democratic majorities. In 1828, for instance, when Andrew Jackson and John C. Calhoun were the Democratic nominees against John Quincy Adams and Rusk, Jackson received 221 votes and Adams 118 outside of Blue River township, of which returns were not preserved.

In 1832 Jackson and Van Buren received 263 votes against 120 for Clay and Sergeant, not including Franklin township, of which the returns in this instance were lost.

In the next presidential election in 1836 Van Buren and Johnson opposed William Henry Harrison and Granger, his running mate. Even the popularity of Harrison in his home state was not sufficient to change anything in Johnson county, for Van Buren received 559 votes to Harrison's 438, not including Union township, from which there are no returns preserved.

In 1840 Harrison again opposed Van Buren, his running mate this time being Tyler, and Johnson again accompanying Van Buren. This time, while Harrison was elected president, in Johnson county he received only 631 votes, as against 998 for Van Buren. The Democratic vote was growing stronger all the time.

When the election of 1844 came around, Clay and Freylinghuysen, the Whig nominees, opposing Polk and Dallas, the Democrats, all the townships are reported save Nineveh, where 202 votes were cast for all the candidates, but the tally sheet was lost. The vote in the other townships was 992 for Polk, and 581 for Clay.

In 1848, while the aggregate vote of the county continued to increase very materially, most of the increase was on the Democratic side, and in that year Cass and Butler, the Democratic nominees, received 1,114 votes against 675 for Taylor and Fillmore, the Whig nominees.

Pierce and King, Democratic nominees in 1852, defeated Scott and Graham, the Whig combination, 1,333 to 896.

In 1856 those issues which culminated in the great Civil war began to assert themselves throughout the country, the reflection of sentiment being shown in the election returns from everywhere, the slavery question agitating the people in all the states. Buchanan and Breckinridge were elected president and vice-president in that year over Fremont and Dayton, the first nominees of the new Republican party, which was the successor of the Whig organization, deceased. The vote in Johnson county was 1,608 for Buchanan, and 1,095 for Fremont.

In 1860, owing to a division in the Democratic party, the voters dividing on the question of whether or not slavery should be permitted, and separating the voting strength between north and south Democrats, Johnson county came nearer going to the Republicans than at any time since in its existence. Douglas and Johnson, representing the Democrats, received 1,392 votes, while Lincoln and Hamlin, Republicans, received 1,303. Breckinridge and Lane, representing the southern Democratic sentiment, received 306 votes, these all being drawn from the regular Democratic party.

In 1864, while the state of Indiana was voting about 21,000 Republican majority for Oliver P. Morton for governor, Johnson county was contributing no part of that. It was still voting the Democratic ticket. In that same year McClellan and Pendleton, the Democratic nominees, beat Lincoln and Johnson in Johnson county, 1,713 to 1,532.

Even the popularity of U. S. Grant as the great war hero, while nominated by the Republicans in 1868, received 1,697 votes in Johnson county against 2,149 for Seymour and Blair, the Democratic nominees. Even the candidacy of Greeley and Brown, fathered as liberal Republicans and by Democratic endorsement, was sufficiently popular to attract 2,109 votes, as against 1,700 for Grant and Wilson for the second term.

In November, 1876, the Democrats carried the state of Indiana for James D. Williams for governor by over 5,000 votes. Johnson county at the same election gave Tilden and Hendricks 2,363 votes, and Hayes and Wheeler, Republicans, 1,860.

Four years later, Hancock and English, as Democratic nominees, received 2,461, as against 2,020 for Garfield and Arthur, the Republicans.

In 1884, when Isaac P. Gray was elected the Democratic governor of Indiana by a majority of nearly 8,000, and Grover Cleveland was first elected president of the United States, Johnson county gave to Cleveland 2,515 votes, while Blaine and Logan received exactly the same vote as that given Garfield and Arthur four years before, 2,020.

The Democrats who have served the county of Johnson in the principal offices from the date of the organization of the county, or from the date when the office was created, are as follows:

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF KNOX COUNTY

By Shuler McCormick

FOREWORD.

THE history of Knox county necessarily includes the early history of the Northwest territory. The most important events of the early development of the country west of the Alleghenies occurred in and around Old Vincennes. Here were sown the first seeds of the development of five States—Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois and Wisconsin. Here was the first seat of government of Indiana, here the first courts, the first land office, the first permanent church, the first university west of the Alleghenies, the first newspaper of the Northwest Territory, now known as the Western Sun.

A complete history of Vincennes and Knox county, from the earliest settlement to the present time, would fill volumes. In a history such as this many important events must be left out, and such as are mentioned must be but briefly. The account of the discovery and exploration, if only half stated, is so replete with romance and adventure as to resemble veriest fiction. It is the story of transformation from the untrammelled verdure of the wild to the clockwork development of civilization. It would begin with the trackless forest habited by savage men hunting with the bow and arrow and fishing in the back waters to sustain life in order that they might be able to do the same tomorrow, and still more savage beasts, stalking and snapping and snarling in order to eat and to keep from being eaten, with warbling songsters, the finch, the mocking bird, the heron, the hawk, and the eagle. It would recall the time when the tentacles of commerce first reached out to virgin wealth and the courier des bois gave a few paltry and shining trinkets to the red man in return for valuable furs. It would picture the huts of Chippe Kokee, describe the fickle Creole, tell the tales of scars and starving, of torture, blood and crime, of slavery, the underground railroad, the Knights of the Golden Circle, and finally the age of commercialism passed by all too briefly by the modern historian because the changes are so gradual that the tranquil times are unaffected by jarring shocks like war.

But the early history of Knox county is not fiction. It can all be proven by records and documents still preserved in the archives of the State. Records of the pioneer churches, some in France, some in this city, are unquestionable evidence of the events that transpired long before even a semblance of a civil government of any kind was formed in what was later known as the Northwest Territory. Many of the valuable old documents, now yellow with age, are in the French and Latin languages and bear the dates showing when the records were made and when the events transpired.

INDIANS, EXPLORATION, FORTS AND SETTLEMENT.

When Columbus came he found the Indian. The aborigines kept no records, and tradition is their only history. Their origin is shrouded in mystery. The mounds scattered about the city of Vincennes tells of a race centuries before the white man settled the continent. The Indians, as known by the white man, were divided into tribes, differing in some particulars, speaking various dialects. These separate tribes were often united into confederacies for their own mutual protection against other hostile tribes. The Algonquins, a mighty confederacy, occupied about half the territory east of the Mississippi river, and among its component tribes numbered the Miamis. Of these a lesser tribe was the Piankashaws, who occupied the part of the territory where Knox and the surrounding counties are now situated.

Just when the region destined to be known as the Northwest Territory was discovered is not now clearly understood. We know that explorations were made along the Mississippi, Ohio and Wabash rivers as early as 1660 and what is now Indiana about 1664.

The splendid natural advantages of the vast and fertile valleys and mighty and beautiful rivers soon attracted numerous explorers. The dates of these explorations are not certain. However, it is known that as early as 1683 explorers, hunters and traders began to descend the Wabash. These forerunners of civilization were soon followed by others, accompanied by French Catholic missionaries. They pushed their way through the Great Lakes and then descended the rivers to the Gulf of Mexico. The Wabash soon became a recognized part of the waterway from North to South which the brave courier des bois (runner of the woods) and the Catholic missionaries had to navigate. The missionaries went out to plant the cross along the route and the fur traders went out to establish trading posts and to barter with the Indians. The object of one was spiritual, the other temporal. Both were successful and their actions were of providential direction. In this we see, as has so often been shown, before and since, that Christianity and civilization go hand in hand.

The first trading post established in the Northwest Territory was at Detroit, in 1701, and the second, in 1702, at Vincennes, by Francis Morgan, Sieur de Vincenne. This was the first settlement and permanent habitation by white men in what is now known as Indiana.

The company of settlers, consisting of eight men, led by the gallant and distinguished French officer, had orders to establish three forts, one at a point where the St. Joseph and St. Marys rivers unite to form the Maumee, not far from where the city of Ft. Wayne now stands, one "Outenon" near where the city of Lafayette is now located, and the other at Chippe Kokee, on the "Colline Gravois," or gravel banks on the Wabash river where the city of Vincennes now stands. Of these the last was the only one destined to survive. The old fort erected by Sieur de Vincenne and his little band, cheered on and assisted by numbers of wondering Indians, stood for about a century and played an important part in the nation's history. The original fort, of course, was of necessity, only a temporary affair, but was replaced a few years later by a more substantial fortification.

This fort consisted of a palisade formed of posts or logs set on end in the ground, leaning outward. The enclosure was rectangular in form, and extended from what is now First street to the river and from Vigo street to Barnet. In the center of this fortification was a house, built in the same manner as the palisades, used as a store room, and underneath it a log-walled excavation used as a magazine, buried in the earth. Surmounting the store room was a large tower, while a smaller tower was erected at each of the four corners of the palisades. In each of these towers sentinels were posted and from each muzzles of guns could be pointed when in action.

It is reasonable to suppose that a church was erected at about the time de Vincenne settled at the Old Post. A Jesuit missionary was sent with him by Father James Marquette. It is a matter of regret that his name is at this time unknown by anyone living. In 1707 he was succeeded by Father John Mermet. Father Pierre Gibault was the most illustrious of a long line of priests that succeeded after the founding of the mission of St. Xavier's. Judge John Law, who possessed an extensive knowledge of the early history of Vincennes, said of him: "Next to Clark and Vigo the United States is indebted more to Father Gibault for the accession of the States comprised in what was the original Northwest Territory than any other man."

For more than three-score years and ten the pioneer settlement remained a mere trading post, a town in the wilderness. Its growth was very slow for a century. Yet from the first it was a place of note and was recognized as the principal town west of the Allegheny mountains. Being the oldest settlement in Indiana, it early acquired the name of the "Old Post." In fact, it did not take the name of Vincennes until several years later. Francis Morgan, although he held a commission as ensign under Louis XIV, did not inherit the title of Sieur de Vincenne until the death of his uncle in 1717. Then the post began to be "Post Vincennes."

In 1720 Vincenne mounted the first cannon at the fort. In 1736 he led his command down the river to assist in a war with the Chickasaw Indians. The promised reinforcements from the South did not arrive and he was captured and burned at the stake.

The effects of civilization was already felt in the little town of ninety families, and people of influence and good character had become permanent residents of the town. They began to till the soil and establish trade, and the settlement grew. The manners and customs of the people were peculiar. Their wants were few, yet they enjoyed life. Dances were frequent and they were always well attended. Everybody kept open house on New Year's and the citizens went from house to house attending these receptions. Visitors were met by a kiss from the hostess, who served a glass of wine as a relish to the feast spread in every home. After the Lenten season, which was well observed, a big "Fat Ball" was given at which was served roast pig and the dancers stayed until the sun began to peep over the eastern hills. There were no schools, no newspapers. Few could read or write, and the transient trader with his news was the lion of the hour.

The Northwest Territory belonged to the French, by whom it had been explored and settled, until 1763, when by the treaty of Paris it was ceded to Great Britain, and as a result the Lilies of France were succeeded by the British Cross of St. George. But the people remained French and clung to their old manners and customs and spoke their own language. They only waited for the time when the yoke of the British could be thrown off, for secretly they hated England. This was a righteous hatred, when it is remembered that the British bribed the Indians with gold to make war on the white citizens of the territory. For some reason it was three years after England secured control before she sent a commandant to the fort on the Wabash. But in April, 1776, Lieutenant Ramsey arrived with a company of British soldiers and took command. The flag of France was hauled down and the flag of England took its place. The name was changed to Fort Sackville, which name it retained until it was captured by George Rogers Clark.

THE CAPTURE OF VINCENNES.

The Revolution came on and the thirteen States were fighting for liberty. The poor struggling American troops were battling against odds, not the least of which were the Indians. Border settlements that had just been established by Daniel Boone and others were being raided and men and women were being scalped by savages. It soon became known that the Indian raids were being instigated by the British. Governor Hamilton, who was in command at Vincennes, was not only inciting the savages to make war on the Americans, but he was actually paying them for the scalps taken. He thereby became known as the "Hair Buyer" general. The Continental troops were hard pressed and could not send aid to the settlers of the Northwest Territory and Kentucky.

A backwoods surveyor by the name of George Rogers Clark hastened from Kentucky to Governor Patrick Henry of Virginia. He rushed to the Governor and said: "The settlers are being murdered by the Indians at the instigation of the British. Capture Vincennes and Kaskaskia and you have quelled the Indians. * * * Drive the British out of Indiana and Illinois and the Indian massacres will cease." But there were no troops, this Governor Henry told the young surveyor. Then Clark offered to raise an army himself if Virginia or the United States government would furnish the powder and means to equip the men. But the Governor only advised that the white settlers be brought to the eastern side of the mountains. But Clark pleaded so earnestly that he was finally given a colonel's commission and $50,000 of depreciated Continental money and 500 pounds of powder.

He started at once down the Ohio with a single companion and his money and powder. He was pursued by lurking Indians, but he eluded them and reached Booneville, Ky., where he succeeded in enlisting 140 men. On June 28, 1778, they started down the Ohio on flat boats. No one knew their destination but Clark. His captains were Leonard Helm, John Montgomery, William Herrod and Joseph Bowman. The sun was in the eclipse as the boats passed over the falls of the Ohio below "Corn Island." Clark's original intention was to proceed at once to take Vincennes, but after he had proceeded four days from the falls down the Ohio he met a party of friendly hunters who informed him that the opportunity of capturing Kaskaskia was favorable. He decided to take their advice and on July 4, 1778, he arrived at Kaskaskia and captured the place without firing a gun. The timely arrival of Father Gibault helped to quell the natives, and when they were informed that they no longer owed allegiance to Great Britain, but to the United States, they went into transports of joy. Clark sent Simon Kenton to spy on Vincennes and to send word back to Kaskaskia. Preparations were made to proceed to Vincennes, but Father Gibault offered to proceed in advance and apprise the people and to advise them to espouse the American cause. A small party accompanied him and on their arrival at Vincennes, Father Gibault explained the situation to the citizens. A meeting was then held in the little church—the "Cradle of Liberty" of the Northwest Territory—where the oath of allegiance to the United States was taken. An officer was elected and the American flag was hoisted over the old fort and the British flag taken down. This was done without resistance, as the British commandant had gone to Detroit, not suspecting any such actions on the part of the people and fearing no danger of attack. The name was changed to Ft. Vincennes. Word was sent to Clark at Kaskaskia and he sent Captain Helm with a few men to take charge.

Hamilton, at Detroit, learned what had happened at Vincennes and on December 17, 1778, he arrived by water at Vincennes with eighty-four men and about one hundred Indians. Helm, seeing that resistance was useless, surrendered, but not without the honors of war. Clark saw that the situation was desperate. It was midwinter and he knew that Hamilton would attack Kaskaskia in the spring. Colonel Clark decided to capture Vincennes.

He sent Colonel Vigo, a wealthy merchant, whose friendship he had acquired, to Vincennes to spy out the situation, who, on his arrival, was promptly taken prisoner by Hamilton. But through the good offices of Father Gibault he was released and returned to Kaskaskia, where he made report.

The 1st of February men were working on a flat boat, the "Willing," to convey supplies down the Mississippi and up the Ohio and Wabash. Under Captain John Rogers the boat left on February 4, 1779, with forty-six men on board. The next day Colonel Clark started by land with 160 men on the memorable march—240 miles—from Kaskaskia to Vincennes. In all the annals of history there is nowhere else recorded a march so full of hardship, perils and privations. At that season the streams had overflowed and many times the men were marching in water to their waists and sometimes to their armpits. Their rations were soon exhausted and they were forced to forage for their supplies. Finally, under the indomitable courage of their leader, they reached the Indiana side of the Wabash after ferrying it at a point where it was five miles wide.

Fortunately they captured a couple of Indian squaws, who had a boat in which was half of a buffalo. This was meat to the hungry soldiers. After a repast they crossed a pond to "Warrior's Island," six miles below town. Proceeding along the high land a duck hunter was captured, by whom Clark sent a letter to the inhabitants telling them to remain indoors. Then, just at sundown, the fearless little army approached the town. The "Willing" had not yet arrived. The fort was approached by three detachments from three sides. At nightfall the attacking party began to throw up entrenchments by the light of the moon. Then the firing commenced. The British in the fort had not yet learned of the approach of the Americans and thought the firing was from drunken Indians on a revel.

"Silence those drunken Indians," roared Hamilton. But Captain Helm, who was a prisoner of war, no doubt recognized the crack of the rifles he had so often heard before and exclaimed, "That's Clark." All night long the firing continued and the attacking party only stopped for breakfast the next morning. A returning party of British duck hunters was almost annihilated. Every time a British head appeared at a loophole he was picked off by the unerring aim of the backwoodsmen. About 9 o'clock Clark sent a flag of truce and an order to Hamilton to surrender. Hamilton refused and the firing continued with increased vigor for the balance of the day. Clark was preparing to take the fort by storm that night, but late in the afternoon Hamilton sent out a flag of truce and a note requesting a truce for three days and asking for a conference and offering to meet Clark at the gate.

Clark replied that he would not accept any terms but immediate surrender, and that if Hamilton wanted a conference with Colonel Clark he would meet him at the church with Captain Helm. The note resulted in Hamilton coming and surrendering the fort and the soldiers as prisoners of war.

And this ended the British rule in Vincennes.

Soon after the surrender it was learned that a British detachment was on its way down the river with supplies for the fort. This was surprised and captured by Captain Bowman and it was found to contain stores to the value of $250,000.00.

Old Vincennes has successively been under the French, British and American flags since Francis Morgan de Vincenne founded the post more than two hundred years ago. Old Glory has come to stay forever.

MILITARY CONTROL.

After the capture of Vincennes on February 25, 1779, Colonel John Todd was made military governor of the territory. He organized local governments suitable to the requirements of the citizens.

The fame of Vincennes now became greater than ever. Immigrants began to flock to the settlement. Speculators began to seize the choice lands. Colonel Todd saw their designs and at once took steps to forestall them. His first act was to prohibit the location of claims in the rich lands in the river valleys, or within a league's distance of them. This proclamation required the opening of land offices, which regulated the acquiring of title to land. He organized a court, the members of which arrogated to themselves legislative powers and became involved in a land grab scandal which resulted in the setting aside of the land grants and the abolishment of the court. Then, in 1790, Secretary Winthrop Sargent established a court.

About this time a public stock was erected near the old Cathedral, where offenders were punished for misdemeanors.

Trouble between the Indians and whites over land grants resulted in bloodshed. Clark attempted to subdue the Indians after several minor expeditions had failed. But it appears that he had lost his influence with both his own people and the savages, and his efforts met with little success.

VINCENNES THE CAPITAL

By act of Congress, passed May 7, 1800, the Territory of Indiana was formed and the capital established at Vincennes. William Henry Harrison of Virginia was appointed first Governor.

The old court established under military rule was abolished and Henry Vanderburgh, William Clark and John Griffin appointed judges. On the 12th day of January, 1801, they met and published seven wise laws and three resolutions. Court was held for a few years in a house rented for that purpose at Second and Broadway streets. In 1809 a court house was erected at Fourth and Buntin streets, where court was held until 1832. A new court house was then erected on the square where now stands the present fine stone "Temple of Justice," erected in 1873 at a cost of half a million dollars. The first Revised Statutes of Indiana were published at Vincennes in 1807. These laws were revised by John Rice Jones and John Johnson.

Governor Harrison, on becoming a resident of Vincennes, began to provide himself with a home. A splendid brick mansion was erected in the northern part of the city in 1804. It was for many years the finest residence west of the Alleghenies. It was soon surrounded with other fine residences and Vincennes became a place of importance. The old Harrison house is still standing.

In 1806 the Territorial Legislature, in pursuance of an act of Congress, passed a law incorporating the Vincennes University. Congress had donated a township of land for the benefit of such an institution and the university was located at Vincennes with William Henry Harrison as first president of the board of trustees. Later the State unlawfully seized the lands of the university and appropriated them to its own use. The Legislature of 1917, however, made final restitution of $120,000.00 in final settlement of the university's claim, which had been fought out in the highest court of the land and successively presented to several Legislatures.

During these years when the Territory was being established emigrants had been arriving in great numbers. The Indians became so angry with the encroachments that in 1810 there were many outbreaks and many people were massacred. A meeting was held at Vincennes to try to placate the chiefs, but they were obdurate and they were in an excellent mood to assist the British in the war of 1812. Harrison met them under Tecumseh at Tippecanoe and defeated them before war was declared, but after peace was made with England the Indians gave little trouble in Indiana.

In February the Legislature, which had previously met in a frame house on Main street between Second and Third and which is still standing on North Third street, met at Corydon and declared Corydon as the new Capital. The last Territorial Legislature met at Corydon in 1815 and adopted a memorial to Congress praying for Statehood. In June, 1916, the first Constitutional Convention met at Corydon and adopted the first Constitution for the State of Indiana.

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF KNOX COUNTY.

Knox county, which has been appropriately called the "Mother of Counties," was established in 1790 by Secretary Winthrop Sargent. The name of Knox was given in honor of General Henry Knox, then Secretary of War. The territory of the county at this time included all of the States of Indiana and Michigan and a part of Illinois. Before the end of the year 1798, Wayne county was formed with Detroit as the county seat, and comprised a greater part of Michigan and a part of Indiana. By act of Congress in 1800 the territory embraced in these two States was divided into two separate and distinct territories with Vincennes as the seat of one and William Henry Harrison as its governor. In the year 1802 Clark and Randolph counties were formed, and in 1805 Dearborn county was created. At a still later date in the same year Michigan and Illinois were made separate territories. At that date there were only four counties in Indiana Territory—Knox, Clark, Dearborn and Harrison. Knox county embraced nearly half the territory now constituting Indiana. During the year 1810 Jefferson and Franklin counties were established and in 1813 Gibson and Warrick were established. Sullivan was added in 1817 and Greene in 1820, which reduced Knox county to its present limits.

LATER DEVELOPMENT OF THE COUNTY.

After the removal of the capital of the State from Vincennes to Corydon, the old post began to lose some of her glamour as the first city of Indiana. The most valuable lands adjacent thereto had been entered and this attraction was fast being removed from prospective settlers. The State university was established at Bloomington and the lands of Vincennes University were seized by the State and sold. Many of her most enterprising citizens left for more adventurous fields. Among these were William Prince, General Gibson and General Evans. The whole State underwent many physical changes. Forests were cleared away and roads were built. New towns sprang up everywhere as the population rapidly increased.

Among the foremost men of the county at that time were Nathaniel Ewing, Francis Vigo, Benjamin Parke, Henry Vanderburgh and John Law. The latter was the first historian of note of Indiana. To him we are indebted for many of the facts of Revolutionary times. Through his personal acquaintance with Colonel Vigo he was enabled to write a vivid story of the capture of Vincennes by Clark. He served with distinction as Prosecuting Attorney, Legislator, Judge and Congressman. He died in 1873.

General Zachary Taylor was among the noted men who resided at Vincennes in the early days. His daughter born at this place afterwards became the wife of Jefferson Davis. A large boulder in the woods served as a trysting place for the youthful lovers when Miss Taylor was visiting friends at the old post. Mr. Jeremiah Donovan, a friend of the lovers, afterward removed the boulder to the yard of his home at Sixth and Busseron streets. Afterwards the place was purchased by the late John H. Rabb and is now the home of the Hon. James Wade Emison, and the old boulder still remains in the same place where it was placed by Mr. Donovan years ago.

The first city charter for Vincennes was granted by the Legislature in 1831. The old charter remained in effect until 1856 when the city of Vincennes was incorporated under the State laws. John Moore was elected the first mayor. The first bank was incorporated in 1834. Subsequently it became the old "State Bank of Indiana," with four branches in different parts of Indiana. It was soon wrecked by bad management. As early as 1807 a theater was opened in Vincennes by John R. Jones. The first play presented was entitled "Drowning Men Catch at Straws." A singular and sad coincidence in connection with the event was the fact that a man was drowned in the Wabash on the day of the initial performance.

Through the efforts of the distinguished General W. Johnson the first Masonic lodge of the State was organized at Vincennes in 1806. The first business was transacted when John Gibson, F. C., was raised to the degree of a Master Mason. A galaxy of great names might be mentioned in connection with its organization. Henry Dubois, John Decker, Elihu Stout, the founder of the Vincennes Sun, Colonel Joseph H. Davies, Thomas Randolph, Colonel Isaac White, Colonel Thomas H. Blake and Alexander Buckner, both later members of Congress, and Walter Taylor, elected by the first session of the Legislature as United States Senator, are only a few.

The old Ohio & Mississippi Railroad was built in 1859. For many years it had its principal offices at Vincennes. The Wabash was extensively navigated by flat boats and this was a convenient point for exchange of cargoes.

Vincennes being the oldest city in the State and for many years the most important settlement in the Northwest Territory, many important events of history have been passed over in this short sketch. Perhaps no western settlement abounds with more tales of romance and adventure than Old Vincennes. No early settlement portrays more vividly the joys and hardships of pioneer life. This has made her famous in song and story. The later history of the city is one of commercialism and politics. It has grown to a thriving city of twenty thousand inhabitants, surrounded by rich farming lands under which are found coal and oil. Factories have sprung up to increase the industry of the city. The history of the last fifty years would mostly disclose facts common to nearly every county of the State, so with our limited space we will pass it by.

POLITICAL RETROSPECT.

Knox county has always been Democratic. From the time Vincennes became a city in 1856 until the last city election of 1913 she has not had any but a Democratic mayor. The year previous the whole Democratic county ticket went down in defeat in a fight against a coalition between the Republicans and Progressives, and in 1913 a Republican mayor was elected by a small margin. The Democrats came back in 1914, however, and elected the full county ticket by a good majority, and we are proud to write in the beginning that Knox county is still Democratic.

There seems to be no record from which can be obtained the exact date of the first organization of the party in the county. From the files of the Western Sun it appears that a committee met in 1832 and elected Daniel Langdon as chairman of the Democratic-Republican party. A ticket was placed in the field and elected. There seems to have been little political activity from that time until the campaign of 1840 when William Henry Harrison was a candidate on the Whig ticket. The only organization then maintained was township Democratic associations, and these existed for the benefit of the National organization. There seems to have been some connection between these several organizations, but if they had a head it does not appear by the files of the Sun. The probabilities are, however, that there was a central organization, but that its doings were not published. It is interesting to note that the Sun advertised printed ballots at $3.00 per thousand to be had by the workers for use in the coming election. The result of that election was also printed and it showed that in nearly every township "Tippecanoe and Tyler, too," got two-thirds of the votes polled.

But in the next campaign under the leadership of John Rice Jones and later James J. Mayes and others the party came back and was organized on a firmer basis. In 1856 George E. Greene, Sr., purchased the Courant and Patriot, a newspaper, the outgrowth of the old Western Sun and Advertiser and renewed its publication under the name of the Western Sun. Those were stirring days. The public conscience was seething with slavery and abolitionism. Stephen A. Douglas and Lincoln soon after met in their series of famous debates. Party spirit ran high. Greene himself assumed control of the organization. The Democrats had in a way been successful, having since the successful campaign of Franklin Pierce elected most of the candidates of their political faith. But politics had up to that time been largely personal and some Whigs were successful. In 1860 Greene and his friends organized the party and made a party fight. Greene himself was elected chairman. The Democrats succeeded in electing almost their entire ticket. A notable exception was Cyrus M. Allen for Representative. But James Reynolds was elected sheriff and this meant much to the Democrats of Knox county.

James Reynolds was one of the most popular men of his time. He was elected four times as sheriff and twice as treasurer of the county. He did much to hold the party together from the period of about 1860 to 1880 and to keep it in the van of success.

From 1860 until 1912, when the Republicans made a clean sweep and elected every candidate to office, the only Republicans elected were, in 1886, clerk, sheriff, recorder, treasurer, surveyor, coroner, two commissioners; in 1890, auditor; in 1894, treasurer, representative, one commissioner; in 1898, sheriff; in 1904, representative and two commissioners. The circuit bench was never occupied by a Republican until after the election of 1912, except for one short term of a few weeks when James C. Denney was appointed in 1864.

Among the great Democrats who have served in the capacity of judge in this county might be named Isaac Blackford, who afterward became judge of the supreme court and reported its first decisions, March, 1815, to March, 1816; William Prince, February, 1817, to April, 1818; John Law, 1830-31 and 1844-50; General W. Johnson, 1831-32; William E. Niblack, 1854-57; Newton F. Malcott, 1871-88; George W. Shaw, 1888-1900; O. H. Cobb, 1900 to 1912. John Baker also was judge from 1865 to 1870.

In the State Legislature Knox county Democrats have always been prominent. Among the early Democratic speakers of the House were Isaac Blackford, first session; General W. Johnson, seventh session; Robert M. Evans, tenth session. Recently Mason J. Niblack served three consecutive terms as speaker. The first session of the Legislature elected Walter Taylor, a Vincennes man, as one of the first United States Senators from Indiana. Knox county has furnished to the supreme bench the following Democrats: John Johnston, 1816-17; Isaac Blackford, 1817-53; Charles Dewey, 1836-47; William E. Niblack, 1876-88.

Five citizens of Knox county have been elected to Congress from this district. Their name is legion who have been elected from other districts who once lived here. John Ewing served in the Lower House from 1833-35 and from 1837 to 1839. From 1857 to 1861 Judge William E. Niblack was a member of Congress from this district, and again from 1865 to 1875. Judge Niblack was born in Dubois county in 1823, but when quite a young man moved to Dover Hill in Martin county. For several terms he represented Martin county in the Legislature, both in the House and Senate. In 1854 he was appointed judge of this Judicial Circuit; and in 1858 while still on the bench he was elected to Congress to fill out the unexpired term of James Lockhart. He took up his residence at Vincennes about 1859 and for seven terms he represented this district in Congress. He was elected as a member of the Supreme Court of Indiana in 1876 and again in 1882, and wore the judicial ermine with becoming grace and dignity, his decisions always being sound and logical.

James D. Williams was probably one of the most picturesque men ever produced by Knox county. He always wore blue homespun and from this was nicknamed "Blue Jeans." Even when he was elected to Congress he persisted in wearing them at all times. Less than one term in Congress won for him the Governorship of Indiana, and it came about in a singular way. He made an attack on an appropriation bill on the floor of the House because it carried with it quite a large sum for cloak room expenses, including lemonade and porters and numerous pages and many things which are supposed to be necessary to the rich, but luxuries for the poor. Representative Foster of Ohio replied to his remarks in a scathing speech referring to his blue jeans in a derisive manner. The boys back home took up the fight and nominated "Blue Jeans" Williams for Governor. He was overwhelmingly elected. Strange to relate, Representative Foster that same year ran for Governor of Ohio and that very speech deriding the Indiana Congressman and his blue jeans defeated him at the election. James D. Williams served five terms in the House of Representatives and two in the State Senate. He resigned his first term in the National Congress to run for Governor. He was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention at Baltimore in 1872. He died in 1880.

Thomas R. Cobb was elected to the State Senate in 1858. He was the Democratic candidate for elector in 1868. He was president of the Indiana State Convention in 1876. He was a delegate to the National Convention at St. Louis which nominated Tilden and Hendricks in 1876. He was elected as a member of Congress in 1877 and served until 1887. He was born in Lawrence county in 1828 and took up the practice of law in Vincennes in 1867 and died at the same place in 1892.

William Allen Cullop, a resident of Vincennes, is the present representative in Congress from the Second Congressional District. He was born in Knox county March 28, 1853. Graduate of Hanover College, 1878. He was elected prosecuting attorney in 1883 and served two terms. He was a member of the Indiana Legislature in 1891-93. He was a delegate to the Democratic National Conventions in 1892, 1896 and 1900. In 1900 he was a candidate for elector on the Democratic ticket. He was elected to the 61st, 62d, 63d and 64th Congresses. He is a lawyer and a legislator of signal ability and the rank and file of Knox county are proud of his Democracy.

The following have been elected to the State House of Representatives since 1858: Isaac N. Eastham, 1858-60; W. E. Niblack, 1860-64; John B. Patterson, 1864-66; O. F. Baker, 1866-68; James D. Williams, 1868-70, who had previously been elected in 1843, 1847, 1851 and 1856; H. S. Cauthorn, 1870-74; Charles E. Crane, 1874-76; F. W. Veihe, 1876-78; H. S. Cauthorn, 1878-82; S. W. Williams, 1882-84; James D. Williams, 1884-86; Mason J. Niblack, 1886-92; William A. Cullop, 1892-94; Basil Gaither, Republican, 1894-96; Maitland Claycomb, 1896-1900; Dr. J. L. Reeve, 1900-04; Basil Gaither, Republican, 1904-06; James Garrard, 1906-10, who was floor leader during his second term; W. S. Racy, 1910-12; E. I. Gilmore, Republican, 1912-14; A. J. Westfall, 1914.

Senators—James D. Williams, 1859-66; William Turner, 1866-70; James D. Williams, 1870-74; Henry K. Wilson, 1874-78; Frederick W. Veihe, 1878-82; J. Ernest, 1882-86; W. W. Berry, 1886-90; Royal E. Purcell, 1898-02; M. M. McDowell, 1906-10; D. Frank Culbertson, 1914.

In the election of 1912 the Republicans swept the county. But in 1914 the Democrats came back with almost their old-time majority and elected D. Frank Culbertson State Senator; A. J. Westfall, Representative; M. J. Niblack, Joint Representative; J. W. Kimmel, Prosecuting Attorney; John Wolfe, Sheriff; Walter Kensler, Clerk; Joseph I. Meunterz, Auditor; Louis Langdon, Recorder; George Buckalew, Assessor; Dr. S. L. Carson, Coroner; Win Reel, Surveyor, and Leslie Morgan and Alf. Brocksmith, County Commissioners. Harmony is the watchword and every Democrat feels that he has a say in the policies of his party. They feel sure that their old majority can be maintained.

NEWSPAPERS.

In war, civil government, politics, law, education and letters, Vincennes was not a lesser pioneer than in journalism. The first newspaper in the Northwest Territory was the Western Sun, established one hundred and ten years ago. Its founder was Elihu Stout, grandfather of Henry S. Cauthorn, previously mentioned. He came here in 1803 from Frankfort, Ky., where he had been working on the Kentucky Gazette as a practical printer. The first issue was printed on the Fourth of July, 1804, nearly a year having been required in which to transport on pack horses the material necessary for the publication. From its first issue the paper was published regularly every week for nearly two years, when a destructive fire swept away every vestige of the office. A new outfit was procured and the resurrected paper was again published on July 4, 1807. The name, which was originally the Indiana Gazette, was changed to the Western Sun. George C. Smoot became a partner in the concern on August 1, 1807, but retired on November 17 of the same year, his interest being purchased by James Jennings, who retired on December 23, 1808. In 1817 the name of the paper was changed to Western Sun and General Advertiser. In October, 1819, John Washburn became a partner, and retired September 20, 1820. On January 19, 1839, Henry Stout became a partner and the paper was published under the name of E. Stout & Son. Elihu Stout remained at the head of the enterprise until November, 1845, when he was appointed postmaster, and sold the paper to John Rice Jones. Mr. Jones sold a half interest to his brother and the firm continued its publication until 1848 or 1849 when it failed for want of support and John Rice Jones went to Washington to accept a government position. On his return from the National Capital he started Jones' Vincennes Sentinel. This paper after a brief and unprofitable career suspended and was followed by the Vincennes Indiana Patriot, published by James J. Mayes. The Patriot was established in 1853, shortly before L. & M. A. McClagherty had launched the Courant, and in October of the same year both papers passed into the hands of the last named firm, and were consolidated as the Courant and Patriot. The paper bitterly opposed the doctrine of Know-Nothingism and strongly advocated Buchanan's candidacy for the presidency. In 1856 this paper passed into the hands of George E. Greene, Sr., who renewed the old name of Western Sun and continued its publication until his death in 1870. Reuben C. Kise then took charge and in 1871 took into partnership Andrew J. Thomas. Mr. Kise died in 1873 and Alfred Patton acquired his half from the heirs and the firm became known as A. J. Thomas & Co. Royal E. Purcell, the present owner, bought the paper on November 1, 1876, when it was a semi-weekly and began its publication as a daily. The paper is the Democratic organ of the county and is ably edited. The old files of the Western Sun, printed while Elihu Stout was editor, were sold by the late Henry Cauthorn several years ago to the State for $1,000 per volume, and today are an important part of the historical collections to be found in the Indiana Library at Indianapolis.

Other publications were "The News of the Day," established in 1854 and successively edited by William H. Jackson and James G. Hutchinson. It was a Know-Nothing paper and was in three years supplanted by the Gazette, founded by R. Y. Caddington which was later published by G. R. Harvey, James A. Mason and Milton P. Ghee. In 1859 it became the property of H. M. Smith and M. P. Ghee, who ably conducted it until 1861 when William N. Denney became its owner and continued its publication until 1862. Dr. H. M. Smith and Colonel C. M. Allen became its owners, but soon disposed of it to Charles I. Williams who retained Colonel Allen as editor. It later came into the hands of John M. Griffin whose editorial career was so stormy that he seldom went on the street but that some one wanted to "lick the editor."

In 1862 the Old Post Union was founded by J. G. Caddington, but it survived only a few years when it was absorbed by the Vincennes Times, a Republican paper. In 1873 General Laz. Noble became associated with its management, and wrought a decided improvement in the editorial page. It was later sold to James J. Mayes, John Mallet and Alfred Crotts. The paper was in a few years suspended and Mr. Crotts bought in the material and still conducts a job printing office at the old stand.

The Vincennes Commercial, the leading Republican paper, was established in 1877 by Spillard Fletcher Horrall, Albion Horrall and Nelson Horrall under the name of S. F. Horrall & Sons. In 1881 the paper was sold to a stock company of which John C. Adams was the manager. In 1882 he was succeeded by Thomas H. Adams who had procured a majority of the stock and who still edits the paper.

Two German newspapers have been published in Vincennes, both Democratic. The first was established in 1876 by Louis and Henry Rosenthal (the latter now editor of the Evansville Democrat) and was called the Volksblatt. Several years later L. A. Meyer established the Vincennes Post. Two years after its beginning the type was changed to English instead of German and William Pennington was made its editor. It proved a losing investment and Mr. Meyer sold it to George M. Cook, who changed its name to the Vincennes Capital. In 1902 he sold it to Frank W. Curtis, Perry G. Greene and J. Ralph DuKate, the present owners. It has been a Republican paper since George M. Cook became its owner.

The Knox County Democrat was established in 1890 by Allen Campbell. Frank G. Signor succeeded Mr. Campbell in 1893 and sold it to James Garrard and Ed. Quittle. In 1894 Mr. Quittle withdrew and Mr. Garrard continued its publication until 1909 when he sold it to A. R. Cochran who sold it March, 1910, to J. Kimmel, the present owner. Two years ago he changed the name to the Vincennes News under which name it is now published weekly. Its editorial policy is Democratic.

Knox county has furnished many great names in the history of Indiana, but in a history as limited as this it is impossible to mention them all. Even a short history would not be complete without some mention of William H. Vollmer, Treasurer of State from 1910 to 1914. He was perhaps the best political organizer Knox county ever had. He always met everyone with a smile and the glad hand and was more than a success more than once in getting the boys together. He filled the office of county treasurer twice with distinction to himself and honor to his party and the Democracy of Knox county was more than pleased when he was nominated as State Treasurer. Other Vincennes men who have recently filled positions of importance under the State government are H. Thornton Willis, Deputy State Treasurer; General George W. McCoy, Adjutant under Governor Marshall, and Will E. Tuite, Deputy in the State Statistician's office.

Knox county is proud of her fathers, of her sons and her future.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF KOSCIUSKO COUNTY

By M. L. Gochenour

THADDEUS KOSCIUZKO, the young Polish noble who tendered his services to the cause of American freedom and was early made aid-de-camp on the staff of General George Washington, and who later became immortal in Polish memory as commander-in-chief of the ill-fated rebellion in Poland in 1794, died in 1817. He left unaltered a will which had been drawn by Thomas Jefferson upon the occasion of Kosciuzko's last visit to America in 1798. The will reads:

"I, Thaddeus Kosciuzko, being just in my departure from America, do hereby declare and direct that, should I make no other testamentary disposition of my property in the United States, I hereby authorize my friend, Thomas Jefferson, to employ the whole thereof in purchasing negroes from among his own, or any others, and giving them their liberty in my name; in giving them an education in trades or otherwise, and in having them instructed for their new condition in the duties of morality which may make them good neighbors, good fathers or mothers, and in their duties as citizens, teaching them to be defenders of their liberty and country, and of the good order of society, and in whatsoever may make them happy and useful. And I make the said Thomas Jefferson my executor of this.

"5th day of May, 1798. T. KOSCIUZKO."

According to tradition, Kosciusko county was named by John B. Chapman, one of the pioneer leaders of the county, after Thaddeus Kosciuzko. The town, later city of Warsaw, was christened by the same godfather after the capital of Kosciuzko's native land. Chapman was an admirer of Kosciuzko's character. Chapman's widely scattered neighbors must have subscribed to the sentiment of Kosciuzko's will, for the political parties which advocated the freedom and citizenship for the negro predominated in Kosciusko county from its organization to the end of the Reconstruction period. By that time the habit of voting the straight Republican ticket had become an affliction for an overwhelming majority of the sovereigns of the county which they have seldom been able to shake off.

The lands lying within the present limits of Kosciusko county were ceded to the United States on October 27, 1832, by a treaty concluded on the banks of the Tippecanoe river, about three miles from Rochester, Fulton county, Indiana, by Chiefs Benack, Mary Ann Benack, Checose, Flatbelly, Mota Monoquet, Musquawbuck and Wawasee. In the cession each of the chiefs retained reservations consisting of three to eight sections, according to the importance of the respective tribes. This treaty was ratified the following year. On February 7, 1835, the present county boundaries were established and the county was organized in April, 1836. For judicial purposes the county had previously been attached to Elkhart county and known as Turkey Creek township.

"New York Yankees," New Englanders, "Pennsylvania Dutch," some dissatisfied settlers from Ohio, with a sprinkling from Virginia and the Carolinas, chiefly comprised the pioneer stock of the county. They found lakes, rivers and streams in abundance, but very little prairie land except the Leesburg and Turkey Creek prairies. The remainder of the county was covered with hardwood timber, lakes and marshes. The Tippecanoe river has its source in the beautiful Tippecanoe lake, in this county, and is the outlet for all of the principal lakes of the county except four. This historic river is fed by Webster lake, Pike lake, Winona lake, Huffman's lake, Crystal lake, Palestine lake, Yellowcreek lake and many smaller lakes. The Eel river drains the extreme south part of the county and is fed by Silver lake and Rock lake, while on the other side of the water shed, the largest lake in the State, variously called Nine-Mile, Turkey Creek and Wawasee lake, empties the water from the northeast corner of the county into the Great Lakes. In area the county is second only to Allen in the State and now has a population of over 35,000. In fertility of the soil it is second to none, and the rich marl deposits in many of the lakes constitutes the most valuable natural resource; but this is a political review.

Ostensibly Kosciusko county has been Republican since the organization of that party and Whig—rather anti-slave—before that time, with only enough exceptions to prove the rule. The spirit expressed in the will of the patriot for whom the county was named became the political creed of the first settlers and the parties espousing the anti-slavery cause claimed consistent majorities until long after that issue had become a memory only. When the Republican party had nothing but its reputation to commend it, a big majority of the county's electorate continued to "trod in the paths that their fathers had trod."

Prior to 1873 Kosciusko county had but one

Democrat in the county office. He was David Rippey, who was commissioner of the middle district from 1836 to 1844. During the year 1873 E. Van Long of Warsaw was appointed Judge of the Circuit Court by Governor Thomas A. Hendricks. The circuit was then Fulton, Kosciusko and Marshall counties. The following year Judge Long was elected for a six-year term. In order to displace Long the Republicans "gerrymandered" the circuit in 1880, placing Kosciusko and Whitley counties upon the same circuit, but Long was elected in that year as Judge of the new circuit, although in neither election did he receive a majority in this county. Vice-President Thomas R. Marshall of Columbia City was the Democratic nominee for Prosecuting Attorney of the circuit in this campaign, but was defeated. No Democrat tasted public office in Kosciusko county after that year until the miracle year of 1906.

Complete official statistics of the vote prior to 1890 are not available. We must be content with the observation that prior to 1890 the Democratic county, State and national tickets were the losers by consistently wide margins, with the sole exception of David Rippey, which has been noted. Claude Matthews lost the county to Milton Trussler for Secretary of State in 1890 by a margin of 656 votes, the smallest Republican majority since the Civil war. Since that date the vote on State and national tickets has been as follows:

|------------------------|-----------|-------------|--------------|-----------|
| 1892. Highest elector. | 3,064 | 3,823 | | 759 |
| 1894. Secy. of State. | 2,767 | 4,094 | | 1,224 |
| 1896. Highest elector. | 3,354 | 4,342 | | 988 |
| 1898. Secy. of State. | 2,795 | 3,911 | | 1,116 |
| 1900. Highest elector. | 3,265 | 4,422 | | 1,157 |
| 1902. Secy. of State. | 2,843 | 3,803 | | 960 |
| 1904. Highest elector. | 2,913 | 4,550 | | 1,437 |
| 1906. Secy. of State. | 3,042 | 3,646 | | 604 |
| 1908. Highest elector. | 3,362 | 4,377 | | 1,015 |
| 1910. Sec'y of State. | 2,970 | 3,860 | | 890 |
| 1912. Highest elector. | 2,817 | 1,767 | 2,096 | 1,050 |
| | | | (Plurality.) | |
| 1916. Highest elector. | 3,447 | 4,025 | 15 | 578 |

From these figures it is seen that until very recent years the Republican margin has been wide, reaching its height in 1904, falling to low water mark in 1906, and for the only time in the county's history it was wiped out in the three-cornered fights of 1912 and 1914.

Consequent carelessness and inefficiency resulting from too long unbroken tenure in control of the county upon the part of the local Republican party led to the revolution of 1906, when every Democrat on the county ticket was elected excepting the nominee for Representative, who lost by six votes. In that campaign Benjamin F. Shively carried the county for Congress against A. L.

Brick by a majority of eighty-one, Shively being the only Democrat ever to have carried the county for Congress. T. Wayne Anglin was elected Prosecuting Attorney; C. Edwin Stout, Clerk; John C. Beagle, Auditor; George W. Irvine, Treasurer; John C. Pinkerton, Recorder; Edward Haas, Sheriff; William S. Kiplinger, Coroner; S. Linsey Blue, Surveyor; William H. Thomas, Assessor; Samuel P. Glant, Commissioner of the Northern district, and Peter Clemer, Commissioner of the Southern district, by majorities ranging from 113 to 337. Two years later Francis E. Bowser, Democrat, defeated Lemuel W. Royse, his Republican opponent, for Judge of the Kosciusko Circuit Court by 178 votes, and George W. Irvine was re-elected Treasurer, Edward Haas re-elected Sheriff and Peter Clemer re-elected Commissioner of the Southern district.

The first Democrat to represent Kosciusko county in the State Legislature was elected in 1912, when Carlin Myers was chosen Joint Representative for Kosciusko, Whitley and Huntington counties. T. Wayne Anglin was again elected Prosecuting Attorney that year. In 1914 Judge Bowser was re-elected by a majority of 166 votes over the same opponent, the remainder of the county ticket being defeated, although in fairness it must be said that the Progressives had a full county ticket with one exception. They made no nomination for Judge. The entire Democratic county ticket was defeated in 1916 by small majorities, but the result had one unusual feature. For the first time the Democratic national ticket led both the State and county nominees.

The intensity of the contests cannot be described here. Odd and interesting incidents characterized each campaign. The party leaders in these "game," but too often losing contests, have mostly passed into the limbo of forgotten dreams. Memories of two of these will doubtless endure for generations. They are William Conrad and Andrew G. Wood.

William Conrad came to Kosciusko county in 1840. After serving a period of apprenticeship in the Studebaker Wagon Works at South Bend, in 1860 he founded the Conrad Wagon and Buggy Works in Warsaw. In 1868 he was chosen county chairman and served as head of the county organization until 1888. In 1892 he was made chairman of the Thirteenth congressional district and in 1894 was re-elected. He was a man of means and he gave unsparingly to the party in both time and money. It is said the organization never quit a campaign in debt during his leadership. One of Conrad's contemporaries, General Reuben H. Williams, who for years edited the Republican organ, the Northern Indian- ian, once paid this tribute: "If it were not for Conrad there would not be a Democratic party in Kosciusko county." He was succeeded by Francis E. Bowser as county chairman in 1888.

In the campaign of 1880, when Vice-President Thomas R. Marshall was on the ticket as the nominee for Prosecuting Attorney for this and Whitley counties, Marshall made his first political speech in the county at Palestine. He came over to Warsaw by rail and was taken to Palestine by Conrad in a buggy. Conrad says Marshall came dressed immaculately with a large bouquet of flowers in his coat lapel. As they neared the little village Conrad gently, but firmly, advised the now Vice-President that his audience would be chiefly men, and farmers at that, and, in Conrad's opinion, the bouquet had better be taken off. Conrad's version of the incident is that Marshall threw the flowers away.

The State committee often embarrassed Conrad by sending speakers of slight ability to the county. During the campaign of 1884 Conrad received notice that the committee had billed the nominee for Supreme Court Reporter for three speeches in the county. The nominee was John W. Kern, and Conrad, with characteristic conservatism, billed the then unknown quantity for Atwood, Milford and Silver Lake, sending Captain Andrew G. Wood to Atwood to introduce the speaker and talk after Kern had finished for the purpose of patching up Kern's expected indiscretions. Wood introduced Kern, but did not speak after Kern had finished. His report to Conrad was that Kern left nothing unsaid, and that Conrad had made the mistake of his life in not billing Kern for Warsaw. William Conrad is now eighty-three years old and Andrew G. Wood is but one year his junior.

At the close of the Civil war Captain Wood came to the county and entered the practice of law, in which he is still engaged. From his earliest residence Mr. Wood has been prominently identified with his party organization and has sacrificed unflinchingly in every campaign, city, county, State and national. In 1904 he was elected Mayor of Warsaw, serving three years, and enjoys the unique distinction of having been the city's only Mayor who was a Democrat. For many campaigns the burden of stumping the county was upon him and he threw himself enthusiastically into fight after fight without thought of reward. At the ripe maturity of eighty-two Mr. Wood yet constitutes the backbone of the party leadership in his county.

The Warsaw Union has been the organ of the Democratic party of Kosciusko county. It was started in 1859 by A. G. Mugg as the Warsaw Experiment. The next year it passed into the hands of E. Van Long and Dr. Theodore Davenport, who changed the name to the Union. Long edited the paper until 1864, when he sold it to Frank J. Zimmerman, who in turn sold it to Andrew G. Wood in 1866. The next year S. L. Baker and M. L. Crawford became the publishers, Wood continuing as editor until April, 1868, when the paper was again purchased by Zimmerman, who continued as editor and publisher until 1896, when it was purchased by J. V. Bowersox. In 1901 H. S. K. Bartholomew purchased the paper of Bowersox and acted as editor and publisher until 1904, when he sold it to C. William Smith. Mr. Smith, in addition to continuing the publication of the weekly paper, started the Daily Union. Under Smith's management the Daily Union attained the largest circulation of any daily paper in the county. Smith sold the paper in 1915 to Andrew A. Gast and his son, Estil A. Gast, of Akron. Mr. Estil A. Gast became editor and assumed full charge of the paper on January 1, 1916, and has just closed the most successful year in the paper's history. During the year he changed the name of the daily to the Warsaw Union and that of the weekly to the Kosciusko Union. Early in the year 1916 Mr. Estil A. Gast was chosen Democratic chairman of the Thirteenth congressional district. The unusual ability and unlimited energy which he put into the campaign not only resulted in the re-election of Henry H. Barnhart to Congress, but added prestige and strength to the local Democratic paper which it had not enjoyed before. The Gasts have obtained Associated Press service and made the paper one of the best county dailies in the State.

Kosciusko county has a long list of prominent Democratic educators. We can mention only the most prominent. Joseph P. Dolan, for years superintendent of the public schools at Syracuse, rightly leads the list from the standpoint of party service. He is the most influential Democrat in the northeast part of the county and deserves better reward than he has received. His worthy successor as superintendent at Syracuse, Charles O. Baughman, made a good race as the party's nominee for County Auditor in 1914. The city of Warsaw now has an energetic, progressive Democrat as superintendent of the city schools in the person of H. S. Kaufman. Richard Vanderveer, who is now a member of the local bar, for many years was superintendent of the Milford schools. Perhaps the best rewarded of our Democratic school teachers is Edson B. Sarber, who was chosen as County Superintendent of Schools in 1904 and was twice re-elected, resigning in 1916 to become Assistant Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Of the medical fraternity of the county Dr. Theodore Davenport, of whom we have already spoken, was the foremost Democrat, being rewarded by Governor Thomas A. Hendricks with the appointment as superintendent of the Northern prison at Michigan City. Other prominent Democrats of the profession have been Dr. W. F. Seymour of Leesburg, Drs. A. C. McDonald and W. L. Hines of Warsaw and Dr. W. C. Landis of Claypool.

The lawyers of the county who have rendered service to the party named in the order of their admission to the bar are as follows: Messrs. J. Long, E. Van Long, Woodson S. Marshall, Andrew G. Wood, Samson J. North, William A. Marlow, Commodore Clemens, Samuel S. Baker, Isaac L. Ayers, Samuel W. Cosond, Orange O. Felkner, James V. Van Guilder, Isaac H. Hall, Jesse D. Chaplin, John D. McClaren, Francis E. Bowser, Richard Vanderveer, John H. Aiken, Rex S. Emerick, Merl L. Gochenour, George Landers and Cecil Whitehead.

Since 1906 the Kosciusko county Democracy has taken a new lease on life. The enduring service of Woodrow Wilson's administration has meant much to us. Our path has not been strewn with roses and our triumphs have been few. We simply ask the indulgence of the Indiana Democracy to have even more patience and let us try again; if necessary, even again, for it is no small task we have been given.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF LAGRANGE COUNTY

By J. Frank Snyder

IN parceling out the territory in the arrangement of the counties of the northeast part of the State, Lagrange county was made up of what was left when the surveyors reached the Michigan line, hence it had scarcely three full squares of congressional townships. It was considered a victory when the territory that had been set apart was retained, when, in 1834, our neighbor to the north—Michigan—demanded a "rectification" of her frontier. The escape was narrow when Michigan asked a strip ten miles wide off northern Indiana, but her craving was not satisfied with a cession of a territory of Lake Superior region which she hoped to gain. Had she been successful there would have been nothing of this historical record. The southern and middle tier of townships received the United States survey approved for congressional townships, and the other townships were filled out as best suited the distance to the boundary line, so that the upper tier of townships were cut down to a width of only four miles and two-thirds, there being but three hundred and eighty-four miles of territory to be divided into eleven townships.

The county takes its name from the country residence of Lafayette, the noted Frenchman, who yet lives in the esteem of all Americans. With but one county separating it from the Buckeye influence on the east, and scarcely knowing when it ceases to be a Hoosier and begins to be a Wolverine at its northern boundary, it partakes of a genial character that makes the Lagrange county citizen a "long distance attachment" to governmental affairs at the State capital, the center of political orders and State House ambition. His only advantage has been in the opportunity of drawing a heavy mileage fee when called upon to do service at the seat of the State government. The Lagrange county citizen is grown in a pure atmosphere—the altitude is about an average of 950 feet above the sea level. Thirty-five or more lakes add to the charm of its scenery and purity of its atmosphere. The only river of any size is Pigeon, which flows through the county in a north-westerly direction and receives most of the lake and creek overflow. In this territory originates many startling fish stories.

Prior to 1833 the territory where Democrats have been so sparingly grown, which afterward became Lagrange county, was attached to Elkhart county, and known as the township of Monquoinong, with Goshen as the county seat of the unit. The county was organized sixteen years after Indiana entered statehood, Governor Noah Noble approving the act for the organization of the county on February 2 (Ground Hog day), 1832. The first election for county officers was held in the spring of 1832, when Joshua T. Hobbs was elected Clerk; Daniel Harding, Sheriff; Thomas Gale, Treasurer; David St. Clair, Recorder; Jacob Vandevanter, Edmund Littlefield and Arthur Barrows, Commissioners. Politics had little or nothing to do with the selection.

The first court house was erected at Lima in 1833, the center of population then being at that point, but it was soon discovered that the county seat must be more central, and Lagrange Center—as it was for years known—was hit upon, and the State Legislature of 1843 mapped out the new town, public buildings were erected and the county seat established at this place.

The very early days of the county found some Democrats in official position, but the foothold was dislodged and for more than half a century—up until the breaking away from "boss rule" in 1912—there had not been a Democrat elected to fill any county office since 1853, when John Kromer, a pronounced Democrat, left the office of county recorder, having been elected in 1843. He was one of the best-posted men on historical affairs of the county, having moved in the vicinity of Lima as early as 1830. He assisted for years in the business of the county in various offices in the court house.

Andrew Ellison, another unique Democratic personage, whose life history in northern Indiana politics would make an interesting volume of itself, was county commissioner, leaving the office in 1853. Mr. Ellison was born in Ireland in the early days of 1817 and came to this county from New York in 1835, entering the practice of law in Lagrange county in 1842. He walked all the way to Indianapolis to be admitted to the Supreme Court practice the following year. He was a candidate for Congress in the memorable canvass of 1868 against "Billy" Williams, the early day congressman from Kosciusko county, and noted Republican politician, but was defeated. Later he was a candidate in the triangular fight when General Milo S. Hascal of Goshen was nominated as a candidate, expecting to lead the liberal Republicans and his Democratic friends to victory against the regular Republican nominee. Mr. Ellison championed the cause of the "nonmixable" Democrats and Hascal was defeated. He was also a candidate for Judge of the Circuit Court two or three times, and made the fight as presidential-electoral as many times, stumping northern Indiana with a vigor that gave him prominence as a political speaker. With it all, however, he closed his life having fought the battles without having won any official position of distinction as a reward for his sacrifices.

The first vote in the county in 1836 gave Van Buren, Democrat, 136 votes, and Harrison, Whig, 128—Democratic majority of 22. In 1848, with Cass as the regular Democrat, Van Buren on the Free Soil and Taylor on the Whig ticket, the Democrats had a plurality of 7. In 1852, with Scott as the Whig candidate, Pierce, Democrat, and Hall, Free Soil, the principal parties tied. This was the last near-to-victory experience the party had until 1912. At this time Judge Otis L. Ballou was elected Joint Senator to represent Lagrange and Noble counties in the State Legislature and proved a Senator of large influence in both the sessions of 1913 and 1915, he being a holdover member. Mr. Ballou is an able lawyer, a forceful orator, and lives close to the interests of his home folk. He began the practice of law in the county in 1875, has been Circuit Judge by appointment of the Governor, and filled other important positions of trust. Senator Ballou has filled the position of county chairman several times and been active in politics for a number of years.

The other successful candidates were George W. Choler, Clerk of the Circuit Court; Victor Camp, County Treasurer; Cloyd Lupold, County Recorder; George E. Henderson, Sheriff; Carl C. Mishler, Surveyor; Joseph F. Kimmel and David J. Norris, Commissioners. These men have all made excellent records as public officials. The sheriff and surveyor have been succeeded by Republican officials. Mr. Choler was re-elected and is midway in his second term.

Lewis Price, a prominent young farmer of Lagrange county, and a sterling Democrat, was the party's candidate for Joint Representative of the counties of Lagrange and Steuben in the State Legislature in the campaign of 1912. Though both counties are strongly Republican, Mr. Price was elected by a good, safe majority and represented the counties in the Legislature of 1913, making a splendid record. He was a candidate for re-election in the campaign of 1914, but was defeated by a narrow margin. Mr. Price was born and educated in the county and, taking a thorough agricultural course at Purdue University, he has become one of the much-sought-after Farmers' Institute lecturers of the State.

Newspaper matters had much to do with the strong foothold which the Democratic opponents gained in the county, and which was held throughout the years. The Republicans maintained a strong party organ that played well the "tune" of the organization, which handed it out liberal patronage and support. The Democrats, much of the time discouraged, engaged in the enterprise of trying to reform the Democratic politics of the other counties round about who wanted to place a man to the front and, thus divided on trivial local issues, played into the hands of the opposition party who were for the offices, first, last and all the time.

The party was without a representative newspaper much of the time up to 1879, while the Republicans maintained a newspaper, the Lagrange Standard, from the year 1856, which grew into prominence on public patronage and remained steadfastly Republican until 1912, when it espoused the Progressive cause.

In October, 1845, Jewett, Owen and Bennett established the Lagrange Democrat in the then county seat, Lima. This continued for four or five years and was suspended. The editor, Mr. Owen, it is said, was a relative of that noted politician and statesman, Robert Dale Owen, and because of his tall bony physique was known as "Old Bones." Following this effort, J. S. Castle started a Democratic paper at Lagrange called the Democrat, and after a brief time moved the paper to Lima and discontinued the publication in 1862. This was succeeded by another Democratic paper in 1868, with Francis Henry and Howard M. Coe as editors. The plant was consumed by fire in 1869. The brave Democratic stockholders renewed their stock, a new outfit was purchased and placed under the control of Mr. Henry, but it was only a short time when the plant was sold and moved to Sturgis, Michigan.

The county was then without a Democratic representative until 1879, when the Lagrange County Democrat was established by J. Frank Snyder, who conducted the paper for eleven years until his appointment as postmaster of Lagrange by President Cleveland, during his first administration. A few months after entering the postoffice Mr. Snyder transferred his interest in the paper to his associate editor D. A. Fawcett, and since that time the paper has changed hands many times, but has always stood true to the cause of Democracy. In the fall of 1913 the publication was consolidated with the Saturday Call, and was for a time published semi-weekly as the Democrat-Call, Mr. Snyder being one of its editors.

Though Lagrange county has not produced any large number of men who have held official positions it has been the home of some worthy Democrats who have proven helpful and loyal to the Democratic cause. Among these are the attorneys of Lagrange—aside from Senator Otis L. Ballou, mentioned elsewhere—John W. Hanan and Frank J. Dunton, sterling Jeffersonian Democrats who have also taken an active part in party affairs.

Judge John W. Hanan is head of the law firm of Hanan, Watson and Hanan. He began his law practice in 1886 in Lagrange with Judge Robert Lowry, former Congressman of the Twelfth District, as his law partner. He is frequently called in service as special judge and has a large legal practice, maintaining offices in Lagrange and Indianapolis. He has been three times appointed by different Governors of the State as trustee of the Eastern Indiana Asylum for the Insane at Richmond, and for several years has been president of the board. In 1892 he was the Democratic nominee for joint Senator between the counties of Lagrange and Steuben and greatly reduced the Republican majorities in these strongholds of Republicanism. He has well served the city and county for several years as city and county attorney, and filled other local offices of trust. He is now fifty-five years of age.

Frank J. Dunton, prominent attorney of Lagrange county began the practice of law in Lagrange in 1889, and has had much to do with the Democratic organization of the county. Though but fifty years old he has been chairman of the county organization of the party—save two years—continuously, since 1889. He was named by Congressman Cyrus Cline, at the commencement of the Wilson administration, for postmaster of Lagrange on the expiration of the term of Mr. McDonald, but during the early part of 1915 he accepted the appointment of Deputy Oil Inspector under the State department. Mr. Dunton has been county attorney for two years past and is closely identified with many of the business interests of Lagrange and the community.

Among the Democrats of the county, aside from those already mentioned—many of them passed to their reward—who have served as chairmen of the organization and done effective service for the party in the various townships are enrolled the names of such worthies as Andrew Emminger, Cyrus Fillmore—brother of former President Fillmore—Charles B. Holmes, James Clugston, Zopher Case, Minott Goodsell, John Sherman, Charles Cochran, N. B. and I. B. Newman, Josiah Rowe, Samuel Beaty, J. F. Clugston, John Will, Abram Bender, William and John Craig, Thomas and Albert Skeer, Thomas VanKirk, Dr. John H. Dancer, Peter Prough, William Woodard, Daniel Boyer, William Gardner, Dr. J. N. Denny, John Kimmell, James Kennedy, William Roderick, Albert H. Price, Charles A. Brant, D. N. Stough, Henry M. Kromer, Robert M. Wigton, Charles L. Atwater, Phillip Wilkins, Isaac and Washington Norris, Isaac and Benjamin Zimmerman, Frank M. Stevenson, John Price, L. M. Rowe (postmaster under Cleveland's administration, second term), James H. Roy (present postmaster at Topeka), A. A. Metz (present postmaster at Wolcottville), Clarence E. Schaeffer (present postmaster at Howe).

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF LAKE COUNTY

IT WAS on January 18, 1837, that the Indiana Legislature passed the act creating Lake county from the territory in the extreme northwest corner of the state, and just one month later the present county of Lake took its corporate existence. It comprises 508 sections of land, and of these but about 400 were considered tillable. The Kankakee marsh land alone was estimated to have 60,000 acres of waste land, while thousands of acres adjoining and in the vicinity of Lake Michigan were a vast area of waste land composed of sand dunes, sloughs, swamps and sand hills. Progress has changed all this. Instead of Kankakee marsh lands untillable and overflowing, we now have the Kankakee valley, with its thousands of acres of as valuable farm land as can be found in all Hoosierdom. And the north end: That is the marvel of the world today, for here is now Indiana's greatest industrial center, destined to be the greatest beehive of industry in the world, and having three cities—Gary, East Chicago, Hammond and Whiting—with a combined population of more than 125,000. The county has an area of 465 square miles, lies between Porter county and the Illinois state line and stretches from the Kankakee river on the south to Lake Michigan on the north.

When the county was organized in 1837 its territory was but sparsely settled by white men, and these were mostly Yankees, Yorkers and Germans. But this was a great hunting and fishing "ground" for the Indians, with at least six Indian villages within its confines. These were at various points, some along the Kankakee, some near the center of the county and some along the Calumet river, that queer stream which then had two mouths, the west one being at what is now South Chicago, and the east mouth (long since filled up to within less than a half-mile of Lake Michigan, where it ends in a tiny branch) at a point which is the beginning of the sand dunes which it is now proposed to preserve as nature's natural park. As late as 1847 there were said to be but 52 residences, five churches, five stores and two office buildings in all Lake county.

In the earlier history of the county the Democratic party predominated and kept the lead until the passing of the Whig party, and the organization of the Republican party. It then became strongly Republican and has so remained ever since. Occasionally a Democrat has broken into office through his individual merits and the comparative weakness of his opponent, but these cases have been rare indeed. Under these circumstances it has required courage and firm loyalty to party principles to keep a party organization intact. Leaders have always arisen, however, to keep up the fight. This task has been more arduous, too, because of the rapid growth of the north end, bringing in new men and new problems. Having so many cities and towns the leaders have necessarily been more numerous than in many other counties, and to name all would scarcely be permissible in this brief resume. Some of these leaders for their great service in holding the party together are worthy of more than a passing mention. Chief of these was M. F. Pierce, of Merrillville. For years he was county chairman and the dominating figure in county politics. Untiring in his work and vigilance he worked with little reward, holding only a township office, and in Cleveland's second term being given the place of deputy revenue collector at the "munificent" salary of $1,200 per year. A number of times drafted to be his party's candidate in a hopeless race for county office, he made notable races with all the vigor of a candidate who is assured of winning. He is numbered with the dead.

Nicholas Scherer, founder of Schererville, was a leader for more than a quarter of a century. When David Turpie was the party nominee for Congress Mr. Scherer was a valued lieutenant and a warm friendship sprang up between the two. This remained firm until death separated them. It was not uncommon for David Turpie to summon his friend Nick to Indianapolis to be a guest at his home. Even when occupying the senatorial seat at Washington he sent for Mr. Scherer, and one of the greatest joys of the old man to the day of his death was to tell how "Dave" made his humble German friend share his quarters and his bed.

Of the present-day leaders Edward Simon has proven the county's greatest "born" leader. Twice county chairman, he organized Lake as it had never been organized before, and his work received such attention from the outside that he has several times refused the party's tender of district chairman. He was elected to the lower house of the Legislature and served a term as county auditor, and even by his political opponents is conceded to have given Lake county the best administration of that office it has ever had.

Among others holding county office have been: Samuel A. Barr, Crown Point, county auditor; John P. Merrill, Crown Point, county treasurer; Chas. H. Friedrich, Hammond, sheriff; Fred S. Carter, Hammond, sheriff; Thos. Hammond, Hammond, congressman; John B. Peterson, Crown Point, prosecuting attorney and congressman; Thos. J. Wood, Crown Point, congressman; Thos. McCay, Crown Point, county treasurer; A. C. Thompson, Ainsworth, county assessor. Holding the office of a county commissioner were George S. Clark, Lowell; Barney G. Scheidt, St. John, and Spencer L. Beach, Leroy. Johannes Kopelke, Crown Point, served a term in the state senate, and Adam R. Ebert, Hammond, a term in the house.

Dr. P. P. Gordon, Hobart, and Dr. A. A. Seidler, Dyer, each served as coroner.

Other men whose energies have directed party affairs have been:

Hammond—Lawrence Becker, Thomas Hammond, Patrick Reilley, Jacob Schloer, L. T. Meyer, S. F. Fogg, Henry Huehn, W. H. Verrill, J. L. Rohde, J. G. Ibach, David Fenton, Samuel Griffin, Robert Gregory, John A. Gavit, F. J. O'Rourke, O. H. Duelke, W. W. McMahon, J. H. Conroy, G. B. Sheerer, E. E. Beck, Mayor J. D. Smalley, Dr. W. F. Howat, J. F. Kuhlman, Jacob Hartman and S. E. Swaim.

Gary—Thomas E. Knotts, Patrick Finerty, Harvey J. Curtis, George F. Cummerow, Ora Wildermuth, H. A. McCracken.

Crown Point—Henry Aulwurm, Otto Hildebrandt, P. F. Hein, Frank Seberger, F. K. Sigmond, R. G. Bielefeldt, J. W. Thomas, George E. Hershman, J. P. Griesel, E. J. Forrest (serving term as district chairman), H. J. Lehman (present district chairman), George Keiser, George Sauermann, E. H. Westbay.

East Chicago—Col. R. D. Walsh, W. L. Funkhouser, J. S. Rieland, Charles Donovan, Edward DeBraie, Allen P. Twyman, J. W. Dunsing, W. J. Murray, Mayor Frank Callahan, D. B. L. Glazebrook, P. A. Parks, John McGouan, M. H. Silverman.

Whiting—Beaumont Parks, U. G. Swartz, Mat Kieran, James West, Fred Fischrupp, J. J. Kelly, Fred J. Smith, George W. Jones, Robert Klose.

Tolleston—August Conrad, Henry Siegers and Edward Bohnke.

Hobart—John Gordon, J. H. Roper, J. Fiester, Walter Fiester, John Fransen, George Warchus, Fred Klassen, E. H. Guyer, H. E. Keilman, E. C. Scheidt, William Kostbade.

Hanover—John H. Meyer, Stephen Meyer, John A. Schillo, M. J. Schillo, Frank Massoth and Nic Geisen.

Merrillville—F. M. Pierce, John N. Smith, J. F. Dorman.

Griffith—P. J. Beiriger, M. J. Beiriger, John Miller, Jacob Miller.

Dyer—A. E. Kaiser, John J. Klein, H. L. Keilman.

St. John—Joseph Portz, John Miller, Andrew Kammer, William Keilman and William Koehle.

Lowell—Mortimer Castle, Merriam Castle, Louis Berg, W. E. Belshaw, George Kimmit, William Pixley, Chester Pixley, J. A. Clark.

In the matter of Democratic press Lake county has been backward. Until 1890 all attempts to establish a Democratic organ had failed. In that year S. E. Swaim established the Lake County News, now suspended, and from 1891 to 1915 a daily edition was published. For some time the Freie Presse, published by John Lehman at Crown Point, was a Democratic paper published in German. After the founding of Gary two vain efforts were made to publish a party paper in that city, both failing. Later the Gary Post was established and is covering the field in that city successfully.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF LAPORTE COUNTY

THERE is a legend prevalent that during Jackson's second term as President a man named Smith, resident in Laporte county, rode the trails to Washington to protest against certain rulings of the land office which bore hardly on the settlers. Arriving at an early hour, the messenger went to the White House and sat down on the steps to wait for business hours. A colored attendant asked him why he waited, and was directed to inform President Jackson that Mr. Smith had come from Laporte county, Indiana, to see him on land matters. Jackson directed the attendant to "tell Mr. Smith of Laporte county, Indiana, to come in and have his breakfast." So Andrew Smith of Indiana ate ham and eggs with Andrew Jackson of Tennessee, and explained at large the troubles of the settlers and the land office, and Jackson said the settlers were right and the land office was wrong, and he smote the table with his fist and said he would fix it, and he did fix it. This incident faithfully reported by Smith, and losing nothing by repetition, made Laporte county steadily Democratic up to the Civil war.

The changes in political organizations and in public opinion between 1860 and 1864 turned the county over to the Republicans, but easy triumphs and personal ambitions caused such internal strife that the adherents of the old party were encouraged to continue the fight. The struggle to regain the county for Democracy was long and stubborn. It was made on sound Democratic principles, and in the end was successful.

The inspiring mind was Henry E. Wadsworth, whose faith found expression in the Laporte Argus, founded by him in 1868, and still published as a daily. The keynote of Wadsworth's editorial page was that the government should treat all citizens alike, and favor none. He had a keen eye for fallacies and specialized on the fallacies of a high protective tariff. For thirty years his editorials furnished the Democracy of the county with doctrine and ammunition.

Associated with him were Lieutenant-Governor Mortimer Nye, Judge Daniel Noyes, Edward Hawkins, afterwards United States marshal; E. H. Scott, Ellis Michael, Eugene Davis and others. These men took up the long struggle of regaining the county for the party.

In the seventies Michigan City, in the northern part of the county, began to exhibit Democratic tendencies. Harry H. Francis founded the Dispatch, and his delightful wit and daring ridicule of his opponents were given to the support of Democracy's cause. Other leaders in the fight in Michigan City were John H. Winterbotham, William B. Hutchinson, Henry H. Walker and Martin T. Krueger. In 1879 James Murdock of Lafayette came to Michigan City as warden of the State penitentiary and immediately became a leader in party circles.

These men in Laporte and Michigan City worked harmoniously for party success for more than ten years. Their opponents called their unity a machine. Perhaps the term was deserved. In any event, their work was successful. Gradually they gained the county. In 1884 Laporte county gave Cleveland and Hendricks more than a thousand majority, and for years afterwards the majorities for the Democratic ticket from top to bottom were sure and substantial.

The older leaders passed away and the younger men, who had known little of defeat, fell into dissen- sion and failed to maintain the solid front and unity of action which the veterans had learned was essential to power.

The free silver campaign of 1896 and the consequent divisions among old political associates weakened the organization. Wherever Democrats were prosperous that campaign was disastrous.

The Democratic majority in the county was lost, and since then the contest has been more even, a schism in either party giving the victory to their opponents, but generally the county offices have been divided, the strong candidates on each ticket prevailing. The campaigns have been bitterly contested, and a new coterie of able workers has developed. In Laporte Daniel Grover remains of the old guard, still vigorous and defiant. Others prominent in these years of strife have been M. R. Sutherland, H. W. Sallwasser, R. N. Smith, Lemuel Darrow, Arthur W. Taylor, Norman F. Wolfe, Fred Hennoch, A. J. Miller, W. C. Ransburg, H. W. Worden and Frank J. Tilden.

In Michigan City, where Democratic majorities are still dependable, they are won by John B. Faulknor, editor of the Dispatch; C. E. Meyer, Daniel Hutton, Fred C. Miller, J. F. Gallaher, Dr. W. B. Flynn and W. W. Pepple.

At the date of this writing, November 9, 1917, both the cities of the county have just elected Democratic mayors—Herman W. Sallwasser in Laporte by 189 and Fred C. Miller in Michigan City by 767.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF LAWRENCE COUNTY

WHILE there is very scant record of political elections in Lawrence county from the date of its organization in 1818 to the presidential election in 1852, the facts as ascertained through various sources that are reliable show that the county up to that time was very strongly Democratic. It was very seldom that a Whig succeeded in getting into public office when he had to depend for that preferment upon the voters of Lawrence county. If a Whig ever did get into office it was evidence of immense personal popularity. He must be a good man to be able to beat any one whom the Democrats might choose to nominate. Very little support was accorded any of the parties which came up as side issues or advocating certain things which the promoters believed could not be obtained through either the Republican or Democratic parties. Lawrence county was usually pretty well aligned with one or the other of these two political organizations.

In the early 50's, however, a change came in the voting complexion. In the presidential election of 1852 the county gave Pierce and King, the Democratic nominees, 1,113 votes and to Scott and Graham, the Whig nominees, 1,054 votes.

Four years later, when political feeling was running very strong throughout the country owing to the agitation brought about by the discussion of slavery between the North and South, Buchanan and Breckinridge were the Democratic nominees and Fremont and Dayton the Republican nominees, this being the first appearance of the Republican party in a national election. The American party championed the candidacy of Fillmore and Donelson. The votes stood in Lawrence county: For Buchanan, 1,126; Fremont, 480; Fillmore, 660. In that same year in the state election Oliver P. Morton, the Republican nominee for governor, received 1,061 votes against 1,079 for A. P. Willard, the Democratic nominee.

In 1858 in the state election McClure, the Democratic nominee, received 1,065 votes in Lawrence county for secretary of state and Peelle, the Republican nominee, received 1,057. This was growing very close for a county which had been very strongly Democratic, and in 1860 the change came when H. S. Lane, the Republican nominee, defeated Thomas A. Hendricks for governor in this county by 1,272 to 1,143. The same year Lincoln carried the county, receiving 1,158 votes, against 787 for Douglas and Johnson and 525 for Breckinridge and Lane.

In 1862 the Democratic candidate for secretary of state, J. S. Athon, led W. A. Peelle, the Republican candidate, by 1,208 to 1,154.

However, in 1864 Oliver P. Morton received 1,462 votes to 1,183 for J. E. McDonald, the Democratic nominee for governor. Lincoln the same year carried Lawrence county with 1,423 votes, against 1,087 for McClellan and Pendleton.

Since that time in no presidential election and in very few local elections have the Democrats received any consideration in the nature of majorities or pluralities in this county until the election of 1912, when the county gave Wilson and Marshall 2,572 votes, against 1,631 for Taft and 2,106 for Roosevelt. The results in the county since the change came first in 1860 have shown a pretty steady Republican majority or plurality, ranging from 300 to 700 or 800.

Beginning with 1868 to 1916 presidential elections have resulted as follows:

1868—Grant and Colfax, 1,781; Seymour and Blair, 1,468.

1872—Grant and Wilson, 1,833; Greeley and Brown, 1,503.

1876—Hayes and Wheeler, 1,941; Tilden and Hendricks, 1,669.

1880—Garfield and Arthur, 2,057; Hancock and English, 1,701.

1884—Blaine and Logan, 2,336; Cleveland and Hendricks, 1,716.

1888—Harrison and Morton, 2,256; Cleveland and Thurman, 1,814.

1892—Harrison and Reid, 2,529; Cleveland and Stevenson, 2,134.

1896—McKinley and Hobart, 3,103; Bryan and Sewall, 2,421.

1900—McKinley and Roosevelt, 3,535; Bryan and Stevenson, 2,558.

1904—Roosevelt and Fairbanks, 3,924; Parker and Davis, 2,672.

1908—Taft and Sherman, 3,834; Bryan and Kern, 3,118.

1912—Taft and Sherman, 1,631; Wilson and Marshall, 2,579; Roosevelt and Johnson, 2,106.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF MADISON COUNTY

THE county of Madison was created by an Act of the General Assembly, passed in December, 1822, and signed by the Governor, January 4, 1823. Its territory is a part of that known as the "New Purchase" obtained from the Delaware Indians by commissioners of the United States government in treaty with them at St. Marys, Ohio, October 3, 1818. It has for its boundary on the north, Grant county; on the west, Tipton and Hamilton; on the south, Hancock; and on the east, Henry and Delaware.

NEWSPAPERS.

A Democratic newspaper was first printed at Anderson, the county seat, in 1848. It was called the True Democrat, and was owned and edited by two brothers, John Q. and William L. Howell. In 1849 the paper passed to the control of Peter H. Lemon and Townsend Ryan, and by whom its name was changed to the Weekly Democrat. It was issued regularly by them until some time in 1850, when its publication was suspended. Five years later the Democratic Standard appeared as the oracle of Madison county Democracy, under the editorship of Thomas W. and Ira H. Cook, who disposed of the property in 1858 to Charles I. Barker who continued its publication until 1863, when it was purchased and its policies directed from time to time by the following named gentlemen in succession from that date down to 1873: Calvin C. Moricle, O. C. Willetts, F. M. Randall, E. V. Long, W. E. Cook, A. S. McCallister, Fleming T. Luse.

In the meantime another Democratic sheet—the Anderson Plain Dealer—was launched in 1867, and was issued weekly from that date until 1872 by the following editors, successively: Edwin P. Schlater, William Cook, Thompson and Myers, G. D. Farrar, William C. Fleming. But in charge of Mr. Fleming the name of the paper was changed to the Anderson Democrat sometime during the year 1872. It was sold in a few months afterward to Charles L. Zahm. Then in 1873, M. Y. Todisman became the owner of both the Democratic Standard and the Anderson Democrat, united their plants and their subscription lists, dropped the title of the first named rival and continued to publish the Anderson Democrat up to 1877, when he disposed of a one-half interest in the same to William M. Croan and the other half a few months later to William R. Brownlee. The paper passed into the hands of Robert C. and Sumner Glassco in 1884, and remained in their charge for two years, at which period Captain W. J. Hilligoss became the owner and editor to be succeeded as such the following year by Captain William R. Myers who soon thereafter associated with himself in the enterprise Dale J. Crittenberger, ex-Auditor of State, and James J. Netterville. Captain Myers retired from the partnership in 1888, while the remaining members of the firm pushed the publication on, and in 1889 founded a daily edition called the Anderson Daily Democrat. Messrs. Crittenberger and Netterville sold the plant, including both daily and weekly, in 1893, to a stock company composed of J. P. Carapbell, Scott C. Bone and H. R. Bone, who conducted the same for two years and then resold to Messrs. Crittenberger and Netterville. Shortly after this the daily was printed as the Anderson Daily News. John C. Williams then purchased an interest in the paper and took an active and brilliant part in the production of its news and editorial features. Both weekly and daily were issued under the management of these gentlemen until 1907, when Mr. Netterville and Mr. Williams withdrew from the company. Mr. Crittenberger then stopped the publication of the News, but continued that of the Weekly Democrat, which is still the party organ under his direction in this county.

PARTY MAJORITIES.

The voters of the county showed decided preference for the Democratic party from the first. And they returned a majority in favor of each Democratic candidate for President from 1824 to 1892. The majorities rose steadily from that of a few votes when population was sparse until it reached the decided lead of 1,010 for Hancock in 1880. But following that, and owing to a bitter factional party fight and some other shortcomings in local party management, but more than all to the large influx into the county during several succeeding years of iron and glass workers then strongly disposed to support the high tariff policies, the size of the Democratic majority was rapidly reduced as the succeeding elections recurred until 1894 when it was entirely wiped out and shifted to the Republican side by a decided figure, and to be yet enlarged to nearly 2,000 for McKinley in the campaign of 1896. After that, partiality for the Republican candidates manifested itself in 1900, 1904 and 1908. The preference was arrested in 1912 when Wilson led his strongest opponent by a plurality of 1,576 votes in the county.

CHAIRMEN OF THE COUNTY CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

Upon the advent in 1844 of a Central Committee as a factor of party machinery in the county, Nineveh Berry, a veritable patriarch, and subsequently a veteran of the Mexican and Civil Wars, became its Chairman and continued to act as such until 1855. While from that time to this the duties of Chairman of the Madison county Democracy have devolved in turn upon the following named gentlemen:

A LIST OF DEMOCRATS.

Among the many citizens of Madison county who have given allegiance and rendered faithful service to the Democratic party, and picking out only one here and there from head to foot of the long and noble roster—1824-1915—these names come to mind just now:

John Berry, Nineveh Berry, Andrew Jackson, Enoch M. Jackson, Burkett Eads, Levi Brewer, John Sabin, Charles N. Branch, Richard Lake, Eleazer Malone, Hiram Malone, Henry Bronnenberg, Sr., Carroll Bronnenberg, David E. Croan, James W. Sansberry, Eli B. Goodykoontz, Wilburn R. Pierce, Howell D. Thompson, William C. Fleming, Thomas J. Fleming, William A. Hunt, John Hunt, Andrew J. Hunt, Benjamin B. Campbell, John W. Pence, Benjamin F. Spann, William Roach, Benjamin F. Aimen, Joseph Howard, Joseph Pugh, Sr., William Crim, Benjamin Sebrell, James M. Dehority, Andrew J. Applegate, Elias Seward, James Etchison, Ed. Peters, Edwin P. Schlater, Thomas J. McMahan, Thomas R. Moore, Wallace W. Van Dyke, John E. Canaday, Charles A. Henderson, George Ross, Nathan T. Call, John R. Page, Daniel F. Mustard, James J. Netterville, Carroll K. McCullough, William M. Croan, Calvin H. Allen, Byron H. Dyson, Jacob L. Crouse, Thomas B. Orr, Charles E. Diven, William S. Diven, John W. Cook, William A. Dehority, Dale J. Crittenberger, Alfred Ellison, Charles K. Bagot, Luther Pence, Willis S. Ellis, Isaac E. May, Otis P. Crim, Samuel D. Montgomery, George T. Beebe, Lewis T. Stephens, James W. Frazier, Philip B. O'Neill, Frederick K. Van Nuys, Charles T. Sansberry.

Incidents in the career of some of them hold a lively local interest and compel even State-wide attention. Yet space cannot be given here for the slightest account of all. And a brief reference to the records of two or three only must serve to show as best it may the political fiber of their party associates as well as that of themselves.

AUGUST S. McCALLISTER.

About the middle of the last century Augustus S. McCallister was born in Madison county. He availed himself of a liberal education and took the course in law at Ann Arbor, Mich. While there Stephen A. Douglas returned to Chicago on a visit from Washington, and a number of the students at the Michigan University concluded to journey to the Windy City and in a body pay their respects to the illustrious statesman. Accordingly they did so, and young McCallister was selected by them as their spokesman. His speech highly gratified all. And Douglas was pronounced in his praise of its appropriate thought and beauty.

The eloquence of McCallister was of a magnetic, soulful sort and flowing from his sincere and generous heart, and set in the simple yet selected language of the scholar, enchained at once and always every hearer.

He was yet young when he had fallen a victim to the habit of excessive drink. But he resolved to reform, promising the electors when he made the race for Prosecuting Attorney in 1874 that if chosen he would resign his office if he failed to remain sober during his term. He was elected, but had not served a great while when the fatal cup touched his lips again. But his courage and his promise were still as true as gold. And then he gathered up his credentials of office, took the train for Indianapolis and returned his commission into the hands of Governor Hendricks. The Governor afterward spoke of it as the saddest incident of his official career.

WILLIAM R. MYERS.

The oratory of Captain William R. Myers cannot be omitted from any faithful account of stump speakers in this State. He was elected to Congress in 1878, the only Democrat who has gone to the National House of Representatives from the county. He was elected Secretary of State for Indiana three times—1882, 1884, and 1892—a tenure of that office which no other incumbent has enjoyed. His power on the hustings first gained general notice in his campaign for Congress. And in the contests of every general election after that to the time of his death, which occurred in 1907, there were insistent calls from every section of the State for his services on the stump.

He was not reckoned among the closest debaters where issues were to be tersely stated and argued out at length. But in the common party appeals of the hustings few tongues were gifted beyond his. And it is doubtful whether any son of Indiana, at any period of her history, could more keenly arouse or more certainly sway to depths or heights of feeling and of favor, the assembled hosts of the open political gatherings than could William R. Myers.

JOHN L. FORKNER.

John L. Forkner is another man who has done much to honor and perpetuate Democracy in this county. His chief work has been done in quite another way from that of the characters above referred to. He is of a quiet nature, teeming always, however, with good-fellowship and with a ready wit as harmless as it is convulsing. Mr. Forkner lays no pretention to being an orator and yet no local gathering of Democrats which he has attended in the last thirty years, and he has graced nearly all of them, has ever let him off without a speech.

He served two terms of four years each as Auditor of the county while yet a young man. And later, as Mayor of the city of Anderson for six years, he demonstrated executive ability of a high order, during that time placing the municipal water and electric light and power plants on the practical and permanent bases where they have since yielded the most wonderful and gratifying service to the city and its people.

But it is perhaps as a historian that his fame will live longest and grow brightest as it goes down to future generations. With the assistance of Byron H. Dyson he wrote and published in 1897 "Historical Sketches and Reminiscences of Madison County," the best county history, we dare say, yet produced in the State. It is not made up for the most part of the dry details of official and institutional life and of the commonplace, paid-for biographies which generally fill the pages of such books. It is a living, faithful panorama of events making up the story of the county and its people, a record in attractive recital of many incidents, political and otherwise, which while thoroughly fascinating, embody the true spirit and color of their time. He there tells, for instance, of the "White Boys in Blue"—Madison county's Democratic marching club of 1868. Their uniforms were white caps, blue waists and red zouave trousers. They were a thousand strong. And one cannot wonder that they made up an attractive body, nor that, led by Captain B. B. Campbell, a veteran of the Civil War, in the great State rally of that year at Indianapolis, they carried off the prize offered for the largest, finest uniformed marching club.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF MARION COUNTY

MARION COUNTY was by no means one of the earliest to be organized, although by reason of its geographical position, the advantage of being the central distributing point for the rest of the state, and also early in its history having been selected as the site of the state capital, in population and business development it was soon the leader.

During the administration of General William Henry Harrison as territorial governor, the capital had been held at Vincennes from 1801 to 1812. It was removed to Corydon on May 1, 1813, by an act of the territorial legislature, and it remained there until it was permanently removed to the city of Indianapolis, in Marion county.

It was on the eleventh of January, 1820, that the state general assembly appointed ten commissioners, their business being to select a permanent site for the capital. Two of these commissioners were John Tipton and John Conner, who with his brother William founded the city of Connersville, and which city, by the way, was for several years included in Marion county. The other eight commissioners were George Hunt, John Gilliland, Stephen Ludlow, Frederick Rapp, Joseph Bartholomew, Jesse B. Durham, William Prince and Thomas Emerson.

In so important an undertaking as the selection of a state capital location it would be natural to suppose that there would be a lively scramble and pulling of all sorts of political wires to win. But the contest was not sufficiently exciting to induce a full attendance of the commission. Only five of the members were present when the final vote was taken, and only three of the five voted for locating at Indianapolis. The meeting was called at Vincennes in the middle of May, 1820, and they came up the river to the mouth of Fall Creek. Being almost exactly in the center of the state, and the lay of the land being attractive for a city, the selection was made.

The final vote was not taken until the seventh of June, and on the sixth day of January following the legislature voted to approve the selection. By the same act by which the selection was approved the legislature also named the capital city Indianapolis. The name had been selected by the commissioners.

President Taylor, by the way, reported that on his trip from Louisville to the Wabash, to build Fort Harrison, later the city of Terre Haute, he had crossed the river at the mouth of Fall Creek, his description of the location fitting that particular spot.

In platting the city, a plot of one mile square was set in the middle, and directly in the center of this mile square a circle was placed, the original intention being that in the circle should be the residence of the governor. A large house was erected in 1827 in carrying out this idea, but it was never used for this purpose, being occupied by state offices. The house originally cost $6,500 and in 1857, thirty years after its erection, the state sold it for old material for $665. It was torn down and moved away and the soldiers' and sailors' monument, the most beautiful of the sort anywhere, shortly afterward took its place.

The mile square is still outlined and always will be so designated, being marked by what are known as North, South, East and West streets. The actual removal of the capital and all effects from Corydon was not completed until the fall of 1824. In 1820, the year when the site was selected, the settlement covered only a very small area surrounding the circle.

If one is to judge from the newspapers of those early days, politics was an interesting subject among the people even in the earliest times. A glance through those same newspapers published at Indianapolis shortly after the capital was located impresses one most forcibly with the fact that these publications for one hundred years and without cessation proclaimed that it was most disreputable to be a Democrat. In fact the earlier newspapers, the Journal in particular, made it plain that no man with any standard of morals could possibly be a Democrat. The assertion seemed to be sufficient; no proof was produced. In those early days the principal mark for the vicious attacks was William W. Wick. He was most conspicuous in the political contests.

Like many other distinguished Democrats who were conspicuous as great men of the nation, and who were abused each in his turn by these same journals, Wicks never stopped attending to his own business long enough to answer any of the attacks. And his majorities usually were the best evidence that what was said of him in the Whig newspapers was neither true nor yet believed, the same condition that applied in later years to the record of Thomas Taggart, who inherited and held for years the leadership of the party and took the abuse with it.

Party lines were not so closely drawn in the earlier days, the individual candidates gaining their strength through personal standing and acquaintance by contact with the voters. An example of this was in the election of 1825, wherein Gregory, Democrat, was the candidate for state senator against Bryson. Gregory received 429 votes in Marion county, and Bryson, the Whig, received but 20. In Madison, Hamilton and Henry counties, which were included in the same district, Gregory received every vote cast, Bryson not scoring one.

Eight years later, in the election of 1833, A. F. Morrison was the Democratic candidate for state senator in the district formed of Marion and Hamilton, and A. W. Morris was the Whig. Morrison was elected by a majority of one vote.

For the first one hundred years the changes in political complexion of the county and city government were frequent, with the successes favoring the Whigs and Republicans. The success of the Democratic party during the years when Thomas Taggart was most active was mostly marked. Mr. Taggart was first elected county auditor in 1886, beginning his term of office in 1887. Austin H. Brown had been auditor from 1855 to 1859 as a Democrat. The next Democrat in the office was William K. Sproule, from 1875 to 1879. Then came Taggart from 1887 to 1895, resigning in the latter year to become mayor of Indianapolis, in which office he served for three terms also, retiring when he refused a fourth nomination with every assurance of election in 1901. The only other Democrats to hold the office of auditor prior to 1920 were Albert Sahn from 1908 to 1912, and William T. Patten from 1912 to 1916.

The strength of Taggart grew with each succeeding election, and the more abuse was heaped upon him by a viciously disposed political press. He kept up the Democratic strength when the results might otherwise have been adverse.

When the population grew and many colored voters came to Indianapolis to live, the Republican strength increased materially. With the elimination of the colored vote it would have been impossible for Democrats to lose, so safe was the white majority.

It is interesting to notice the list of men who have served the city of Indianapolis as mayor, and their politics. The first were the presidents of the town trustees, which preceded the mayors of the incorporated city. The presidents were these:

Samuel Henderson, Whig, 1832-33; James Edgar, Whig, 1833, resigned; Benjamin I. Blythe, Democrat, 1834-35; Alexander F. Morrison, Democrat, 1835, resigned; Nathan B. Palmer, Democrat, 1835-36; George Lockerbie, Whig, 1836-37; Joshua Soule, Jr., Whig, 1837-38; D. V. Culley, Democrat, 1838-44; L. B. Wilson, Whig, 1844-

46; Joseph A. Levy, Whig, 1846 till office abolished.

The first mayor of Indianapolis was also a Whig, Samuel Henderson, who served from 1847 to 1849. Those who followed, with their politics were these:

1849-51—Horatio C. Newcomb, Whig (resigned).

1851-54—Caleb Scudder, Whig.

1856—Henry F. West, Democrat (died).

1856—Charles Coulin, Democrat (appointed till election).

1856-58—William John Wallace, Republican (elected and resigned).

1858-63—Samuel D. Maxwell, Republican.

1863-67—John Caven, Republican.

1867-73—Daniel Macauley, Republican.

1873-75—John L. Mitchell, Democrat.

1875-81—John Caven, Republican.

1881-83—Daniel W. Grubbs, Republican.

1883-85—John L. McMaster, Republican.

1885-89—Caleb S. Denny, Republican.

1889-93—Thomas L. Sullivan, Democrat.

1893-95—Caleb S. Denny, Republican.

1895-1901—Thomas Taggart, Democrat.

1901-03—Charles A. Bookwalter, Republican.

1903-05—John W. Holtzman, Democrat.

1905-09—Charles A. Bookwalter, Republican.

1909-13—Samuel Lewis Shank, Republican (resigned).

1913—Harry Wallace, Republican (comptroller, became mayor).

1917-21—Charles W. Jewett, Republican.

As historical facts it is to the credit of the Democratic party that two men who served as mayor of Indianapolis in the first one hundred years of the history of the city did more in the way of public improvements and at low cost to the people than all the others combined. These were Thomas Taggart and Joseph E. Bell. Mayor Taggart was especially interested in public parks for the good that they will always be to the poorer people. In face of most violent abuse he bought the only parks which the city possessed. Newspapers abused him for political capital and because "he paid too much for the land." Only a few years afterward the whole community recognized that he had saved millions of dollars to the city in this one direction alone. But of course he never received newspaper credit.

Besides this he gave his personal attention to all the city business just as he always did to his personal properties. This made all departments of the city business most efficient.

Following Mayor Taggart others came on who talked about elevating railroad tracks. Mayor

Bell elevated them, after going into court to set aside contracts which his Republican predecessor in office had rushed through in an abortive attempt to claim credit for starting the things which the Bell campaign had promised to do. Mayor Bell also saved the people large sums by making careful contracts in substitution of the Republican makeshifts.

Others had talked about a great and adequate sewer system. Mayor Bell accomplished it. Others had talked about the need for flood protection by building great protecting walls. Bell promised to build for a certain price if elected. His opponents charged he could not come within three times his estimate. He saved nearly a million on his promise and did the work. Others talked about boulevards and more improved parks. Mayor Bell did it. He did scores of other things, and not a newspaper in the city credited him with any good work.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF MARSHALL COUNTY

By Harry L. Unger, LL. B.

MARSHALL COUNTY, named after Chief Justice Marshall, with an area of 441 square miles and a population of 600, was organized on the 20th day of July, 1836, at which time the seat of justice was established at Plymouth. Two years later General John Tipton removed the Potawatomie Indians from the vicinity of Twin Lakes.

This county lies mostly in the Yellow River Valley, in the northern part of the State. The soil is very productive and the people of the county are mostly home owners. The population is and always has been composed of good, loyal, American citizens, all interested in political questions, locally and nationally.

The first court house in Marshall county was erected by the proprietors of the Townsite of Plymouth at a cost of $300 as a consideration for the location of the county seat at Plymouth. The second court house was erected in 1850 at a cost of about $5,000, and the third and present court house was completed June 11, 1872, at a cost of $105,000. It is a very good and substantial building, the interior having been remodeled and beautified in recent years.

The county is Democratic. With very few exceptions, from its organization to the present time, the elections of the county have been carried by the Democrats. The first election in Marshall county was held August 5, 1836, at which election 135 votes were cast.

At the first election Whigs and Democrats were on opposing tickets, but party lines were mostly ignored on account of local interests. This pacific state of political affairs did not last long—the political leaders lined up their forces and conducted aggressive campaigns. Election day was set apart for a big time in those days. One could cast his ballot at any polling place in the county and the newly-settled population took advantage of this occasion by visiting the county seat, where they could talk over the future prospects of the new country, become better acquainted, deposit their ballots and have a good time. Society was not so refined then as today. Churches and schools were few. Fist fights were frequent and always expected on election days as a source of entertainment for the whole population.

There were few speeches, but often at the close of the campaign a rally was held at the county seat. Later the "barbecue" was added and the menu was frequently wild deer, well roasted, with plenty of seasoning and an abundance of "corn dodgers."

Prior to the campaign of 1852 there had never been a great amount of political excitement in Marshall county. The county was new and the people were very busy with their personal welfare. In 1852 the population of the county was about six thousand, with only 879 votes cast. The presidential candidates were Franklin Pierce, Democrat, and General Winfield Scott, Whig. Few newspapers reached Marshall county in those days and many people were very ignorant regarding political affairs. They knew enough about it, though, to know whether they were Democrats or Whigs, and that was enough for them. This was a warm campaign and much ill feeling grew out of the contest.

The campaign of 1856 was one which stands out as a landmark in the political history of Marshall county. The Republican party had just come into existence and the "Know-Nothing" party had been fully organized. They joined forces on the presidential ticket. The bitterness of this campaign found its way into all phases of society. During this campaign a joint debate was held at Bourbon, which broke up in a political riot. Colfax and Stewart were the speakers and opposing candidates for Congress. Both parties prepared for a grand rally. Large delegations attended from all parts of the county with floats, flags and banners. The wagons were drawn by horses and oxen. Many rode horses and others were on foot. Bands and fife and drum corps participated in the parade, which was nearly two miles long, each party doing its best to outdo the other. When the procession reached the town of Bourbon anvils were fired in welcome and the bands played. Bourbon was a small town of two or three hundred. The joint discussion was held in a beautiful grove of forest trees. The crowd was immense and anxious to hear the political battle about to take place.

The debate was opened by Mr. Colfax, who was a great campaigner. Mr. Stewart was a man of much ability and learning, but not a great campaigner. The Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago railroad was being graded through the town and a large number of railroad laborers, mostly foreigners, were at the debate. On the platform was a banner with an inscription which these foreigners took as a reflection upon them. In his speech Judge Stewart referred to the banner which had been placed on the platform by the opposition and denounced the party offering such an insult to their fellow citizens. Excitement was at its highest pitch. Some one in the audience fired a pistol near the speaker's stand and a general riot started. It seemed that everybody was in the fracas. Black eyes and skinned faces were numerous. Several were severely cut with knives and beaten with clubs. An unsuccessful attempt was made to restore order and continue the debate, but the meeting broke up and the processions returned to their homes, broken and bruised. This was a death blow to debates at rallies in Marshall county and few have since been held.

Strange to say that at the same town of Bourbon, during the early part of the year 1916, certain foreigners who were working on the same railroad referred to in the riot of 1856, just sixty years later, and housed in box cars on a side track, registered to vote and long before election day the railroad company had use for them elsewhere, so moved them away in their houses on wheels to Kosciusko county.

The opposition to Democracy in Marshall county has always laid claim to the foreign vote and with few exceptions have succeeded in getting it, and, of course, could not bear the thought of losing this opportunity to bolster up their divided and weakened condition in Marshall county and at the same time deliver a blow to the friend of the people, Woodrow Wilson. And so this gang of monarchial subjects were marched back from Kosciusko county to the town of Bourbon and there demanded the great privilege of American citizens. These foreigners were courteously denied the privilege. It seems that a certain newspaper editor of Plymouth, who was an oil inspector under Hanly, a follower of a "Big Stick" in 1912, and again a regular, old-time, stand-pat in the campaign of Money, Railroads, Plutocracy and Knockers vs. the People in 1916, was immediately sent for. He burned eleven miles of John D. Rockefeller's fluid and projected his anatomy into the presence of the Democrats who had been so unkind as to deny foreigners the privilege of illegally assisting American citizens in naming their officers. His interpretation of the law and demands were courteously listened to and then a good Democrat, who had pity for him, donated to him a little friendly advice, pointed out to him a large assemblage of American citizens gathered there with the purity and honesty of the American ballot at heart. The editor returned to Plymouth. The subjects of royalty returned to their labors in Kosciusko county. The ballot was not corrupted and by the timely hand taken in the affair by the friendly Democrat, a repetition of the demonstration of 1856 was prevented.

Since the organization of the county the majorities for President have been in favor of the Democrats with the exception of the campaigns of 1860 and 1904. In 1860, on account of the division of sentiment in the Democratic ranks, the Republicans had no trouble in carrying the county for Lincoln, and in 1872, the Democrats having endorsed Greeley, and he having been prior thereto a strong opponent of the high principles and standards as adhered to and believed in by the Democracy of Marshall county, great numbers of Democrats of the county refused to vote for him and the Democratic majority was greatly reduced.

Nineteen hundred and four was the year of darkness for Democracy in Marshall county, with a majority of 123 for Theodore Roosevelt, then a Republican. This was due to the fact that the Democrats of Marshall county greatly admired William Randolph Hearst, an owner and publisher of newspapers in different large cities of the United States, who was a candidate for the nomination for President against Judge Alton B. Parker. Hearst clubs were formed over the county and a strong organization perfected. William Jennings Bryan, beginning with his nomination for President in the year 1896, has been and still remains the idol of Democracy in Marshall county. The element which nominated Alton B. Parker for President on the Democratic ticket was opposed to William Jennings Bryan in his campaigns of 1896 and 1900. At the Indiana State convention in 1904 this element opposed to Bryan took control and after making a few uncomplimentary remarks the Marshall county delegates to the State convention, who were "dyed-in-the-wool" Bryan Democrats, came back home in mourning, prepared to swallow their medicine like good Democrats as they were. But all Democrats of Marshall county could not drink what they felt to be so bitter a cup. About five hundred of them who had voted for Bryan in previous years remained at home on election day, the result being a majority of 123 for Roosevelt and a defeat of every candidate for county office, except Joel Anglin, Democratic candidate for County Commissioner, and that good old, staunch and stalwart Democrat, Hon. Daniel McDonald, candidate for State Representative, the only Democratic candidate for Representative north of the Wabash river, who was elected.

Nineteen hundred and eight found the Democracy of Marshall county in working order again and she has ever since held her place.

At one other time in the memory of the writer the opposition made the campaign cry, "Put the Democrats out and show up the books." A good number of the Democratic candidates for county office on that occasion were put out, but the books were found true, and this manner of running elections has since been abandoned by the opposition in the county.

Personal differences of men are never permitted to have anything to do with the affairs of the party. It has been the purpose of the party at all times to select men for office who will conduct themselves as true and loyal servants of the people, and they are never selected arbitrarily by any set or ring, but all candidates for office in the county have for years been selected by the membership of the whole party. The primary is a tried institution in Marshall county and was used by the party in the county long before the Legislature provided for it.

The first newspaper regularly established in Marshall county was the Plymouth Pilot, the first number appearing April 16, 1851, by John Q. Howell, editor and proprietor, who was a Jeffersonian and Jackson Democrat. The Plymouth Pilot was a Democratic paper. The first issue contained the following:

"The Plymouth Pilot is before you. How do you like it? It comes to you not on mammoth wings, like some of its contemporaries, but brings you, we trust, although not so much, at least a history of passing events as welcome to your taste as those furnished you by its longer brethren. But, says one stranger, what's your politics? We reply: They are Democratic, of the Jeffersonian and Jackson school. Our Democracy is not to be appealed, corrupted or compromised. It knows no baseness; it cowers to no danger; it oppresses no weakness; destructive only of despotism; it is the sole conservator of liberty, labor and property. It is the sentiment of freedom, of equal rights, of equal obligations—the law of nature pervading the law of the land."

In the declining years of Mr. Howell, the writer, when a candidate for Prosecuting Attorney of the Forty-first Judicial Circuit of the State of Indiana, met and became acquainted with him and, although the ravages of time had told upon him, he was yet the Jeffersonian and Jackson Democrat, and so remained until he passed away a few years ago at the village of Delong, in Fulton county, Indiana. His son, Henry D. Howell, a banker and very prominent citizen living at Ke-wanna, Fulton county, bears the political faith of his father. No doubt the sincerity and honesty of purpose and the high ideals of this man, who first began publishing on paper the fundamental principles and doctrines of Democracy in Marshall county, has had much to do with the constancy of the predominating political faith of the county.

Mr. Howell sold the Plymouth Pilot March 1, 1852, and the purchaser changed its name and politics.

The first issue of the Marshall County Democrat appeared November 16, 1855, established by Thomas McDonald with his two sons, Daniel and Platt McDonald. Thomas McDonald retired from the editorial chair on November 20, 1857, and said: "With an entire Democratic government; with the wounds of 'bleeding Kansas' healed and the people about to make their own government; with success everywhere of the principles we have advocated; with the worst of financial crashes past and the current of trade setting in our favor; with universal peace and unbounded prosperity around us, we shall leave our patrons and readers to the care of younger heads and more ready hands, and hope their bairns' bairn may see no check to our nation's onward movement, nor clouds overshadow the brightness around us."

On January 26, 1860, the paper became the property of A. C. Thompson, who changed its name to the Plymouth Weekly Democrat. On April 11, 1861, Mr. Thompson sold the paper to Thomas and Platt McDonald and published the following in his paper: "Coming events are casting their shadows before, and the country stands amazed, confounded and paralyzed. God only knows what is in store for us, but whatever it may be, it is certainly of such a nature that it will puzzle the brain and grieve the heart of all philanthropists and patriots. May the God of our fathers save us from the horrors of civil war." Fort Sumter was fired upon the next day and the war came with all its horrors.

During the Civil War, when Indiana was practically under military law, General Milo B. Hascall of Goshen issued an order which virtually took away the freedom of the press, and subjected the people to military rule. At this time the editor of the Plymouth Weekly Democrat was D. E. VanValkenburgh and he gave the order space in his paper and commented as follows:

"Brigadier-General Hascall is a donkey—an unmitigated, unqualified donkey, and his bray is loud, long and harmless; merely offensive to the ear; merely tends to create a temporary irritation!"

The editor was arrested by a squad of soldiers and taken to Indianapolis and from there he was taken before General Burnside at Cincinnati, who soon decided that the offense was not very serious and discharged him with the admonition never to call General Hascall a donkey again.

October 1, 1877, the Hon. Daniel McDonald purchased the paper again, and guided by this grand old Democrat, this paper became powerful in its influence for good in the community and for the maintenance, upbuilding and progression of Democracy in Marshall county. He was loved and respected by all. He never failed to commend the virtues of the citizens of his community.

When the fifteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States came before the House of Representatives in Indiana, Hon. Daniel McDonald was the Representative from Marshall county, and he, with others, was absent, and finally to prevent a quorum he resigned as Representative and at a special election called he was again elected to fill the seat made vacant by his resignation.

He wrote two histories of Marshall county, the only history of Masonry in Indiana, and a history of Maxinkuckee lake. He was a boy when the Potawatomie Indians were removed from the county and was touched by the sad occurrence. On account of his persistent efforts, he, while a State Representative from Marshall county, secured the passage of a law providing for the erection of a monument to the memory of these Indians. The monument was erected near Twin Lakes, a small tribute and recompense to these peaceful Indians for the miseries and wrongs placed upon them.

Mr. McDonald continued as proprietor and editor until March 20, 1902, at which time he sold the paper to Hon. Clay W. Metsker, who has since owned and edited the paper as the organ of the Democratic party in Marshall county.

Other Democratic papers of the county were the Bourbon Democrat, published at Bourbon from 1882 to 1884 by Homer Melick and W. W. Mikels, for a time by Hillis and Langdon, and finally by Peter Hahn, who was later elected to the office of Auditor of Marshall county on the Democratic ticket; also the Bremen Gazette, published at Bremen by Charles W. Sweeney in the interests of the Democratic party.

Representatives and Senators from Marshall county, with few exceptions, have been Democrats.

Our last Senator was Hon. Harry E. Grube, a life-long Democrat, having been elected to the office of joint Senator for Marshall and Kosciusko counties for two terms. He resigned after the close of the session of 1915 to accept the appointment as State Bank Examiner, which position he still retains.

Our last State Representative was Hon. John R. Jones, who served for two terms. He is a believer of "practicing what you preach," and as soon as he was elected to the office of State Representative he prepared a bill providing for a State-wide primary for the selection of candidates. He knew that Democracy in Marshall county had flourished under a primary system of its own and believed that what was good for Marshall county was good for Indiana. During the session of 1913, the bill which he introduced failed to become a law, so he continued his fight for this law, until, with some modifications, it became a law at the session of 1915. Under this law all political parties select all of their candidates for office under the Australian system, except State officers, and under most circumstances the candidate for Governor is selected in the same way. Mr. Jones gave much time and hard work to bring about the passage of this law.

The selection of candidates on the Democratic ticket in Marshall county, prior to 1878, was on the delegate plan, but in that year the Hon. Daniel McDonald formulated the following resolution, which was introduced at the county convention and its passage secured by the late Judge A. C. Capron, a delegate to that convention:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that future nominations for county officers shall be made by the primary election system, and that the person having the highest number of votes shall be declared the nominee for the office for which he is a candidate, and the County Central Committee is hereby authorized and required to arrange the details necessary to successfully carry into effect the provisions of this resolution."

At the first primary election held in the county, nearly the whole Democratic vote was cast. After a number of years the delegate convention was again used, then again the primary, until the present primary law went into effect.

Our Representative-elect is Hon. Ralph W. Jacoby, who is a member of a family of Democrats and a believer in a government for and by the people.

Marshall county has been honored twice with candidates for Congress on the Democratic ticket. They were Hon. Charles Kellison and Hon. Daniel McDonald. Marshall county Democracy has also been honored by the selection of Hon. Charles H. Reeve, delegate to the Democratic National Convention in New York, 1868; Hon. Horace Corbin, delegate to the Democratic National Convention, Baltimore, 1872; Hon. Daniel McDonald, delegate to Democratic National Convention, St. Louis, 1876, and to Chicago, 1884; Hon. M. A. O. Packard, Democratic candidate for Reporter of the Supreme Court, 1868; Hon. Charles P. Drummond, Democratic candidate for Attorney-General of Indiana; Hon. Charles M. Walker, delegate to Democratic National Convention at St. Louis, 1916, and Hon. Peter J. Krueyer, appointed Internal Revenue Collector for Indiana by President Wilson.

Marshall county Democracy claims the distinction of being first to put into practice the turning into the Treasury of all interest on public funds. When William O'Keefe, a Democrat of Marshall county, was elected Treasurer of the county, upon entering his office, he said: "In entering upon the office of County Treasurer, it is my purpose to discharge all the duties connected therewith to the best of my ability and in strict accordance with the law. I believe that a public office is a public trust, and that it should be administered in the interests of the people and not for the benefit of the incumbent of the office. So believing, I shall deposit in safe banking institutions all funds received by me as such Treasurer where the same will be kept until paid out to the parties authorized to receive the same; and all interest received by me from said banks on all county funds so deposited will be paid into the County Treasury for the benefit of the tax payers.

"I will not use any of the money in the transaction of my private business, nor will I loan any of the funds of the county to private individuals or others, as the money is not mine to use in that way." The Indianapolis Sentinel, on January 18, 1902, commented as follows:

"Mr. O'Keefe has the right conception of the sacredness of a public trust. One of the greatest evils in the transaction of public business is the use of public moneys for the private benefit of the custodians thereof. It is, however, an abuse so universal that it has come to be taken as a matter of course and entirely compatible with perfect integrity. * * * Mr. O'Keefe has taken an unassailable position and one which cannot be too highly commended without reflecting upon the integrity of others occupying similar positions, who take the ground that, having given an adequate bond for the same, they are entitled equitably, if not in law, to the profits arising therefrom while in their possession."

At the close of his term of office, Mr. O'Keefe turned into the Treasury about $5,000 of interest earned on the money belonging to the people of Marshall county. This interest belonged to the public, and no one would now say that interest on public funds of any part of our government should belong to anyone but the public. Thanks to Mr. O'Keefe for his strength of character and honesty of purpose. Thus the Democracy of Marshall county gave to the nation the lesson and the whole nation hastened to make it law.

The writer would like to name all the Democrats who are responsible for the good record of Democracy in Marshall county, but it would be a task indeed. Hundreds of them have gone the way from whence no traveler returns. We have over 3,000 of them today, all deserving equal recognition in this history. Each has shouldered his share of the burdens and responsibilities of Democracy. They are all leaders; they think for themselves; they vote their sentiments; they believe in the principles of Democracy. To be their candidate you must pass their close scrutiny in the primary—you must be a man who will serve the people as a public servant should.

In Marshall county the Democratic primary is really the election and the election is a legal formality. The Democracy of Marshall county is patriotic. They greatly admire and love President Wilson and its patriotism is so great that should the time ever come when the President of our Nation be other than a Democrat with such serious foreign complications arising as have confronted our greatest President, Woodrow Wilson, the Democracy of Marshall county will stand true American citizens and confirm his acts whether right or wrong, but will never admit that any action taken by the President of the greatest and best nation, on subjects of foreign relations, is anything but right.

The Democracy of Marshall county is for peace and composed of loyal American citizens.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF MARTIN COUNTY

BY an act of the state legislature in session at Corydon in 1820 Martin county was created, the act becoming effective January 17 of the same year. The county was named Martin in honor of Major Martin of Newport, Kentucky, to whom the principles of Jeffersonian Democracy were a religion.

The county as created at this time was taken from Daviess county, all of which territory was formerly taken from Knox county. The boundaries of the county of Martin did not include at this time the north congressional townships now embraced in the county, but by act of the Legislature of 1828, approved January 24, 1828, the congressional townships numbered 5 north, range 3 and 4 west of the second principal meridian, as attached until otherwise directed by law to Daviess county by the act relative to county boundaries, approved January 31, 1824, were attached to the county of Martin to remain a part of said county for all civil and judicial and other purposes whatsoever. So by this act of the legislature two civil townships known as Baker and McCameron townships were added to Martin county and the boundaries of the county at present remain as established at that time. This act of the Legislature is entitled, "An Act to provide for the relocation of the seat of justice of Martin county and extending of the boundaries thereof." By this act John Murphy and Friend Spears of Daviess county, William Hoggat of Orange county, Simon Morgan of Dubois county and Robert M. Corlton of Lawrence county were appointed commissioners to relocate the seat of justice of Martin county. The seat of justice of the county had heretofore been located at Hindostan. The act provided that if a donation could be procured which, in the judgment of the commissioners, would, together with the probable amount of the sales of lots which may belong to the county as such new county seat, be sufficient to erect public buildings for said county; and if, in their opinion, it would be more to the interest of the people of said county, they should procure said donation to be made and should proceed to relocate the seat of justice of said county; and if they should relocate the said seat of justice, it should be the duty of the agent of the county to lay out the said town on a plan as nearly similar as may be with the town of Hindostan and with a corresponding number of lots, and any and every person who had purchased and paid for lot or lots in Hindostan should have the privilege of exchanging the same for other lot or lots correspondingly situated and numbered in the new town that might be laid out by said commissioners; and it is further provided that the agent of said county should reserve 10 per cent. out of the proceeds of the sale of said lots for the use of a county library which should be paid over in the same manner as is now provided for by law.

The first lands of Martin county entered of the government were entered on June 2, 1807, by Gen. Washington Johnson, which lands are located on the east side of White River near the Houghton farm at the point where the Houghton bridge crosses the river. These lands were occupied by a man by the name of McGowan in 1811, and the next year, 1812, he was killed on said lands by the Indians.

The first county seat of Martin county was located at Hindostan, Hindostan being located on the east side of White River at the place now known as Hindostan Falls. There is no record of the date of the platting of Hindostan, but it was platted prior to May 29, 1820. The lands on which it was situated were entered from the government in the years of 1814 and 1815. About the time of the platting of Hindostan there was platted on the west side of White River at Hindostan Falls a town known as Greenwich. The west side of White River at the falls being bottom lands, this plat was vacated May 13, 1823. The settlement at and near Hindostan was one of the settlements made in southern Indiana along about the same time as the settlement at Vallonia in Jackson county and of Clarksville near the falls on the Ohio River. The earliest history we have of Hindostan is a notice taken from the diary of W. Fox, who passed through the place in 1819 on his way to the Burkebeck settlement in southern Illinois. It is as follows:

"October 29, 1819—Breakfasted at infant villa, Hindostan, on the falls of White River, a beautiful stream running navigable to the Ohio over a floor of sand and stone, smooth and white as marble. The villa is flourishing and much building is in progress and it promises to be a pleasant and prosperous town before many years. The land, too, is rich and inviting. I now cross White River in my chariot."

At the time of the making of the settlement by Frederick Sholtz at Hindostan there were two other settlements made in this county and they, like the one at Hindostan, were made on the high land along the river. One was at Mt. Pleasant, made by Philip, Davis, Peek, Summers and Hunt families; and one at the present site of Shoals was made by Clement Horsey. James Piles, John Cox, and other families were also located near the Clement Horsey settlement. In 1816 Daviess county embraced this settlement along with all that is now known as Martin county.

In 1816, it is said by citizens who claim to have known the oldest citizens that a bunch of Indiana Democrats got together and decided to frame a county of their own which they planned should be eternally and everlastingly Democratic. They wanted to make it a sort of a Democratic reservation as it were. History shows that since the date of that political conspiracy of more than 100 years ago the successful carrying out of their designs has been most remarkable. This was true, at least, for more than 80 years or until the Martin county Democrats allowed themselves to be divided by the Populists in 1898, when the Republicans gained a majority of 54. This was the first time in 78 years that the Republicans had had a majority in Martin county.

In 1900, when the Democrats expected to return to their own, they lost in the governor's race by a majority of 52 and while in an off year in 1902 they succeeded in reducing this Republican majority to 26.

The Republicans beat them in 1904, presidential year, by 211 votes for governor. In the same year for presidential electors, Parker being the Democratic nominee, the Republicans led in Martin county by 235.

In 1906, the off year, the Democrats were successful in carrying the county by a small majority, and in 1908 they were able to win by a majority of 83 votes. Since 1908 they have more than held their own, although in 1916 the vote showed a Democratic lead of only 9, Wilson and Marshall leading by 15. However, during the time since the creation of the county the local offices have been filled in the main by Democrats.

At the time of the creation of the county and for many years thereafter the citizenship of the county being good Democrats and having no opposing party with which to quarrel and argue at election times and being all practically of one mind on the question of how to vote, the only thing left for the Democrats to do to keep up excitement was to change the county seat every few days. They broke all records in the State in the number of county seats occupied in their early days, and it is pretty well said that the song entitled "Where Do We Go from Here, Boys?" really originated in Martin county.

The first county seat at Hindostan was established in 1820 and the first circuit court of Martin county met at the house of Joseph E. Clements in the town of Hindostan on Friday, the 17th day of March (St. Patrick's Day), 1820. Those who wore the judicial ermine at this session of court were John Doty, presiding judge, and the associate judges, Ezekiel Porter and Frederick Sholtz. The probate court of Martin county met at the same house one month later. This was the first judicial court of Martin county, and it is needless to say that the presiding judge as well as the associate judges were Democrats. The first commissioners, all Democrats, of course, met at the same house, which was designated the seat of government of Martin county on March 27 of the same year. These commissioners were Mathew Sholtz, John Merriman and John Mitchelltree.

The first court house in Martin county was begun at Hindostan in 1820, the contract being let on the 5th day of June to Benjamin Adams. This building was to cost $4,185.80 and was one of the finest court houses of the State contracted for at that time; and on the following day, June 6, 1820, Mathew Sholtz was awarded the contract to erect the jail for the county at Hindostan for the sum of $1,368.79. These contracts were awarded by the board of commissioners mentioned above.

In connection with the awarding of these contracts it is interesting to note the method of doing county business in those times. One of the matters determined at a meeting of the board was tavern-keepers' rates. On March 29, 1820, the board determined that the rates should be as follows: Keeping one horse one night, 62½ cents; one horse feed, 12½ cents; one lodging, 12½ cents; one meal, 37½ cents; each half-pint of whiskey, 12½ cents; each half-pint of French brandy or other foreign distilled spirits, 62½ cents; for distilled spirits of domestic manufacture, 12½ cents. Just think what an immigration there would be to Martin county if during these dry days in Indiana the board of commissioners would offer whiskey at 12½ cents per half-pint. The board of commissioners also fixed the tax rates for the year as follows: A gold watch, 50 cents; a silver watch, 37½ cents; oxen, 25 cents per head; horses, 37½ cents per head; first-class land, 50 cents per 100 acres; second-class land, 43½ cents per 100 acres; third-class land, 31½ cents per 100 acres. Poll tax was 50 cents. Many of our Republican friends of Martin county would like to return to the good old tax rate when they go to the court house to the treasurer's office to pay their taxes.

When the circuit court met on March 17, 1820, the first business transacted by them was to issue a writ to ascertain what damage would occur by the erection of a water mill on Beaver creek west of the present site of the town of Huron. The petitioner was Charles R. Brown. The county officers were: Thomas G. Printess, clerk and recorder; Julius Johnson, sheriff, and John P. Porter, prosecuting attorney—all Democrats.

About 1826 and 1827 (the exact date is unknown) the hand of fate smote down upon the town of Hindostan, the streets echoed with the wail of Rachel weeping for her children. The death angel stalked abroad. The cemetery on the hillside grew faster than the town in the valley. There was no resident physician, hence we have no positive account as to the character of the malady which swept from the face of the earth the town of Hindostan. We do know, from tradition and from the fragmentary records, that the toll of death was heavy. It is said that there were more dead than living within the town at times. And the forefathers of the town were gathered to their Father and they all slept together in the bosom of Mother Earth. Entire families died of this malady; others deserted their homes and fled to other sections, and there is not one building or one stone left to mark the place where Hindostan once thrived, only the roar of the waters pouring over the falls remains as in those days of long ago.

On March 14, 1828, the county commissioners ordered the county offices moved from Hindostan to Mt. Pleasant; and on September 1, 1829, the county commissioners held their first session at Mt. Pleasant. On March 8, 1844, the board of commissioners met and ordered the county seat to be changed to Halbert's Bluffs and appointed Mason J. Sherman commissioner to plat a county-seat town. The lands for the platting of said town were donated by Stephen Horsey on what was known at that time as Halbert's Bluffs and now the present site of Shoals, the present county seat. The town was platted as Memphis. Before the county seat was located at the newly platted town of Memphis, in 1845, it was ordered by the board of commissioners to be located at Hillsboro, later called Dover Hill; and the first meeting of the board of county commissioners was held at Dover Hill, September 7, 1846. Dover Hill continued to be the county seat from that time on until the Civil war, at which time an effort was made to again move the county seat, and a long and bitter fight was had between the towns of Shoals and Loogootee for the county seat. Finally this fight culminated by a compromise, and on December 11, 1871, the county seat was located at what is now West Shoals, an addition of Shoals. The records were moved from Dover Hill to West Shoals July 4, 1871. The court house in the town of West Shoals burned in 1876, but was immediately rebuilt on the same foundation, and the same is now the county court house. The court house buildings at these respective county seats were all handsome, up-to-date buildings for their time.

From the time Martin county was organized until the Civil war the county was controlled in its entirety by Democrats. They having an overwhelming majority, the only fight or political contest arising was for the nominations. The county political organization was of little consequence and no records have been preserved that give any information as to the county chairmen for many years. However, in the later days Martin county has maintained a very close fighting organization. Among the early leaders of the party were Abner Davis, Richard A. Clements, Chris O'Brien, Henry A. Peed, Granvel Gates, Argyle H. Inman, Leroy Cave, John P. Davis, John Riley, Lewis Jones, and later Captain C. S. Dobbins, Thomas Clark, Ephraim Moser, Thomas Hart, Philip McGovern, George W. Gates, George W. Freeman, Fabius Gwin, Elijah McFarland, followed by Lorenzo D. Haga, the present county chairman.

The Democratic newspapers of the county were papers edited by such able writers and staunch Democrats as Alexander M. Chomel, Henry A. Peed, Albert C. Hacker, William C. Gruber, William D. Sherfick, J. Will Jackman and Harry G. Strange. All of these editors, running back for more than fifty years, have been forceful with their pens and have been a power in maintaining Martin county in the Democratic column.

Martin county has never had a sufficient population to entitle it to a representative in the state legislature or a senator in the state senate, but at all times had been connected with various other counties at various times with a joint representative and joint senator. Among the Democratic senators who have represented Martin county in the various sessions of the state legislature since 1822 are: 1822-24, Frederick Sholtz; 1825-33, John Ewing; 1834-35, William Wallace; 1836, Henry M. Shaw; 1837-40, Thomas C. Moore; 1840-41, Robert N. Carnam; 1842-44, Abner Davis; 1845-46; Elijah Chapman; 1847, Richard A. Clements; 1853, Gaines H. Roberts; 1855-57, J. T. Freeland; 1859-65, Thomas R. Cobb; 1871-73, Leroy Cave; 1875-77, Henry A. Peed; 1879-81, William A. Traylor; 1883-85, James H. Willard; 1887, C. K. Tharp; 1889, George Walford; 1891-93, William Kennedy; 1903-05, William N. Matthews.

The representatives who have represented Martin county in the various sessions of the state legislature since 1822 are as follows: 1822, James G. Reed; 1823, William H. Routt; 1825-26, William Wallace; 1832, William Wallace; 1834, David McDonald; 1835, Josiah Culbertson and Patrick M. Brett; 1836, Lewis Jones; 1837, John Riley; 1838, Abner Davis; 1839, John Finley; 1840, John Flint; 1844, Silas L. Halbert; 1846, Richard A. Clements; 1847, Z. Walker; 1848, John P. Davis; 1849, Benjamin Goodwin; 1850, William E. Niblack; 1853, Thomas Gootee; 1857-59, Cutler S. Dobbins; 1865, Thomas Clark; 1863-65, John O'Brien; 1867, Argyle H. Inman; 1869, Leroy Cave; 1873, Henry A. Peed; 1875-77, Andrew J. Gossman; 1879-81, Thomas Hart; 1883, Brazil L. Greene; 1887, Thomas M. Clark; 1889, Ernest W. Pickhard; 1891, Ephraim Inman; 1893, William A. Wilson; 1897, Perry McCarty; 1911, Benjamin Johnson; 1913, Miles Roland.

The Democratic judges who have occupied the bench in the judicial circuit in which Martin county is or has been a part are Judge Niblack, who obtained national distinction as a judge;

Judge Cobb, Judge Wilson, Judge Heffron, and Judge Ogdon, the present judge. With the exception of some twelve years the judiciary of Martin county has been Democratic since its organization.

At all times since the organization of the county the county offices have been, in the main, Democratic. Occasionally since 1865 a Republican has been elected to a county office.

The Democratic organization of Martin county for the past fifty years has been one of the best of the state and has been so recognized by all southern Indiana counties.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF MIAMI COUNTY

By Joseph A. Faust

IN writing a history of Miami county, Indiana, Democracy, covering a century of time, a writer as a matter of course must collect his facts and information from various sources, such as histories previously written, conversations with participants, and from personal knowledge. For more than forty-five years last past the writer has been a laborer in the Democratic vineyard of Miami county, and that part of this history is personal knowledge. Credit for more ancient data is given to Francis S. McCabe, who wrote a short historical sketch of Miami county in 1865, to John A. Graham (1887), known as the historian of Miami county, and others.

Miami county was named after the Miami tribe of Indians, a branch of the Algonquin family, who were the aboriginal residents of this locality. Miami county was a part of Cass county, and was established by an act of the Legislature January 22, 1834. Alexander Jameson, John W. Miller and John Cruidson were appointed commissioners. October 23, 1826, Joseph Holman had purchased a section of land from John D. Richardville, a Miami Indian, who had obtained the same from the United States by treaty, paying for the same the sum of five hundred dollars. Holman laid off the town of Miamisport March 12, 1829, and here the above named commissioners met June 3, 1834, and transacted the first business of the county as such commissioners. June 9, 1834, at a special session, these commissioners provided for a state and county election, which was held on the first Monday of August, 1834. Benjamin H. Scott, a Democrat, was elected clerk; Jacob Linzee, sheriff; John W. Miller, Alexander Jameson and John Cruidson, county commissioners; Jacob Wilkinson and Stephen G. Shanks, associate judges; Abner Overman, treasurer. Daniel R. Bearss was appointed school commissioner and Joseph Holman, probate judge. At this election but sixty votes were cast.

January 7, 1829, Holman sold to William N. Hood 210 acres off the east end of the section of land purchased from Richardville for the sum of $500, a sum equal to the purchase price of the whole section. Here Holman laid off the town of Peru. Sessions of the county commissioners were held at Miamisport until May, 1835. On June 9, 1841, the plat of Miamisport was vacated by the county commissioners, and thereafter Peru became the county seat. On the night of March 16, 1843, the court house was completely destroyed by fire, together with all the records; consequently no official data of the election returns or political affiliations of the candidates can be obtained, if such records were kept.

No files of the Miami County Sentinel or other Democratic newspapers are obtainable antedating 1872, hence the names of the Democratic chairmen of the central committee previous to that time are not obtainable. Following is a list of the Democratic county chairmen from that time to the present:

1872, 1874, Henry Dutton; 1876, John M. Jackson; 1878, George H. Geves; 1880, Ed Wile; 1882, David H. Armantrout, who resigned, and Orson Durand; 1884, John R. Porter; 1886, Joseph A. Faust; 1888, Moses Rosenthal; 1890, 1892, 1906, 1908, Frank K. McElheny; 1894, Charles A. Cole; 1896, Andrew J. Parks; 1898, 1900, Joseph N. Tillitt; 1902, Philip S. Sullivan; 1904, Charles S. Dunn; 1910, 1912, 1914, William H. Auger. Mr. Auger, having been appointed postmaster, resigned as chairman and thereafter Homer Jenkins became chairman. In 1916 Albert H. Cole served as chairman and was again chosen in 1918, but resigned, enlisting in the navy, Vites E. Kagy now serving in that capacity.

Following is the presidential vote of Miami county from 1844 to the present time:

1844, Polk, Dem., 517; Clay, Whig, 569.
1848, Cass, Dem., 770; Taylor, Whig, 730.
1852, Pierce, Dem., 1,196; Scott, Whig, 968.
1856, Buchanan, Dem., 1,513; Fremont, Rep., 1,390.
1860, Breckinridge, Dem., 26; Douglas, Ind. Dem., 1,608; Lincoln, Rep., 1,835.
1864, McClellan, Dem., 1,717; Lincoln, Rep., 1,831.
1868, Seymour, Dem., 2,271; Grant, Rep., 2,193.
1872, O'Connor, Dem., 50; Greeley, Dem. and Lib. Rep., 2,119; Grant, Rep., 2,535.
1876, Tilden, Dem., 2,785; Hayes, Rep., 2,724.
1880, Hancock, Dem., 3,006; Garfield, Rep., 3,016.
1884, Cleveland, Dem., 3,310; Blaine, Rep., 2,996.
1888, Cleveland, Dem., 3,491; Harrison, Rep., 3,042.
1892, Cleveland, Dem., 3,433; Harrison, Rep., 2,974.
1896, Bryan, Dem., 3,602; McKinley, Rep., 3,293.
1900, Bryan, Dem., 3,849; McKinley, Rep., 3,812.
1904, Parker, Dem., 3,605; Roosevelt, Rep., 4,124.

1908, Bryan, Dem., 4,176; Taft, Rep., 3,821.

1912, Wilson, Dem., 3,366; Taft, Rep., 1,426; Roosevelt, Pro., 1,995.

1916, Wilson, Dem., 3,854; Hughes, Rep., 3,380.

Other parties, Liberty, Free Soil, National, Prohibition, People's, Socialist and Socialist Labor, received scattering votes, ranging from one vote for the Liberty party in 1844, the lowest, to 423 for the Socialist party in 1912, the highest.

A perusal of the presidential elections 1844 to 1916, inclusive, shows that Miami county gave a Democratic majority in fourteen elections out of eighteen. The vote for state officers was in the same proportion. In 1916 the entire Democratic county ticket was elected with the exception of representative.

Miami county has been represented in the State Legislature by the following named Democrats: 1845, Benjamin Henton; 1848, 1866, Nathan O. Ross; 1850, 1862, Richard F. Donaldson; 1856, Reuben C. Harrison; 1868, 1870, Jonathan D. Cox; 1876, William Zehring; 1880, Charles A. Cole; 1884, 1892, 1900, Henry V. Passage; 1886, Jabez T. Cox; 1888, 1890, William W. Robbins; 1896, David Haifley; 1898, John Cunningham; 1906, Burton Green; 1910, William A. Hammond; 1912, 1914, Jacob A. Cunningham.

Miami county has never had a representative in Congress, nor has any Democrat from the county been elected to any state office or held any prominent position in the public service, either domestic or diplomatic, with the single exception of Charles R. Hughes, who was appointed a member of the Industrial Board by Governor Ralston on March 16, 1915.

Benjamin Henton, James B. Fulwiler, John A. Graham, Henry Dutton, Richard B. Runyan, Richard F. Donaldson, Jonathan D. Cox, John Mitchell, Darius C. Darrow, William S. Todd, William Zehring, Eli J. Jameson, Henry V. Passage, John L. Farrar, Josiah Farrar, John R. Porter and Michael Horan, all deceased, are a few of the old-time Democrats who never wavered in their allegiance to the Democratic party, and who at all times contributed their time and energies for the success of the same.

Other states have had barbecues in their political campaigns, but no city in any state ever had barbecues of such magnitude as the city of Peru, aided by the loyal Democrats of Miami county. A barbecue is defined as "An open-air social or political feast, of which the chief feature is a barbecued animal," generally a beef, hog or sheep, dressed and roasted whole. These were donated by the farmers in each township, all striving to do the most. The committee in charge attended to the roasting, which was superintended by an expert, with able assistants, over trenches filled with a bed of live coals from hard wood. Buns, pickles, etc., with the barbecued meat, were served on long rows of tables, thoroughly enjoyed by the thousands of visitors which thronged the city. Parades of big wagons from the county, filled with pretty girls, industrial floats, brass and martial bands, were features of these barbecues. The first barbecue was on the 23d day of October, 1884, at which Thomas A. Hendricks, Joseph E. McDonald, Judge Thurman, Jason D. Brown, Durbin Ward and other distinguished Democratic orators spoke. The barbecue day of 1888 was a dismal, rainy day, converting the streets into mud, and the indications were that there would be only a small crowd, but notwithstanding the dismal weather trainloads upon trainloads of people arrived from within a radius of two hundred miles, bringing enthusiastic delegations, which marched behind their bands through the slush and mud, presenting a mass of drenched humanity. Umbrellas, raincoats, oil cloth and anything that would shed water were eagerly purchased by the wet throngs from the merchants, and soon nothing of the kind was obtainable anywhere. As the rain poured down incessantly until far into the night, open-air speaking was an impossibility, necessitating the use of the court house and all other public halls, which were crowded to overflowing. The old Roman, Allen G. Thurman, vice-presidential candidate; Daniel W. Voorhees, Joseph E. McDonald, Isaac P. Gray, C. C. Matson, David Turpie, Robert Miers, A. N. Martin and other speakers were here on this occasion.

In 1892 another mammoth barbecue was held, but in 1896 a Democratic clam-bake and fish-fry took the place of the barbecue. Lack of money and the fact that the "Gold Bugs" withheld their support was the cause of the clam-bake not being the success of previous efforts, but the barbecue of 1904 brought its thousands of enthusiastic Democrats to the city, together with the "Gold Bugs," who had returned to camp. William Jennings Bryan, Judge Gannon of Chicago, Doctor Sebring of Kingston, N. Y., Congressman Burgess of Texas and Major Menzies were the speakers on this occasion. In 1912 it was not deemed necessary to have a barbecue as the Republican party was hopelessly divided, and the Democrats a solid unit. Presidential candidate Wilson, William Jennings Bryan and other prominent men spoke here during that campaign.

The first Democratic paper published in Miami county was published by James B. and John H. Scott, brothers, known as the Peru Gazette-Peru Democrat, one-half sheet Whig, the other half Democratic. Six months, lacking one day, was the life of this venture—April 14, 1842, to October 15, 1842. The Peru Herald was the next Democratic paper, November 28, 1846, to May 20, 1848, edited by John H. Scott.

June 28, 1848, John A. Graham commenced the publication of the Miami County Sentinel and published the same for a period of thirteen years, until 1861. W. B. Lockridge was the next owner of the Sentinel, followed by Thomas J. McDowell, Lockridge & Foley, Foley, Jameson & Conner, J. A. Miller, Foley & Miller, J. C. Maxey, Miller & Maxey. In 1874 the daily and weekly Times, T. J. McDowell & Sons, was consolidated with the Sentinel under the name of Times-Sentinel, which continued for a year, when the firm dissolved, each party retaining his paper and its name. The Sentinel was then conducted by Ewing & Maxey, later by Samuel F. Winter until 1879, Fulwiler & Cole until 1889, C. N. Kenton, April to November, 1889, followed by F. D. and F. A. Haimbaugh; then F. D. Haimbaugh sold his interest to T. J. Finch. The Sentinel up to this time had been Democratic, but in 1896 supported and advocated the election of Palmer and Buckner. This action resulted in a loss of patronage, and after the campaigned a company was incorporated for its publication by W. H. Zimmerman, and it was published under his management until his death, November 22, 1913, from injuries received in an automobile accident. Frank K. McElheny, his associate for years on the paper, and now county auditor, and Claude Kiser are the publishers at present. It is a bi-weekly and under the name of Miami County Sentinel is in its seventy-first year.

The Peru Daily Chronicle, now in its twenty-sixth year, ably edited by Samuel F. Winter, a veteran journalist of the Wabash valley, and his son Charles, is recognized for its staunch support of the Democratic party and its principles at all times.

Persons holding public office are liable to criticism, and especially so if they faithfully and conscientiously perform their duties. Miami county has been fortunate in its Democratic officeholders, as no grave charges have ever been filed against any Democratic official. One and all have been and are held in the highest esteem by all of their fellow citizens.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF MONROE COUNTY

MONROE COUNTY was organized under legislative act approved January 14, 1819.

The first election was held in that year under the supervision of John W. Lee, appointed sheriff for that purpose by Governor Jennings. Bartlett Woodward, Michael Buskirk and James Parks, all founders of distinguished Monroe county families, were the first commissioners. William Lowe, who had represented the county, then a part of Lawrence, in the constitutional convention of 1816, was clerk and auditor. The two offices were held in common at that time. The first meeting of the county commissioners was held at the home of Abner Blair, April 10, 1818. Monroe county has thus had a full century of political struggles.

In the early years of the history of the county, at least down to 1828, there were no sharp divisions in politics. All the voters were Jeffersonian Republicans, or, as we generally know them now, "Democrats." It would have been worth almost as much as one's life at that time to have avowed himself a Federalist. In fact, Federalists, horse thieves and counterfeits were all classed together on the lowest level. It is not to be understood from this, however, that there were no political fights in the early days. Baynard Hall has left us a picture of local politics unexcelled in literature, a picture that will answer just as well for any other county in the state of Indiana.

There were two sections in local politics as early as 1820. One of these was led by William Lowe, assisted by Jacob Lowe; the other by Dr. David Maxwell. Maxwell is charged with being the leader of the aristocrats—a charge, perhaps, originating from the fact that he brought some colored servants with him from Kentucky. The Lowes were the leaders of "the common people." When the division came between Clay and Jackson, in 1824 and 1828, the party led by Maxwell became "Whigs" and that led by Lowe became "Jacksonian Democrats."

Practically all of the settlers of Monroe county came from the South, and a substantial majority of the voters up until 1856 were followers of Jackson. This, however, does not mean that the county always went Democratic. About as many state representatives and senators were Whigs as Democrats during this period.

The fight between the Clay and Jackson men was always won by the followers of "Old Hickory." On the other hand Maxwell, when a candidate, was invincible, serving a large part of the time from 1818 until his death as a member of the legislature. During this time he was the best known man in Monroe county. Following the Lowes were Parris C. Dunning and James Hughes as county leaders of the Democracy. Dunning, from 1835 to the time he became governor, 1848, was the best known Democrat in the county and was everywhere recognized as the party leader. He was known likewise as the leading Democrat of the state, serving most of the time in the legislature. With him were David McDonald, a circuit judge, and Delana Eccles, well known throughout the state and later a United States judge.

James Whitcomb, ninth governor of the state, serving from 1843 to 1848, also began his career in Monroe county. It is probable that in Monroe county he learned to be, as he later was, one of the best campaigners the state has ever produced.

Monroe county was forty years old before a Monroe congressman was elected to represent it. In earlier years it had been represented by such men as John Carr from Clark county, John W. Davis of Sullivan county, once speaker of the house of representatives, and George G. Dunn of Lawrence county. It was not until the convention of 1848 that Willis A. Gorman, a lawyer of Bloomington, and colonel in the Mexican war, was elected from Monroe county to represent the sixth Indiana district. He served two terms and then became territorial governor of Minnesota under President Franklin Pierce.

Until this time the county had always been represented by Democrats, except the one term, 1847 to 1849, when George G. Dunn was representative. He was elected as the result of a bitter three-cornered fight in the Democratic convention between George W. Carr, Dr. John W. Davis and James Hughes. The next representative to be elected from Monroe county was Judge James Hughes, also a lawyer from Bloomington; Hughes was a very strong man but a bitter partisan, and would not take kindly to political advice. More than to any other person, it is due to him that the Democratic party lost its grip on Monroe county. In the anti-slavery fights then going on in Congress he acted with the administration and in opposition to the counsels of his party at home.

One one occasion in congress, when discussing the Lee-Compton constitution bill, he declared that if every Whig in Monroe county were to scourge the slave to his daily toil he would still support the Lee-Compton measure. Most of his Presbyterian constituents resented his extreme stand on the slavery question and when the Republican party was organized he united with it. Hughes, hence, was defeated in 1858, and became a Republican, or at least said he would, and stood for the United States senatorship, on that ticket.

In later years Daniel W. Voorhees represented the county, though, of course, he was not a native of Monroe. Some of the most interesting political combats ever staged in Monroe county were between Voorhees and Judge Morton C. Hunter of Bloomington. In 1896 Monroe county again broke into the Republican lists when congressman Robert W. Miers of Bloomington was elected to represent the 2nd district, a position which he held for four successive terms, 1897 to 1905.

A few statistics from this period will show the political alignment of this county. In 1840 Van Buren received 715 votes, Harrison 951. Four years later Polk received 1,118 votes, Clay 721. In 1856 Buchanan received 1,191, Fremont on a Republican ticket 498, and Fillmore on the American ticket 392. Here is where the break came. In 1860 Douglas received 716, Breckinridge 395, and Lincoln 1,198, the last receiving 87 more votes than both the Democratic tickets and carrying the county over all by a majority of 33. Since that time usually the county has gone Republican under the national ticket. However, in 1864 the Democrats carried it by eight majority out of a total vote of 2,412.

During the Civil war and down until his death the local leader of the party was Judge Samuel H. Buskirk. He learned politics in the office of Parris C. Dunning; served in the legislature almost continuously from 1848 until 1863, becoming speaker during the latter year. In 1870 he was elected to the supreme bench where he served six years. He was recognized throughout the state as one of the most effectual stump speakers, as well as one of the most brilliant lawyers in the state. Since the death of Judge Buskirk, the most prominent Democratic leader has been congressman Robert W. Miers, who served four terms in congress; was a member of the state house of representatives in 1879, and later served as prosecuting attorney, circuit judge, and made a number of races for state offices in which he was unsuccessful.

John R. East, who was a member of the Indiana house of representatives in 1897, was one of the leading orators of the state. In his early manhood he was elected clerk of the Monroe county circuit court. As a "spellbinder" he had few superiors in the state. Richard A. Fulk, a member of the state senate, 1890-95, was prominent as a campaigner. Edwin Corr was assistant district attorney; deputy attorney-general; a member of the senate, 1899-1901; a member of the house in 1911; later a member of the public service commission; and for more than twenty-five years a member of the board of trustees of Indiana University.

John W. Cravens was superintendent of the Monroe county schools, 1887-90; clerk of the circuit court, 1890-94; county chairman, 1890-96; member of the house of representatives, 1889-91; district chairman, 1916-18. Thomas J. Sare was active in Democratic circles, was chairman of the city central committee in 1915, and was a member of the Indiana house of representatives, where he was chairman of the judiciary committee. Others who have been prominent in the party affairs of Monroe county, are: Oscar H. Cravens, editor of the Bloomington World, postmaster from 1914; John G. Harris, a member of the legislature of 1907, and mayor of the city 1910 to 1918; Rufus H. East, postmaster from 1904 to 1908; Walter E. Hottel, member of the legislature in 1907; and John C. Dolan, member of the legislature in 1889.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF MONTGOMERY COUNTY

By Justin J. Molony

MONTGOMERY COUNTY was organized March 1, 1823, and consists of a rectangular area of land. Originally it measured twenty-four miles wide by twenty-four miles long, but the Legislature of 1826 reduced it by allotting to Fountain county a strip of land three miles wide by twenty-four miles long. Montgomery has an area of 504 square miles.

The year of the founding of the county saw the planning of the town (now city) of Crawfordsville, which was laid out by Major Whitlock and which became the county seat.

The early history of the boundary lines of the territory which comprises the present limits of Montgomery county is uncertain, but duly authenticated history shows that in 1790 this territory was under the jurisdiction of Knox county. In the year 1817 Sullivan county was designed and the area of Montgomery passed under its control. In 1818 Vigo county became a separate entity and this county came within its limits. In 1821 Parke was set off, including the northern territory to the Michigan-Indiana State line. In 1822 Putnam was set off and its limits ran to the lake. The following year Montgomery was designated and thus came into being as a governmental subdivision.

Montgomery county occupies a central position on the west side of the State. The general elevation of the surface above sea level is between 735 feet in Wayne township and 838 feet in Walnut township. The county is well drained naturally and is chiefly an agricultural district.

The origin of the Democratic party as an organization has long ago passed into history. Stories of its birth form the mythology for this generation. That it was built upon a substantial foundation is attested by the fact that the continuing fight against unequal odds has swung Montgomery county into the Democratic column and at the present time boasts that it has placed into every county office substantial, reliable and efficient business and professional men of its political faith.

We, who are today in the majority in this county, find it extremely easy to enter the political fray for an election battle, but the pleasure of doing so is attributed to those (many of whom have passed away) who fought against ridicule, sarcasm and on the minority side of the battle in days gone by.

Statistics of early county organization have not been compiled and memory is too uncertain for historical data. But of this we are sure: this party began an aggressive campaign in 1888, with Charles Johnston at its helm as county chairman. It was through the efficiency of his labors as well as the following who took up where he left off that the present success can be credited. Following him in their order came:

1890 James M. Seller.
 1892 Will H. Johnston.
 1894 Jeff J. Mills.
 1896 Taylor Thompson.
 1896 Will H. Johnston (district chairman).
 1898 H. D. Vancleave.
 1900 A. W. Henry.
 1902 Clyde H. Jones.
 1904 J. S. Zuck.
 1906 J. Harvey Canine.
 1908 J. Harvey Canine.
 1910 Basil T. Merrell.
 1912 Basil T. Merrell.
 1914 Q. E. Bundy.

The following tabulation shows the vote of Montgomery county for and in support of the national head of the ticket:

| Year. | Democrat. | Republican. |
|-------|-----------|-------------------------|
| 1892 | 3834 | 3832 |
| 1896 | 4124 | 4342 |
| 1900 | 4082 | 4493 |
| 1904 | 3726 | 4620 |
| 1908 | 4227 | 4426 |
| 1912 | 3821 | 2747 |
| 1914 | 3722 | 3314 (vote for Senator) |

Montgomery has sent as Democrats to the State Legislature men who have by their activity and vote brought honor to the party as well as those whom they represented. Among that list and the years they served can be found the following:

1841 Philip Engle.
 1843-44 James Seller.
 1846 S. Hostetter.
 1849-50 James F. Harney.
 1850-51 R. W. McMakin.
 1851 Mahlon D. Manson.
 1869 James G. Johnson.
 1873 Jesse Y. Durham.
 1877 Henry Hulett.
 1879 Maurice Thompson.
 1891 Alfred N. Higgins.
 1893 D. V. McCallister.

1911-13 S. E. Voris.

The Democracy of Montgomery county has been especially fortunate in having within its ranks men as party workers and former officials whose activities and earnest participation in the affairs of the organization have been the cause of the success which Democracy has obtained here. Among the list, too numerous to mention, can be found many on the honor roll, who, when called upon for support, it made but little difference whether day or night the task assigned was carried to completion, the following:

Allen Byers, Waynetown.
 Stout Zook, Waynetown.
 Vern Livengood, Waynetown.
 William Mullen, Wayne township.
 Lennie Osborn, Wayne township.
 Richard Cording, Wingate.
 Melvin Hatton, Wingate.
 Etna Curtis, Wingate.
 Ora Mason, New Richmond.
 T. J. Jones, New Richmond.
 Charles Foley, Coal Creek township.
 James Parlon, Coal Creek township.
 Dan Harrigan, Madison township.
 John Harrigan, Madison township.
 Fred Shanklin, Madison township.
 Otis Thompson, Madison township.
 Henry Shobe, Madison township.
 Lewis Kirk, Sugar Creek township.
 William Bundy, Sugar Creek township.
 Charles Clouser, Sugar Creek township.
 George Deck, Sugar Creek township.
 John Graham, Sugar Creek township.
 V. Craig, Franklin township.
 Wallace Buchanan, Franklin township.
 Joseph Ragsdale, Franklin township.
 Wallace Cashmer, Franklin township.
 Charles Shannon, Franklin township.
 Sam Shaver, Franklin township.
 John Lane, Scott township.
 Thomas Foster, Scott township.
 Alonzo McLain, Scott township.
 George McLain, Scott township.
 Charles Buser, Scott township.
 Dr. Batman, Clark township.
 Will N. Goodbar, Clark township.
 Wallace Foster, Clark township.
 Cliff Hill, Clark township.
 Ben Clark, Clark township.
 Dave Sparks, Walnut township.
 Harvey Morris, Walnut township.
 Robert Galloway, Walnut township.
 Will Loop, Walnut township.
 O. N. Eddingfield, Walnut township.
 Ed. Laurence, Brown township.
 Charles Johnson, Brown township.

Tom O'Connor, Brown township.

Bruce Pope, Brown township.

Irwin Deer, Brown township.

Charles Canine, Brown township.

James Roberson, Brown township.

Ed. Etter, Ripley township.

John Hopping, Ripley township.

James Elmore, Ripley township.

George Snyder, Ripley township.

Dr. Howard, Ripley township.

The city of Crawfordsville has so many that have been fighting in the trenches that it would be an exhausting task to name them all, but brief mention should be given to Clyde H. Jones, candidate for Congress; ex-State Senator Will H. Johnston, Mayor Murphy, Councilmen Frank McGeath, Mart Burroughs, Henry Schenck, Carl Snyder and John Vanausdall, and the members-elect to the county offices.

The Democracy of Montgomery county is at present ably represented in news circles by the Crawfordsville Review. This paper has an honorable history in its fight for Democratic principles that dates back to 1841. The starting of a paper came as a necessity in the days of promulgating the doctrines of Van Buren and Jackson. Bennett Engle, father of the present County Auditor, was the capitalist for the first newspaper venture in behalf of Democracy and Charles Bowen was the editor and mechanical chieftain of the sturdy little journal.

In 1862 the paper was purchased from these men and finally came into the hands of E. C. Voris and was successively owned in whole or in part by T. B. Collins, J. M. Miller, State Senator; James M. Seller, Hon. Bayless W. Hanna, later minister to the Argentine; John E. Hanna, A. B. Cunningham and W. E. Henkel.

In March, 1900, the paper was sold to Samuel M. Coffman, then the proprietor of the Argus-News, a rival Democratic paper. The combined sheet was called the News-Review, but later assumed the name of the senior paper, the Review.

The paper was sold by Mr. Coffman to R. P. Carpenter, the present proprietor of the Noblesville Times, and postmaster at that place. Mr. Westlake purchased the plant and in turn sold it to G. H. D. Sutherlin and his partners, who incorporated the company.

In 1913 George Harney assumed the editorial management of the paper and assisted materially in the splendid fight made by the Democrats of the city of Crawfordsville in the election held in the fall of 1913, at which time the Democrats won.

Under the present management the Review is a power for good in western Indiana. Its increased and growing circulation is confined to this and neighboring counties and circulates among all classes of people. While not radical, it has constant and present opportunities to promulgate party doctrines among the large class of intelligent people.

The following is a complete list of officeholders in Montgomery county, showing to what party they belong:

Judge Circuit Court (Twenty-second judicial district)—Jerre West, Democrat.

Clerk Circuit Court—Thomas E. Matthews, Democrat.

Assessor—George Welty, Democrat.

Auditor—Bennett Engle, Democrat.

Treasurer—O. P. Everson, Democrat.

Recorder—Henry D. Servies, Democrat.

Sheriff—James F. Wren, Democrat.

Prosecuting Attorney—Ira Clouser; Democrat.
Coroner—Dr. Chester Howard, Democrat.

Superintendent of Schools—Karl C. James, Democrat.

Health Commissioner—Dr. H. W. Sigmond, Democrat.

Surveyor—M. L. Nees, Democrat.

County Physician—Dr. F. O. Schenck, Democrat.

County Road Superintendent—H. A. Chadwick, Democrat.

County Commissioners—First district, Q. E. Bundy, Democrat; Second district, L. R. Long, Democrat; Third district, M. W. Hatton, Democrat.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF MORGAN COUNTY

THE county of Morgan is in many respects one of the most favorably located tracts of country in the State of Indiana. The rich and fertile valley of the West Fork of White river enters the county at its northeast corner, at a point known as the Waverly Bluffs (which is said to be the geographical center of the State).

The capitol was once located at this point and a few buildings erected, but later was removed twelve miles north to Indianapolis, the county seat of Marion county. At that time Indianapolis was a small village, but better located for a great inland city than the Waverly Bluffs.

The county was organized by an Act of the Legislature in 1821-22. This county, before the admission of the State in 1816, was the undisputed home of the Miami tribe of Indians. After the battle of Tippecanoe in 1811 the power of the Indians was completely crushed, which led to numerous treaties, whereby the Indians ceded to the government the land occupied by Morgan county, and it gradually became settled up from Kentucky, Tennessee and the Carolinas.

POLITICAL HISTORY OF THE COUNTY.

Unfortunately on account of a fire in the court house in the early sixties, the tally sheets of previous elections were destroyed, and the writer, who was born in the county in 1833, can only give the political result of elections from boyhood memory and conversation with pioneer settlers, all of whom are long since dead. His father was an ardent and leading Henry Clay Whig up to the death of the Whig party in 1854. The writer became of age in 1854 and cast his first vote for the Democratic party against Know-nothingism, but was completely snowed under in his first vote in the county by the secret, oath-bound Know-nothing party that had swallowed up the Whig party. The county from 1824 to 1840 was slightly Democratic in national elections, but mixed in the selection of local officers.

The campaign of 1840, the most memorable in the history of politics to that date, between the Whigs and Democrats in this county, was known as the "Log-cabin and Hard-cider campaign" between William Henry Harrison and Martin Van Buren. It was a singing, shouting and pole-raising campaign. It has been said that the Whigs sung and shouted General Harrison into the presidential chair. The tidal wave for "Tip and Tyler" gave the Whig party complete control of the local government of the county by small majorities, which they again lost in 1844. This was an exciting political battle nationally between James K. Polk and Henry Clay. Many fights occurred that became the conversation at musters and rallies for years afterward. One worthy of mention, spoken of today by old people, of the campaign of 1840 follows:

Men were measured in those days more by their muscular strength than by their power to grasp fundamental issues of national questions. A quadruple of Whigs, on returning to their homes in the evening (all slightly tee-ed up) met in the road a man and his wife in a covered wagon moving from Indiana back to Ohio. The horseback Whigs hollered "Huzzah for Harrison," the mover and his brave wife hollered for Van Buren. The horseback Whigs faced their horses around to the wagon, and the spokesman, who prided himself on his fighting qualities, said, "Then you are a Democrat?" "I am a Jackson Democrat." "Well, we have got some Whig whisky here and you'll have to take a drink of Harrison whisky." "No," he said, "I have a bottle of Van Buren liquor; you must drink Democratic whisky with me." "No, you have to drink Harrison whisky or take a licking." "Well," said the mover, "a licking is something I have never yet taken." "If you'll get out I'll d—d quick give you one," the other replied. He passed the lines to his wife and commenced getting out. She threw the lines down, picked up a revolver and got out herself. All dismounted and tied their horses to the bushes by the roadside. When all was ready for the fight she cocked her revolver and said: "Gentlemen, this has got to be a fair fight. I will shoot dead the first one who interferes until one of these men hollers 'enough.'" "Oh, madam, we are all gentlemen; have no fears of foul play." "All right, Jack, remember I am here." Everything being ready, the combatants faced each other and began knocking. Newton, the Whig bully, was six feet four, with long arms. Jack, the Democrat, was five ten, built from the ground up and as active as a wild-cat. Newton was placing his blows scientifically and out of reach of Jack. His wife saw his disadvantage and cried out, "Jack, clinch him." Jack sprang at least ten feet, dodging a terrible blow, clinched Newton, and with a dexterous trip threw him on his back in the road, falling on top of him and pounding him right and left, with blow after blow well placed. His friends said, "Let's separate them." "No," said Jack's wife; "not unless you gentlemen acknowledge he is whipped." "We confess it, madam." "Then separate them." After they had washed the blood off in a ditch by the roadside they all took a drink from the Democratic bottle and the Whig bottle and shook hands as friends. Mr. Newton then said: "I live but half a mile back, have a good barn and comfortable house, plenty to eat, and as the weather is bad and the river rising rapidly, turn your wagon around and go back with me and remain until the weather changes and the river falls so it will be safe to cross." The mover begged to be excused, but Newton would accept no excuse, as it would be unsafe to cross the river. He turned around and went back with his Whig friend and remained for several days, until a change in the weather came. These two men corresponded by letter and were warm friends for the remainder of their lives. Mr. Newton told the writer years afterward that he was whipped, but would have died in the road before he would have cried "enough." He said the sweetest music he ever heard was when his brave wife said: "If you gentlemen acknowledge he is whipped, then you may part them."

In 1844, under the leadership of James K. Polk, the Democrats gained control of the local government of the county, but by small majorities up to 1854, the date of the death of the Whig party and the organization of the Knownothing party, who succeeded through a secret oath-bound organization in an off presidential year in sweeping the county as they did many counties of Indiana, but that party was short-lived, as the Democracy again came back into power in 1856.

In 1860 there was a very exciting campaign between the Democrats and the Republicans, Lincoln and Douglas being the standard-bearers. Lincoln carried the county by 162 votes that swept into office the entire local ticket, except the writer, who was elected County Treasurer by twenty-five majority, the real beginning of his long and eventful political career.

The Civil war came on after the inauguration of President Lincoln and for a quarter of a century the Republicans controlled almost unbrokenly the local government of the county.

In 1884, in the Cleveland and Blaine campaign, this county became Democratic locally. Since then it has been an uncertain county politically, but principally Republican up to 1910. In the middle of President Taft's administration the disaffection began to show itself in the ranks of the Republican party, which culminated in 1912 in the local government of the county falling entirely into the hands of the Democracy. In this county, like many others in Indiana, the party robes rest loosely on the voter; much criticism can be heard of "boss rule," "machine politics," "public extravagance," "failure to carry out platform promises," etc., etc. The safe thing is to make no written predictions of the future standing of the politics of Morgan county.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF NEWTON COUNTY

NEWTON COUNTY is the youngest in its political organization and probably the latest in settlement of all the counties in the State. Geographically, it comprises ranges eight, nine and fractional range ten, bordering the Illinois State line, and extends north through townships twenty-seven, twenty-eight, twenty-nine, thirty, thirty-one and at its northeast extremity into township thirty-two; the north boundary line being irregular and limited to the sinuous course of the Kankakee river. It comprises about 420 square miles in area and is divided into three natural subdivisions, the valley of the Iroquois, the Beaver Creek valley and lake basin, and the Kankakee valley.

Prior to its organization this territory was a part of Jasper county, and in 1857 the inhabitants thereof presented a petition to the board of commissioners of Jasper county, asking for the establishment of a new county, and on December 7, 1857, this petition was granted. Zachariah Spittler, John Darroch and David Creek were appointed a committee to establish the boundaries of the proposed new county. In March, 1860, Governor Willard appointed Thomas R. Barker organizing sheriff, who called an election early in April for the purpose of electing county officers. The men chosen at this election met on April 21, 1860, at the town of Kent, now Kentland, were installed in their respective offices and thereupon the county of Newton was declared to be established and organized.

Of those participating in the establishment and organization of the county, Thomas R. Barker, Zachariah Spittler and John Darroch were Democrats and for many years afterwards were recognized leaders in the councils of the party. Thomas R. Barker is deserving particular mention. He was an Englishman by birth, came into this territory when a mere boy and lived among the Indians and acquired his knowledge of life from the Indians; was otherwise uneducated and yet possessed of such a powerful intellect and forceful character that he was recognized by all who knew him as a leader of men, and accepted as a loyal companion and entertainer for the most talented and highly educated. I remember to have heard him tell of being at Danville, Ill., in 1832, where he met a Mr. Forbes, collector of tax for the district extending north to the north boundary of the State, and that Forbes paid the tax on the city of Chicago because it was less than the expense to him of making the trip there to collect it. It was Barker who named this county "Newton" to further perpetuate the historical friendship of Jasper and Newton.

The first Democratic convention was held at the Darroch school house, then located in the southwest corner of section 28, Beaver township, and as I now recall there was present at this mass convention not to exceed twenty-five men. The candidates were selected by ballots, hats were used for receiving the votes. The nominees of that convention were as follows: For clerk of the circuit court, Zachariah Spittler; for treasurer, Samuel McCullough; for recorder, John Darroch; for sheriff, Elijah I. Shriver; for auditor, Alexander Sharp; for surveyor, Adam Shideler, and for county commissioners, Thomas R. Barker, William Russel and Michael Coffelt. These candidates were all elected but one. John Ade, Republican candidate for recorder, was elected.

The total population of the county at the time was about 2,300. Close upon the political organization of the county came a change in the national administration. Then came the Civil war, and the cause of Democracy in this, as in all other localities of the North, suffered. Some there were who trailed then, as they always trail, with the dominant party. Others there were who confounded a principle with a name and went off after false policies of government on account of prejudice acquired against the word "Democrat."

The first Democratic paper, the Newton County Democrat, was established in August, 1862, by William C. Rose, a young lawyer of much prominence and ability, but of very poor health, and by reason of which, in the following spring, John McCarthy became the editor for a time. In 1867 John B. Spotswood became the editor of this paper and, with some interruptions in name and proprietorship of short duration, Mr. Spotswood continued as the editor of this political organ until his demise in 1893. It was then known as the Kentland Democrat and under that title is now edited by Edward Steinbaugh. Mr. Spotswood was a bachelor, a descendant of the noted Spotswood family of Virginia, a man well educated, versatile and of marked ability as an editorial writer.

Until about the campaign of 1884 the political organization of the county was nominal rather than practical and effective and not until later years, when the practice of recognizing young men as the working force and casting upon them the burden of campaign, putting them forward not only as members of the organization with particular duties to be performed, but as delegates to the various conventions and as candidates for the various offices, did the party begin to realize substantial gains.

In 1908 the Republican majorities on the state and national tickets ranged from 232 on the governor to 455 on Republican electors, and in 1908, the Republican boom campaign, the majorities ran from 804 to 852 in a total vote as between the two parties of about 2,700, while in 1912, on account of the better organization of the Democrats and the defection in the Republican party through the progressive movement, the Democrats carried the county by majorities from 89 to 174, and in 1916, with the progressives and stand-patters practically reunited, their majorities on state and national delegates fell below 200, while the Democrats elected the auditor, treasurer and sheriff by substantial majorities.

The political party in the minority locally is not usually productive of local politicians, and more especially is this true where the volume of the vote is small, and no doubt but that, politically, Newton county "has its mute, inglorious Miltons" and guiltless Cromwells.

Of all our Democrats Patrick Keefe came nearest, perhaps, to the attainment of some distinction as a politician. He was born in Ireland, educated at Thurles, and came to America in 1865. Always active in local politics, in 1896 he came to be recognized as a campaign orator. In 1904 he was a candidate for presidential elector for the Tenth Indiana District, but unfortunately on July 4 of that year, while on his way to the national Democratic convention at St. Louis, lost his life in a train wreck at Litchfield, Ill. Mr. Keefe was quite popular among the Democrats in Indiana and Illinois and was recognized in the councils of the party, state and nation.

A becoming modesty, as well as a proper sense of personal security forbids that any living active member of the party should be made the subject of special mention in this article, and the purpose of it forbids that the entire roll of honor be here recorded. Let it be sufficient, therefore, to say that Newton county Democracy is organized, active and efficient and its history is yet to be made as well as yet to be written.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF NOBLE COUNTY

By Joseph C. Kimmill

NOBLE COUNTY was organized in 1836. It was included in Allen county from 1824 to 1836. The Democratic central committee was organized in 1868 with Hon. J. B. Stoll as county chairman. The following gentlemen have served as county chairman since that time: H. Wakeman, Owen Black, E. B. Gerber, James M. Denny, David Hough, Charles K. Greene, William N. Showalter, Dr. John W. Morr, J. Frank Stanley, George D. Gaby and John C. Cleland.

Noble county has always been evenly divided politically and neither party has elected the entire ticket save in two or three instances.

The following Democrats have served in the Indiana legislature: David B. Harriman, Henry C. Stanley, Eli B. Gerber, Norman Teal, James Roscoe, James E. McDonald, J. C. Kimmell, Joseph T. Stahl and Marion Franks. In 1906 Dr. John W. Morr of Albion was the Democratic candidate for Congress, but he was defeated by a small majority by Clarence Gilhams of LaGrange. J. B. Stoll was candidate for State Auditor in 1872 and was the party's nominee for Congress in 1878 but unfortunately he met defeat upon both occasions. O. H. Downey was a candidate for State Statistician and Henry G. Zimmerman was nominated for Appellate Judge but these gentlemen both met defeat with the balance of the State ticket. David B. Harriman of Northport represented Noble county in the State Legislature for a number of years and was a member of the constitutional convention in 1851.

Among the prominent Noble county Democrats the name of Hon. J. B. Stoll, editor of the History of Indiana Democracy, stands at the head. As founder and publisher of the National Banner he contributed more to the Democratic party than perhaps any one man. His fearless editorials did more to mold public opinion than any other medium. I would place the late James E. McDonald, his successor as editor of the Banner, next in the list. No one ever doubted where Jim McDonald stood on any public question. No one ever doubted his sincerity. He was, like his predecessor, an able writer and he enjoyed a wide acquaintance. He was a member of the Indiana State Senate and was one of the leaders in that body. He served as Postmaster at Ligonier during Cleveland's first term and was a member of the Indiana State Board of Agriculture for nearly twenty years. Henry C. Stanley of Green township, David Hough, Eli B. Gerber, Charles V. Inks, Dr. A. S. Parker, William S. Kiser, Charles K. Greene, George Keehn, James Sweet, David Law, M. M. Merriam, N. P. Eagles, Henry G. Zimmerman, Michael Beck, Samuel E. Alvord, James M. Denny and many others have served their party in various capacities and have held prominent positions in the official life of Noble county.

One of the most remarkable feats in Noble county politics was pulled off in 1870 when James Stewart of Noble township was defeated for the nomination for County Auditor by the Republicans and a week later he was nominated for the same office by the Democrats and triumphantly elected at the ensuing election. He served two terms and remained a Democrat until his death. His son, Virgil, is a resident of Albion and is at present Justice of the Peace of Albion township.

There are two Democratic newspapers in the county, the Ligonier Banner, published by W. C. B. Harrison, and the Albion Democrat, edited by W. H. McEwen. The Banner was founded by the Hon. John B. Stoll of South Bend and was for a number of years called the National Banner. He sold the Banner to ex-Senator James E. McDonald, who published it until his death. This paper can boast of having had two of the ablest editors in the State of Indiana. The Albion Democrat had a stormy career until the present management purchased it and it is now one of the best county newspapers in Northern Indiana. The Kendallville News, published for several years by the late A. S. Parker, was merged into the Standard-News and is run as an independent paper. Noble county Democracy owes much of its success to the efficiency of the press.

The Noble county court house is practically filled with Democrats at the present time, there being but one Republican on the county pay-roll.

Hon. Luke H. Wrigley was re-elected Judge of the Thirty-third Judicial Circuit at the last election. George A. Young, the efficient Auditor, assumed the duties of his office January 1 of this year; William H. Favinger is Clerk of the Noble Circuit Court, Wilbert T. Hines is County Treasurer; John C. Cleland, the genial County Sheriff, is completing his second term. Jacob C. Lindsey divides his time between the duties of the County Assessor's office and his favorite pastime—fishing. Edwin Smith, one of the stiffest Democrats in the county, is the Recorder, while Cecil V. Kilgore is filling the office of County Superintendent of Schools. Noble county never had a more efficient Board of County Commissioners than William Peiper, Amon Spurgeon and Daniel D. Stump. As a fitting recognition of their services the voters of the county have elected each of them to a third term, a new precedent in Noble county politics. The excellent services rendered by the Democratic office-holders has been in a large measure the means of keeping Noble county in the Democratic column.

The Democrats of Noble county are firm believers in the doctrine that a public office is a public trust and it may be said to their credit that no Democratic official ever betrayed the trust imposed upon him. When the party went down in defeat the unfortunate candidates accepted their defeat gracefully and when victory perched on their banner they accepted their official positions as a sacred trust, believing that he who serves the people best, serves his party best. Noble county can boast of clean politics and honest elections and the Democrats have done their share toward bringing these conditions about.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF OHIO COUNTY

ENVIRONMENT and association may have a great deal to do with the shaping of one's political ideas and acts, as well as in other things of life. For instance, in her earlier days, in fact from 1803 to 1844, Ohio county was a part of good old Democratic Dearborn. It was almost impossible even to think in terms other than Democratic. While the Republican minority kept on voting, they never showed any accomplishments for all their labors. They merely voted as a matter of form and "sort of" to preserve an organization, never having enough of a chance of success to make them even hope for such a thing.

Once separated from good political associations, the Republican sentiment and votes began increasing at about the same time, and at the end of the first twenty years, in 1864, both presidential and state ticket majorities commenced going the other way. From that time on there was a steady recording of Republican successes in Ohio county, the majorities being from small to safe, until the campaign of 1908, when the tide turned to Democracy by a very small margin. It has since then been maintained only by most efficient organization.

In the election of 1908 Thomas R. Marshall led his Republican opponent by 14 votes, while the Democratic presidential candidate, William J. Bryan, and his running mate, John Worth Kern, led by only 3 votes.

The records of the state elections since 1856 are sufficiently interesting to bear publication as showing the political complexion of the county:

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF ORANGE COUNTY

THE present county of Orange originally comprised portions of Knox and Clark—Knox west of the meridian line and Clark east. March 9, 1813, all of Orange county west of the meridian line and south of the line dividing Sections 20 and 29, township 1 north, became part of Gibson county. December 21, 1813, all of Orange county east of the meridian line except the southern half of township 1 south and the small tract north of Orleans and north of the junction of the Indian boundary lines of 1803 and 1805 became part of Washington county, and September 1, 1814, the last mentioned tract was added to Washington county. The southern half of township 1 south, east of the meridian, remained part of Harrison county.

Zachariah Lindley was the sheriff appointed by the Governor to organize the new county, which was done early in 1816, the first meeting of the newly elected officers being held at the residence of William Lindley, Jr. The county seat was named Paoli after a town in North Carolina whence the Lindleys, who donated the ground for the town, had come. Jonathan Lindley was appointed county agent and was directed to lay out the county seat into lots, which was done in April, 1816, and lots were sold to the amount of $8,294.40. Many of the descendants of these pioneer Lindleys reside in and about Orange county and have been very influential in the early history and up-building of the county.

Among the early inhabitants of this county were many tribes of Indians, chief of which were the Piankeshaws, Wyandottes, Shawnees and Delawares. Many Indian forts were scattered throughout the county and blockhouses for protection of the settlers were much in evidence. That prehistoric race, the Mound Builders, has also left abundant and convincing evidence of their habitation here long ago.

The political phase of Orange county has been such that each party has for a time been successful and then gone down in defeat. In August, 1816, the county gave Thomas Posey for Governor 419 votes and Jonathan Jennings, his opponent, 64. Many of the subsequent results at gubernatorial elections cannot be given, but records are at hand of about all the presidential elections. The campaign of 1840 was the first of note in Orange county. In May of that year at the Democratic county convention Joel Vandever presided and many representative Democrats were present. Dr. W. A. Bowls, then the leading Democrat of the county, a man of unusual talent, magnetism and personality, and a representative of the county, delivered a masterly address on the issues of the day. In August of the same year Mr. Bowls was re-elected representative and served his constituents with credit.

In 1844 the Democrats held an enormous barbecue at Orleans, fully 5,000 people being there. A large hickory pole was raised, and Messrs. Down, Smith, Sherritt and Albertson addressed the assemblage. Late in the 40's Dr. W. F. Sherrod became prominent in Democratic politics. He was one of the State electors in 1848 and was chosen to take the returns to Washington City. In 1849 he was elected to the State Legislature.

Up to this time the Whigs and Democrats had made up the leading parties of the county, but in 1851 a movement for the exclusion of the negroes arose and at the election in August, 1851, the question of the exclusion or colonization of the negroes or mulattoes was submitted to the county with the following result: For exclusion, 1,347; against exclusion, 24.

In 1856 politics in the county was in such a chaotic condition that almost the entire Whig vote went to Fillmore, the "American" candidate, only 49 votes being polled for Fremont, while Buchanan, the Democratic candidate, received 1,207. In 1860 again all the political parties received respectable support. In 1865, for the first time in the history of the county, almost the entire Republican ticket was elected. In 1868 the Democratic majority was 109 and in 1872 only 76. The result of the presidential elections for the past seventy years are shown in the following table:

The following Democrats of Orange county have served on the bench as Circuit Court and Common Pleas Judges: Common Pleas Judges, William Moran 1853 and Milton S. Mavity 1870; Circuit Court Judges, Francis Wilson 1879 and Thomas B. Buskirk 1900 to 1912.

The following is a list of the Democrats of the county who have served in the State Senate: Ezekiel Riley, 1838; Isaac Sands, 1841; D. S. Huffstetter, 1848; Quinton Lomax, 1858; William F. Sherrod, 1866, and James M. Andrew, 1886.

The following Orange county Democrats have filled the office of State Representative in the Legislature: William A. Bowles, 1838; Henry Lingle, 1841; W. A. Bowles, 1843; Joel Vanderveer, 1844; David F. Huffstetter, 1846, 1851 and 1854; William F. Sherrod, 1849 and 1856; Theodore Stackhouse, 1852 and 1866; David Lewis, 1858; Asa M. Black, 1860; Thomas Hunt, 1864; Luke B. Cogswell, 1870; John L. Meginity, 1874, 1884, 1892 and 1896; James F. Stucker, 1878 to 1882; Thomas B. Buskirk, 1886; Volney Trimble, 1890; Perry McCart, 1896; Henry T. Allen, 1902, and Miles Roland, 1912.

Democrats have been elected and served as county officers of Orange county as follows:

Clerk—Jeremiah Wilson, 1844 to 1852; Asa M. Black, 1852 to 1860 and 1863 to 1864; Hugh C. Wible, 1860 to 1863; John L. Meginity, 1864 to 1864 to 1872 and 1873 to 1874; John R. Simpson, 1874 to 1882; Elijah S. Scott, 1898 to 1903.

County Auditor—John Baker, 1841 to 1845; Henry Comingore, 1852 to 1860; Luke B. Cogswell, 1860 to 1868; Abraham Noblitt, 1868 to 1876; David F. Stucker, 1876 to 1879; John D. Carter, 1879 to 1880; George A. Buskirk, 1880 to 1884; Henry T. Allen, 1892 to 1896; Ed. A. Palmer, 1913 to 1917.

County Treasurer—Josiah Hazlewood, 1822 to 1828; Ephraim Doan, 1828 to 1838; A. J. Simpson, 1838 to 1840; Alexander Morris, 1841 to 1847; Benjamin Polson, 1847 to 1850; W. H. Rigney, 1850 to 1852; John C. Albert, 1854 to 1858; Thomas Hunt, 1858 to 1863; James Worrell, 1863 to 1865; H. H. Polson, 1867 to 1872; John Maxedon, 1872 to 1874; Henry Reed, 1874 to 1876; George W. Thomas, 1880 to 1882; John M. Felknor, 1899 to 1901, and J. W. McCullough, 1913 to 1915.

County Recorder—Josiah Hazlewood, 1836 to 1860; Green Hazlewood, 1860 to 1863; M. S. Mavity, 1863 to 1865; T. B. Buskirk, 1865; F. M. Gibner, 1869 to 1874; J. F. Purkiser, 1874 to 1876; John B. Buskirk, 1876; Edward Cornwell, 1884 to 1892; W. W. Stout, 1913 to 1917.

County Sheriff—Josiah Hazlewood, 1828 to 1832; Abraham Morris, 1834 to 1838; Jeremiah Wilson, 1838 to 1842; John Hollowell, 1844 to 1846; W. H. Rigney, 1846 to 1850; David F. Porter, 1850 to 1852; S. W. Rigney, 1852 to 1856; Alexander Morris, 1856 to 1858; James Worrell, 1858 to 1862; William Holiday, 1862 to 1863; Davis Jones, 1863 to 1865; J. P. McCart, 1867 to 1869; J. F. Stucker, 1869 to 1870; T. L. Brown, 1870 to 1874; W. P. Shively, 1874 to 1877; Samuel A. Davis, 1877 to 1878; Elisha Braxton, 1884 to 1886; William T. Kimbrel, 1890 to 1892; T. P. Riester, 1911 to 1915.

In the list of Democrats named herein the name of Judge Thomas B. Buskirk is perhaps more familiar to the Democrats of Orange county than any other. As an attorney in the famous Moody-Jones-Lowery murder case he distinguished himself in the prosecution of the murderers of Thomas Moody and gained popularity with the people which has continued with increasing strength to the present. He served as judge of the 42d Judicial Circuit for twelve years, 1904 to 1916. Prior to that he was a member of the State Board of Tax Commissioners and a member of the Legislature and has held other responsible positions.

Among prominent Democrats of the county before and immediately following the Civil war were Arthur J. Simpson, a prominent attorney; William A. Bowles, for many years owner of French Lick Springs; William F. Sherrod, David S. Huffstetter, Thomas Hunt and Henry Comingore.

In the seventies M. S. Mavity, Abraham Noblitt, J. L. Meginity, Luke B. Cogswell, Aaron Speer and Dr. James Sherrod; in later years Judge T. B. Buskirk, Capt. James F. Stucker, John R. Simpson, James Andrew, G. W. Thomas, Dr. U. S. Hon, Dr. L. S. Bowles, Dr. James W. Montgomery, James L. Noblitt, Perry McCart and John J. Lingle.

DEMOCRATIC NEWSPAPERS.

The first Democratic newspaper was issued in the county on May 5, 1832, and was called the Paoli Times. It was edited by William A. Bowles. This paper was published only for a few years.

On May 27, 1839, Henry Comingore started the True American. This paper was continued until January, 1846. On the 29th day of September, 1848, Henry Comingore issued the first copy of the American Eagle. It was a six-column folio weekly paper and was Democratic in politics. Mr. Comingore continued to publish this paper until 1874, when it was abandoned. Its veteran editor had published this paper twenty-six years and the True American for a period of about thirty-five years.

Judge T. B. Buskirk purchased a newspaper outfit and on July 31, 1872, began publishing the Paoli News, which he continued to publish until 1879. In that year he sold the paper to John L. Meginity, who published it for about ten years. After that the paper was edited for a few years by David J. Murr and later by James M. Compton. About 1895 Major John R. Simpson purchased the paper and published it until April, 1906, when he sold the plant to the present owners, L. O. Miller and Bayless Harvey, who have since and are at this time publishing it. The Paoli News since its beginning in 1872 has been the Democratic organ of the county. It is at present a seven-column folio and is published weekly.

For the past few years a Democratic paper, the Springs Valley Herald, has been published by W. C. Gruber. It is a six-column weekly paper.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF OWEN COUNTY

OWEN COUNTY is one of the oldest counties in the State, having been organized by an act of the General Assembly, approved December the 21st, 1818, and was in force from the date of its passage.

The county was originally a part of Knox county and in that jurisdiction. The first marriage license issued in this county was from Vincennes, and in the division of territory into counties it was so divided that Greene county came between Knox and Owen.

Owen county is bounded on the east by Morgan and Monroe counties, south by Greene, west by Clay and north by Putnam.

That the White river valley had been a favorite place of abode for men in pre-historic times is in evidence by the existence of numerous mounds in the valley and along White river, along the other streams of the county and in close proximity to large springs, and wherever a sufficient supply of water could be reached are found these mounds, with other unmistakable evidences of a large population, whose character and kindred is shrouded in impenetrable darkness. Quite a number of large mounds and a great many small ones have been discovered in close proximity to White river. Most of the smaller ones, owing to the cultivation of the land upon which they stood, have been leveled with the plowshare and other implements of farm husbandry, so that their existence is no longer in evidence. Many others still exist which bear testimony of a race extinct many centuries ago, but have left evidence of their intelligence in the manufacturing of stone implements, pottery and polished flints found in these rude monuments of their toil and handiwork. In many other of these mounds have been found large deposits of human bones and ornaments to adorn and embellish the person, indicating clearly that some of these structures were erected for the resting places of their dead. In others the evidence of fire is found, charred and burnt bones having been found in great quantities in some of the larger mounds, indicating that these were religious or sacrificial mounds. In most instances these mounds were scattered over a wide stretch of country, without any reference to proximity to each other. In other instances they were built together, something like the houses in a village, but irregularly located, but having the appearance of human habitations and constructed for defense in case of an attack. In some parts of this county flint arrow and spear points and battle axes of stone, all highly polished, have been found in great quantities, indicating a bloody conflict between contending races, but of which we know nothing, only as we have learned from the evidence which they left on their fields of strife and carnage. Many burial places of these pre-historic people have been uncovered. The bones differ in shape. Of what apparently appears to be the oldest remains the bones of the extremities are somewhat curved, indicating that they were an agricultural people and engaged in the pursuits of labor of some character—a people who worked with heavy tools of some character, who bore heavy burdens, as is shown by the heavy stones transported a considerable distance, of which are constructed vaults and other receptacles for the burial of their dead. This first people seem to have gathered the bones of their dead, most likely on particular occasions to celebrate some past event, carefully cleaned the remains and then securely deposited them in large quantities together in some vaults covered with stone and the stone covered with large quantities of dirt. Some of these stones must have been transported from the hill country, as none of their kind is found in the vicinity where these vaults were constructed. This people seem to have been peaceful and inured to labor. A second class and different race of people succeeded this first. The bones of the second race are straight, thus indicating a race of hunters and warriors, and most likely this second class conquered the first, as these subsequent inhabitants occupied these mounds and with different habits in the burial of the dead. The skeletons of this second people are found whole, sometimes two or three buried together, sometimes twenty or thirty, or even a larger number buried together in a circle, with the feet toward the center and their heads outward, and covered with earth.

The Indians, our immediate predecessors, came next as occupants of this country, but they have no knowledge or traditions with reference to the people who preceded them. They knew no more of them than we, who only read their history in the mounds, bones and implements of flint, stone and rude pottery. So perish men and nations from the face of the earth. And who can say that, with all our boasted civilization, we, too, may not pass into oblivion, as the ages progress, as generations come and go on the waves of time and as the intellect and the inventive genius and power of man develops, that a thousand years or more hence a race of people may possess these lands who, upon unearthing some of our implements and habitations we think so complete and so admirable, will wonder how a people so ignorant and barbarous could have lived. As the Mound Builder walked and carried his heavy burdens on his flattened head and on his bended back, as the later Indian enjoyed his pony and paddled his own canoe, as we of the present age have our various kinds of steam machinery, our railroads, our steamships, telegraphs, wire and wireless telephones and many other conveniences and comforts, so the coming generations may surpass us—but in what, and what shall their achievements be, who shall say?

The inhabitants of Owen county are noted for intelligence, sobriety (not a saloon in the county), hospitality and high intellectual and social attainments. Some of the finest church buildings in the State are found in this county. School houses are ample and sufficient in every township, and education is one of special care, and of which the citizens have an eye single. It is a notable fact, that Owen county, in proportion to its population, will compare favorably with any other county in the State for a high class of teachers educated in this county and gone into different parts of the country to practice their profession. The people are home-loving and law-abiding; we have less litigation than in any of our neighboring counties, and if it were not for the cases coming here on change of venue from other counties around, our courts would have much more leisure and the legal fraternity would find it much to their interest to find some other pursuits in life. Go into any part of Owen county where you will, and you will find an industrious, thriving, generous, hospitable people who will open their doors and give you of the best they have with a pleasant welcome, which cheers the heart and sweetens the homeliest fare. Owen county can show as many handsome, intelligent girls to the square mile as any other county in Indiana, who can get up a "square meal" in first-class style at short notice, and then entertain their company in the parlor with music and intellectual and cultured conversation. And the boys are not behind their fair sisters. They can plow a straight furrow, plant, cultivate and harvest the crops, make rails and build fences, and then analyze the soil they till, tell you the chemical constituents of the grains and grasses they grow, write you an intelligent article on almost any subject and if asked, solve you a problem in algebra.

The territory of which Owen county is a part originally belonged to the Miami, Potawatomie, Delaware and Eel River tribes of Indians and was ceded to the whites by the chiefs of these tribes by the treaty of Fort Wayne, September 30, 1809. Owen county was settled first by the whites in 1816, and for a number of years subsequent to that time large numbers of Indians gained their subsistence by hunting and fishing—a veritable paradise for the hunter. With very little trouble and in a very short time, the early settler could supply the inmates of his cabin with an abundance of the finest bear meat, venison, wild turkey, and his gig or fish spear, as true to his aim as the needle to the pole, as sure in the water as his unerring rifle on land; he could quickly take all the fish he wanted, taking his choice as to size and kind. Philip Hart with his family was the first white settler in Owen county. Came in October, 1816, and built his cabin where Spencer is located. Other families followed in quick succession and settled in and around Spencer, and ere long a very considerable settlement located in the neighborhood of Philip Hart. And this was the beginning of civilization in Owen county.

The next most important matter for these newcomers to consider was the organization of the county and the location of the seat of justice or the county seat. There was considerable controversy over this question, but the Hart neighborhood being the largest, their voice prevailed and the name Spencer was adopted.

Spencer is a thriving little city, situated on the west bank of the west fork of White river, fifty-three miles southwest of Indianapolis. The United States census of 1910 shows it to have a population of 2,150. The Indianapolis and Vincennes division of the Vandalla railroad passes through the city, which gives first-class accommodations to the traveling public. Spencer is situated in a valley, beautifully located, and has the reputation of being one of the prettiest cities in the State. It is surrounded with majestic hills on all sides, with scenery and a combination of natural views not often seen, and the "Narrows" above and below the city are fine resorts for boating. Boon's Cave, McCormick's Creek, the Falls of Cataract and many other places are popular resorts for many pleasure seekers and the weary in search of rest.

"Lovely village of the plain,

Where smiling spring its earliest visit paid,
And parting summer's lingering blooms delayed."

The county was named Owen, in memory of Major Abraham Owen, a gallant Kentucky officer who fell in the battle of Tippecanoe and the county seat was named Spencer in honor of Captain Spire Spencer, another gallant Kentucky officer, who was killed in the battle of Tippecanoe.

EARLY EVENTS.

The first wedding recorded in Owen county, marriage record No. 1, P 1, was Pitman Chance to Nancy Hicks, October 4, 1819. The first white child born in Owen County was John R. K. Dunn,

December 12, 1817. The first court was held in the county March 1, 1818, at the house of John Dunn, Honorable Amory Kinney, President Judge; Hugh Barnes and Joseph Freeland, Associate Judges; John R. Freeland, Clerk; Andrew Evans, Sheriff; John F. Ross, Prosecutor for the State. John Mitchell, Thomas McNaught and John Milner were the first county commissioners. John Bartholomew was the first county treasurer. There were but three townships at the time of the organization of the county, and the western boundary line of Owen was the eastern boundary of Vigo county. The first taxes levied were in 1819, as follows:

FOR STATE PURPOSES.

On first rate lands $1.00 on each 100 acres.

On second rate lands 87½ cents on each 100 acres.

On third rate lands 62½ cents on each 100 acres.
And on bond servants $3.00.

FOR COUNTY PURPOSES.

On first rate lands 50 cents on each 100 acres.

On second rate lands 43½ cents on each 100 acres.

On third rate lands 31½ cents on each 100 acres.
And on horses 37½ cents per head.

The salaries for the following county officers for the year 1819 were allowed by the board of commissioners as follows:

| | |
|---|---------|
| John R. Freeland, County Clerk..... | $25.00 |
| Andrew Evans, Sheriff | 22.00 |
| William Alexander, Lister (Assessor)..... | 20.00 |

COURT HOUSE ERECTED.

The board of commissioners at its September term, 1819, made an order for the erection of a temple of justice, and the specifications as they appear on the ancient record of these worthy officials are as follows: "A double log house, one room to be 20 feet square, the other 16x20, with a passage between 12 feet wide, all to be covered under one roof, the logs to face 8x12 inches, the story 10 feet high, foundation to be raised 6 inches above the ground, on rock, to be covered with a good clapboard roof, a puncheon floor to be laid in each, each room to be chinked and daubed on the outside, one door and one window in each room, the shutters to be made of plank and hung on iron hinges." Here was the beginning of reckless extravagance and a waste of the people's money. No such thing had ever been heard of in this county as doors on iron hinges. The hinges of these sturdy pioneers upon which the doors were hung were hinges made of wood, and a wooden latch with a wooden catch fastened to the door case into which the latch dropped, and this locked the door, which could only be unlocked by a member of the family on the inside of the cabin. But in order that the door might be unlocked from the outside, a gimlet hole was bored through the door about 5 or 6 inches above the latch, a string was then attached to the latch and pushed through the gimlet hole and hung down on the outside, and by pulling the string, the latch raised and the door opened. At night when the inmates retired, the string was pulled in and the door was locked. Many who wished to make themselves more secure, bored an auger hole at a proper angle into the door casing which was most usually a hewed log or puncheon, and then a wooden pin inserted, which clamped the edge of the door to the puncheon or door casing. This was thought to be ample security by the inmates as against intruders; the pin serving as a kind of time lock to the latch, and was regarded a burglar-proof protection. The court house was to be finished in the following May, 1820. It was the first house built where the town of Spencer now stands. That unique and primeval structure still stands where it was built, on lot 98 at the southeast corner of the public square. The logs have been weatherboarded on the outside, and the building has been used for a residence for many years.

At the May term of the commissioners' court, among the orders and allowances made by the board at said term was an allowance made to John Dunn, for $9.87½ for whisky, furnished the county on the day of the sale of town lots in the town of Spencer. At the special session of the board, held August the 11th, 1820, it was ordered that a jail be built on the public square, of the following dimensions: To be 18x36 feet, the timber to be of oak, black walnut, locust or coffee-nut; the logs to be hewn one foot square for walls, floors and ceiling. At the November term, 1820, Lewis Noel was allowed $338.60 for building the jail, and as the winter was near by and the weather was getting cold, Daniel Harris was appointed to build a chimney to the new court house. The specifications provided that it should be built of "cat and clay," the fireplace to be eight feet wide, back and jambs to be of rock as high as the mantel. Thomas Allen was allowed $7.50 for whisky furnished the county at the second sale of lots in the town of Spencer. Whisky seems to have been a necessity for the sale of lots. The new brick court house, and the one that supplanted the temple of 1819, was built in 1825. This building accommodated the courts and county officers until 1910, when on May 4, 1910, Governor Thomas R. Marshall delivered the address at the laying of the corner stone of the new court house. This is one of the handsomest and most gracefully arranged court houses in Indiana. Built out of Bedford limestone, it is a model of perfection and a temple of beauty.

At said November term, 1820, the board of commissioners ordered a public well dug in the court house square of sufficient depth to afford plenty of water, to be well walled with stone, to be provided with a sweep and a bucket with iron bands. At this session it was ordered that the timber on the public square in Spencer be cleared off; all trees under six inches in diameter to be grubbed up, and all six inches and over to be cut not more than six inches above the ground; brush, chips and chunks, with the timber brush and rubbish to be taken off and the square made clear of all obstructions. Philip Hodges was awarded the contract for $25.00. Owen county, in its primeval state, was one of the finest timbered counties in Indiana. Black walnut, yellow poplar, white oak, bur oak, sugar, ash and other timber, had grown to an enormous size, and to clear the land was no small task, and by the time the farms were cleared and made ready for cultivation most of the pioneers had served their day and generation and their children had taken their places.

The roads were irregular, commenced anywhere and ran nowhere. The road leading toward Terre Haute was ordered opened, all brush to be cleared away, and the road made ten feet wide. Now the timber of the county is practically gone, the highways are constructed from thirty to forty feet wide, and every road in the county of any consequence is macadamized with gravel or crushed stone nine to twelve inches deep.

At the August session of 1820, of the board of commissioners the first road tax was levied and it is as follows:

On first rate land $1.50 on each 100 acres.

On second rate land $1.30 on each 100 acres.

On third rate land 93 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents on each 100 acres.

In a sparsely settled county such as Owen the road tax was a mere bagatelle, and these hardy yeomen had to rely on their individual efforts for the construction of these primitive highways. Church service and the education of the children were matters of too much importance to be overlooked. The first "meeting house" in Spencer was built in 1824. This church house was built of logs with clapboard roof, puncheon floor, and hewed puncheons for seats. Hugh Barnes was the first preacher. He was a man of sterling qualities of head and heart and well suited to minister to his frontier congregation. This church house was also used for a school house, in which the children were taught the rudiments of an education.

By an act of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, approved February 1, 1834, to "Regulate the mode of doing county business in this State," it was provided "that in each of the counties of Harrison, Orange, Monroe, Parke, Hendricks, Johnson, Putnam, Owen, Clay, Spencer and Greene, the qualified justices of the peace of said counties shall constitute a board of commissioners in their respective counties." Under this act, Delana R. Eckels became a member of the board of commissioners of Owen county. In after years he became one of the most eminent lawyers in Indiana. He was possessed of an analytical mind and a keen and powerful intellect. He was circuit judge from 1864 to 1870 in a judicial district of eight counties of which Owen was one. President Buchanan appointed him Chief Justice of the Territory of Utah, and he discharged the duties of that high office during that administration with distinguished ability.

OWEN COUNTY BAR.

The names of the attorneys living in Owen county in active practice are as follows:

Spencer—Inman H. Fowler, David E. Beem, Willis Hickam, John L. Duncan, Thomas G. Spangler, Homer Elliott, James R. Miller, Herbert A. Rundell and Hubert Hickam.

Gosport—J. C. Henderickson.

Coal City—Henry J. Hochstetler.

The attorneys' roster in this county contains the names of attorneys who practiced law here, and for ability was one of the most distinguished bars in Indiana. We copy from the record the following:

Isaac Blackford, Terre Haute; Elisha M. Huntington, Terre Haute; Joseph A. Wright, Bloomington; John Cowgill, Spencer; George B. Tingle, Spencer; John H. Ross, Vincennes; Samuel P. Judah, Vincennes; Randall Crawford, New Albany; James M. Hanna, Sullivan; Cyrus M. Allen, Vincennes; Joseph E. McDonald, Indianapolis; John A. Matson, Greencastle; Moses Huett, Greencastle; John A. Watts, Bloomington; William T. Otto, New Albany; Tilghman A. Howard, Rockville; Daniel McClure, Martinsville; William D. Fairly, Spencer; Thomas F. G. Adams, Spencer; Willis A. Gorman, Bloomington; Isaac N. Pierce, Terre Haute; David McDonald, Bloomington; John T. Gunn, Sullivan; Delana E. Williamson, Greencastle; Delana R. Eckels, Spencer; Craven P. Hester, Bloomington; George G. Dunn, Bedford; James Hughes, Bloomington; James S. Hester, Bloomington; Samuel H. Buskirk, Bloomington; George A. Buskirk, Bloomington; Edward C. Buskirk, Bloomington; John P. Usher, Terre Haute; Hugh L. Livingston, Bloomfield; Hugh O'Neal, Indianapolis; Henry Secrest, Spencer; Basil Champer, Spencer; Richard W. Thompson, Terre Haute; Paris C. Dunning, Bloomington; Allen T. Rose, Spencer; Solomon Claypool, Greencastle; George W. Wiltse, Bowling Green; Daniel W. Voorhees, Terre Haute; Moses F. Dunn, Bedford; Aden G.

Cavins, Bloomfield; Elijah H. C. Cavins, Bloomfield; Thomas R. Cobb, Vincennes; Newton F. Malott, Vincennes; Cyrus F. McNutt, Martinsville; George W. Grubbs, Martinsville; Courtland C. Matson, Greencastle; William R. Harrison, Martinsville; James H. Jordan, Martinsville; Milton H. Parks, Martinsville; William S. Shirley, Martinsville; William W. Carter, Brazil; Silas E. Coffey, Brazil; Samuel W. Curtis, Brazil; George A. Knight, Brazil; Willis G. Neff, Sullivan; James B. Smiley, Greencastle; William Mack, Bloomfield; Albert G. Porter, Indianapolis; Alfred Ennis, Martinsville; George W. Teter, Bowling Green; William E. Taylor, Spencer; John H. Martin, Spencer; Wiley E. Dittmore, Spencer; Alfred Dyar, Spencer; Basil Meek, Spencer; Robert W. Miers, Bloomington; James B. Wilson, Bloomington; John R. East, Bloomington; Rufus East, Bloomington; Joseph E. Henley, Bloomington; John F. Rejester, Bloomington; Cyrus E. Davis, Bloomfield; William M. Franklin, Spencer; John W. Buskirk, Bloomington; Eli K. Millen, Bloomington; George Munson, Bedford; Addison L. Daggy, Greencastle; George W. Friedley, Bedford; Harmon Friedley, Bloomington; James B. Mulky, Bloomington; Addison C. Harris, Indianapolis; Morton C. Hunter, Bloomington; Samuel O. Pickens, Spencer; William A. Pickens, Spencer, and John C. Robinson, Spencer. Many of these attorneys became eminent in their profession, in the halls of legislation, on the bench and in the counsels of the nation. It is questionable whether a greater array of legal ability could be found at the bar in any other county in Indiana.

JUDICIARY.

James Hughes was elected circuit judge and served until 1856, when he was elected to Congress. The judicial district was a large one, being composed of eight counties, as follows: Morgan, Putnam, Clay, Vigo, Sullivan, Greene, Monroe and Owen. The district for many years was known as the 15th. James M. Hanna, of Sullivan county, was elected in 1856 to fill the judgeship made vacant by the resignation of Judge Hughes. Judge Hanna occupied the circuit court bench until 1858, when he was appointed by Governor Willard to fill a vacancy on the supreme bench, caused by the resignation of Judge Samuel B. Gookins, of Terre Haute. The Governor then appointed Solomon Claypool, of Terre Haute, judge to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge Hanna. Judge Claypool served under his appointment until the election in 1858, when he was elected. He served until 1864, at which time Delana R. Eckels, of Putnam county, was elected and served until 1870, when William M. Franklin, of Owen county, was elected, and served until 1876, at which election John C. Robinson was elected and served until 1882, when Ambrose M. Cuning, of Morgan, was elected and served until 1888. George W. Grubbs, of Morgan, was then elected and served until 1902, at which time Milton H. Parks, of Morgan, was elected. He served about four years and died, and Governor Durbin appointed Joseph W. Williams, of Owen, to fill the vacancy. He held the court under his appointment from April, 1904, until the election in 1906, at which election he was elected.

The old 15th district had been divided and subdivided until all that was left of it was Morgan and Owen, and in 1911 the General Assembly again subdivided the district, creating a circuit in Morgan and creating the 10th Judicial Circuit out of Owen and Monroe. Judge James B. Wilson was the presiding judge in Monroe when it was united with Owen and he took the bench here September 4, 1911, and held the court until November, 1914, when Judge Robert W. Miers, judge-elect, took the bench and is now judge of the 10th Judicial Circuit. Many of these gentlemen are among the most eminent lawyers in the State. Judge Hanna made a fine reputation as a jurist while on the supreme bench; Judge Claypool was one of the able attorneys at the Indianapolis bar; Judge Eckels distinguished himself as chief justice of Utah; Judge Franklin was on the Supreme Court Commission for a number of years and proved himself eminent as a jurist; Judge John C. Robinson was one of the brightest lawyers in the State, and his reputation as a jurist was statewide, and he probably had no superior on the bench in Indiana at the time he occupied the bench. All these judges who were elected by a vote in Owen were Democrats, with the exception of Judge Grubbs and Judge Williams. Judge Wilson is a Republican, but he was elected in the judicial district of Lawrence and Monroe. But they all discharged the duties of the high office which they held faithfully, honestly and honorably, and no taint, spot or blemish ever attached to their judicial ermine.

THE COUNTY PRESS.

The first newspaper published in Owen county was about 1842 or 1843, called the Gospport Chronicle. John R. Kerr was the editor. It was devoted to foreign, State and home news, and was a four-column folio. About the year 1846 Joseph Reed established an office and began the publication of a newspaper, neutral in politics, which he named the Western Chronicle. He did not succeed very well, and some time in the year 1847 or 1848 the paper passed into the hands of William M. Franklin and William E. Taylor, both rising young lawyers and staunch Democrats. They changed the name of the paper to the Republican and made it a Democratic newspaper and the organ of the county Democracy. They sold the paper to a Greene county party after they had published it for about a year, and the office was moved to Greene county. About 1850 Madison H. White commenced the publication of a newspaper at Spencer, called the Busy World. This paper suspended after a publication of about two years for lack of patronage. Its politics leaned to the Whig party. The National Weekly Guard was published about 1853 or 1854—David L. Lusk editor and proprietor, and was Democratic in politics. This paper was published at Spencer for about two years, when he removed his press and material to Shawneetown, Ill. John F. Harner came to Spencer in September, 1858, and began the publication of the Owen County Journal. Mr. Harner was a practical printer as well as an expert engraver in wood. He was a man of fine intelligence, a good writer, and had worked in the Louisville Journal office for many years. The paper was well conducted and was well received and well patronized by the reading public. In fact, it was the first real newspaper the county had ever had. The Democrats at Spencer formed a stock company and bought the Journal from Mr. Harner, and it became a Democratic newspaper and the organ of the Owen County Democracy, with James W. Archer installed editor, and he edited and conducted the Journal through the presidential campaign of 1860 and advocated the election of Stephen A. Douglas to the presidency. Jacob V. Wolf and John C. Robinson afterward occupied the editorial chair, and it was finally sold to Mr. Harner, the first owner. He continued it as the organ of the Democratic party in Owen county until the fall of 1874, when he sold and transferred the office to Mr. John Wayland of Batavia, Ohio. He was thoroughly saturated with Democratic principles, and the Journal continued the organ of the Owen County Democracy and was more successful, financially and otherwise, than it had ever been before. Mr. Wayland was a good editor and his wife was a brilliant writer, and during his ownership the Owen County Journal was deservedly popular. Mr. Wayland sold the Journal to Messrs. Walker Schell and Luther H. Smith. This partnership was of short duration. Smith purchased the Schell interest. Luther H. Smith was not a printer and put his brother, George E. Smith, in the office in charge of the Journal. It was finally sold by Smith and passed into the hands of the Republicans, and has ever since and now is the organ of the Republican party in Owen county.

neutral in politics. This newspaper in Owen county had a brief existence, for in January, 1875, the press with all its material was moved to Bloomfield, Ind.

In the year 1879 James K. Smith started a little paper in Spencer which he called the Free Press. Mr. Smith was a brother of Luther H. and George E., eccentric and radical in his opinions and having no qualifications for the newspaper business, he soon merged his Free Press into his brother's paper, the Owen County Journal, and the two passed together into the hands of the Republicans.

In 1865 Clarence Williams came to Spencer with a press and some material and started the publication of a newspaper and called it the Owen County Union. In a short time he sold out to Joel A. Coffey and David E. Beem, who continued its publication. It was Republican. In 1867 they sold the press, material and paper to S. H. Mathes and in 1868 he sold a half interest to Henry C. Painter. They removed the office to Gosport and started the Gosport Independent. Mathes shortly after sold his interest to Charles L. Yockey and the office was soon sold and moved to Bloomington. In politics the paper was Republican as long as it remained in this county.

In 1872 Walter Connelly and Charles L. Yockey brought an office from Bedford, Ind., and commenced the publication of the Owen County News, independent in politics. This paper took an active part in politics during the Grange movement in Owen county in 1874. A part of the Grange movement made up a ticket for county officers, which they called the Grange ticket, composed of candidates from all the political parties, which was run in opposition to the regular Democratic ticket. The Owen County News was a supporter of the Grange ticket, which was badly defeated, and the introduction of this political movement killed the Grange organization in Owen county. These owners sold the paper to O. M. Howard, who continued the publication as an independent local newspaper until some time during the year 1875, when he sold out to S. H. H. Mathes. He changed the politics of the paper to a straightout Republican paper and took an active part in the presidential canvass of 1876. His experiment was a financial disaster and he sold out to O. M. Howard, who immediately changed the name of the paper to the Democrat, and the name of the paper was a true index of its politics. The paper has been sold and bought several times, but ever since 1876, and now is, the standard-bearer of the Democratic party in "Sweet Owen."

In September, 1879, William B. Harris brought an office to Spencer and commenced the publication of a newspaper which he called the Owen County People, Republican in politics. In 1881 he sold out to M. M. Havens, who changed the name to Spencer Republican. In 1882 the paper was enlarged and leased to S. H. H. Mathes, who in 1883 bought it and continued the publication as the Republican organ in Owen county. This paper went out of existence some years ago.

On December 13, 1913, the Owen Leader made its appearance. It is a progressive newspaper and advocates the principles of the Progressive party in this county. It is published in Spencer. Carl Anderson is the proprietor and editor. The mechanical execution is good, it is well patronized and the editorial department is well conducted.

The Gospport Reporter, published at Gospport, has been in existence for a number of years. It has had a diversity of owners and editors. It was started as a Republican paper; in 1912 it became Progressive, and in 1914 it was Republican. It recently changed ownership and will probably be independent. Charles A. Wampler is the present owner and editor.

There are then four political newspapers published in the county—three published at Spencer, the Democrat, the Owen County Journal and the Owen Leader; one at Gospport, the Gospport Reporter.

SCHOOLS.

The first schools in Spencer were held in the log church and in the log court house. The first teachers were James Galletly and Isaac Heaton. Mr. Galletly taught a school in Spencer about the year 1821 and Mr. Heaton about 1825. The schools in Owen county, as in nearly all the counties in the State, were primitive. But the schools in this county would compare favorably with the schools in other parts of the State, all being conducted alike and with the same meager course of study. The methods of teaching then were entirely at variance with the scientific system adopted now. Teachers then were not educated to teach as now. The normal schools have done a wonderful work in preparing the teacher for the school room. Owen county has always taken a lively interest in her schools. The curriculum of former years consisted of reading, writing, geography, grammar and arithmetic. In many instances grammar was condemned as being useless and a waste of time of the pupil. But we have long since passed that period of crude notions as to what constitutes education, and the boy or girl who passes through the high school in Owen county, if he or she has been diligent and faithful, is well educated and well prepared for the duties of life. Owen county is justly proud of her common school systems; her school houses and their comfort and conveniences; her six high school buildings, five of which have been erected in the last three or four years. An additional high school building was erected in Spencer during the year 1914 at a cost of $40,000. This is a modern building in every respect and one of the most beautiful buildings in the State.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF PARKE COUNTY

From the Parke County Centennial Memorial, 1916

PARKE COUNTY at the time of its organization included most of its present 440 square miles and all of Vermilion county, west of it. In common with other portions of the Hoosier State, Parke county had her pioneers, giants in stature and muscle, lions in courage to do and dare, and possessed of sublime patience to endure the hardships and privations of the early settlers of a forest frontier. On the last day of the legislative session of 1820-21, January 9, 1821, an act was passed for the foundation of a new county north of Vigo, and Parke county thus came into existence. The county was named in honor of Benjamin Parke, major in the Tippecanoe campaign, first Territorial Representative in Congress and U. S. District Judge.

Governor Jonathan Jennings appointed James Barnes of Owen county, Richard Palmer of Daviess, George Ewing of Knox, Andrew Wilkins of Sullivan and John M. Coleman of Vigo commissioners to "convene at the home of Samuel Blair, in the said county of Parke, on the third Monday of February, 1822, to fix a seat of justice, to be moved as the court may direct, until a permanent seat of justice is established." The first court was held at Roseville, which town did not long hold the county seat, for that distinction was enjoyed by both Armiesburg and Montezuma before the location of the permanent seat at Rockville. As this was in 1822, none of these other places could have held the honor very long. The history of the location of the county seat at Rockville brings to mind some picturesque scenes in our early history. General Joseph Orr, General Arthur Patterson and Colonel Thomas Smith had been appointed commissioners to locate a permanent county seat. They came to the county in 1824 and began to view eligible sites for this purpose. The settlers at Ray's Tavern, as Rockville was then known, invited them to come before making their decision. "On a gloomy day, about the 1st of February," said Beadle, "the commissioners, wet and muddy, reached the hospitable tavern of Andrew Ray and were royally entertained for those times. What personal inducement was offered we cannot guess, but by breakfast time this spot was chosen. The three officials and five male citizens emptied a bottle of old whisky, broke the bottle on the big rock at the highest point of the site, and baptized the town of Rockville, county seat."

Parke county started its career with the picturesque election of 1821. The Jackson men, or Democrats, won the first election, and they retained their majority with the exception of an office here and there, for about fifteen years after the organization of the county. By that time immigration had brought a large Whig element, principally Quakers, into the politics and from 1836 to 1856 the county was sometimes Whig and sometimes Democratic in the various elections. It is probable that the influence of Tilghman A. Howard and Joseph A. Wright as leaders of the Democratic party, not only in Parke county, but in the State, served to offset a Whig immigration that otherwise would have controlled the county at all times. Here, as everywhere in the State, the Democrats took pride in every honor that came to these two men. Howard was elected to Congress, was appointed by President Jackson to settle the claims to Indian lands now embracing the city of Chicago, was the Democratic candidate for Senator in 1839, being defeated by only one vote. The next year he twice headed the Democratic ticket: as candidate for Governor in August and elector-at-large in November. He died as minister to negotiate with the republic of Texas for its admission into the Union. Joseph A. Wright, after being repeatedly elected to Congress, was elected Governor in 1849. He was re-elected to this high office, being the last man in Indiana elected for two terms; was appointed minister to Berlin, and upon his return was appointed United States Senator. Judge William P. Bryant was appointed Chief Justice of Oregon. John G. Davis, after serving twenty years as County Clerk, was elected and re-elected to Congress, and William Nofsinger was elected Treasurer of State.

In 1855 came the complete overthrow of the Democratic party in Parke county. The repeal of the Missouri Compromise and passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act brought the new Republican party to the front and they made a clean sweep of all county offices, except Treasurer, to which John R. Miller (John R. Miller was Dick Miller's uncle) was elected, and then re-elected, the last Democrat to carry the county until twenty years afterward, when John T. Collings and O. P. Brown were elected Commissioners. For forty years, from 1856 to 1896, no Democrat represented Parke county in the Legislature. "Silver Dick" Miller broke the record in 1896 and George W. Spencer was elected in 1912, so that during a period of sixty years only two Democrats had the honor of representing their county.

The politics of Parke county since the war presents many interesting features, many incidents worthy of note, and would make a volume if everything connected with that period was duly considered. It should be remembered that during the war the Republican party was known as the Union party and as such embraced hundreds of "War Democrats," not to mention the many Democrats who became Republicans on the issues arising immediately before and during the war. The Union majority, therefore, was overwhelming.

It was not until 1870 that the first break in the Republican lines came, although as early as 1868 such Republicans as Samuel T. Catlin, Joseph L. Boyd, Captain John T. Campbell and others began to distrust their party on the money question. The Republican State platform that year declared in favor of the greenback, but there was an element opposed to the platform declaration. By 1870 there was a decided deflection from the Republicans. That year John S. Dare, who had been a Republican, and George W. Collins established the Parke County News, which was an advocate of greenback currency. Captain John T. Campbell, who had been County Treasurer, led the revolt by becoming a candidate for the State Senate. He was defeated, but Moses T. Dunn, the Republican candidate for Congress, was defeated by Daniel W. Voorhees, the loss of Greenback Republicans being the principal cause.

In the Greeley campaign of 1872 the Republicans had a walkaway, despite the fact that the Democratic candidate had for years been the idol of the radical Republicans of the county: The campaign was a hot one. The Republicans had one or two enormous torchlight processions and the Democrats one rousing rally when Voorhees spoke in the court house yard. Many of the Greenbackers voted for Greeley, but many more Democrats did not.

By 1874 the Greenback party had grown considerably. That year nominations were made for county offices and on some of the candidates the Democrats and Greenbackers united. Dr. Harrison J. Rice of Rockville was Democratic candidate for Congress, but was defeated. The Greenbackers were mostly recruited from the Republicans, the defection from the Democrats being slight in comparison.

In the meantime the mines had been opened at Sand Creek, and a large increase in the vote resulted. While the miners were not all Republicans, that party gained almost as many from the influx of miners as it lost to the Greenbackers, but twenty or twenty-five years after the war Parke county was, on a basis of its citizenship as it existed before and during the war, probably Democratic, for at that time on the issues of the tariff and currency many of the Democrats had returned to their party and the prohibition movement had taken from the Democrats many of their Quaker voters, who ultimately became Democrats, and during the transition period exerted a great influence on the young men of the county, who from independent voters became Democrats. But new mining fields were developed, and at one time there were over two hundred negro voters in the county, all Republicans. From the miners and the enfranchisement of the negroes the Republicans recruited enough to hold the county most of the time, in spite of the losses mentioned.

The memorable campaign of 1876 has no parallel in our political history save the equally spectacular campaign twenty years later. It was called the "Bloody Shirt Campaign." Thomas N. Rice was a candidate for the Republican congressional nomination, but lost to Morton C. Hunter. Noval W. Cummings was a candidate for Treasurer of State, and likewise lost. Although the State went Democratic, Parke's Republican ticket was elected.

In 1878 the Republicans suffered their first setback after the Civil War period. The contest started in a three-cornered fight, but a fusion was afterward partially effected. Morton C. Hunter, Republican; A. J. Hostetler, Democrat, and Henry A. White, Greenbacker, were candidates for Congress and Hostetler won in spite of the third party candidate. O. P. Brown and John D. Collings, Democrats, were elected Commissioners, and George W. Collings, Democrat, defeated John H. Burford of Montgomery county for Prosecuting Attorney. It was known that Daniel W. Voorhees would be the Democratic candidate for United States Senator, as he had already been appointed to the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Morton, so the loss of both Senator and Representative in Parke county was a serious one, indeed, for the Republicans. The campaign was wholly devoid of pyrotechnics, and few speeches were made by prominent men of either party.

In 1880 Republican enthusiasm was somewhat revived, but compared with 1876 it was very mild. This was the last year the State voted in October. In Parke county the campaign was livened up somewhat by a new Democratic paper, The Signal, edited by A. J. Cunningham, who came from Crawfordsville, where he was known by the name of "the raw beef editor." He dealt largely in personal attacks on the Republican candidates, hurting Democracy, and the entire Republican ticket was elected by a greatly increased vote.

The campaign of 1882 was known as the "Lamb Campaign" owing to the advent of John E. Lamb of Terre Haute, the brilliant young protégé of Senator Voorhees. Mr. Lamb was nominated for Congress at Rockville where the convention was held in Parke county's beautiful new court house, Mr. Lamb being elected in spite of his youth. R. C. McWilliams was nominated for Senator and John H. Beadle for Representative. The former withdrew in favor of Claude Matthews of Vermillion county and the latter withdrew in favor of Samuel T. Catlin, but at the election Mr. Catlin was defeated by William Knowles, but by eight votes only!

In the campaign of 1884 Mr. Lamb was defeated by a small margin, while the State went Democratic.

In 1886 the State was re-districted and Sullivan county was put with Parke and Warren taken out, making, as was supposed, a safely Democratic district. However, John E. Lamb had wobbled somewhat on the tariff question. The "John E. Lamb Protective Tariff Club" had been organized in Terre Haute, which did not look at all good to the more than one thousand Free Traders who had supported him, and he was defeated. The Democrats, however, elected Samuel T. Catlin Auditor, a defeat which utterly demoralized the Republicans.

In 1888 Dr. W. H. Gillum of Parke was a candidate for Congress, his opponent being Judge McNutt of Terre Haute. The contest deadlocked the convention until the Parke county delegation, enraged by the unjust treatment accorded Dr. Gillum by the friends of Judge McNutt, threw their votes to E. V. Brookshire of Montgomery county, who was elected over James T. Johnson by a very close majority. The Democrats might have carried their whole ticket in 1890 had it not been for the fact that their apparent strength brought many rival candidates. The inevitable soreness followed, which lost the county ticket enough votes to defeat every candidate with the exception of Samuel T. Catlin, who received a majority of one hundred and eleven.

In 1892 the entire Republican county ticket was elected, but by small pluralities. The election of 1894 was not a landslide, but an avalanche. Many of the Democrats in Parke county were disgusted with the financial policy of the Cleveland administration, and never before were there so many on the poll books marked "D" who failed to vote.

The campaign in Parke county in 1896 was the most remarkable in the history of the county. This was the time of the first silver movement and the silver men dominated the campaign. Five Democrats or silver men were elected—"Silver" Dick Miller, for Representative; William Rawlings, Treasurer; C. R. Hanger, Sheriff; John Huxford and Henry A. Myers, Commissioners. The Democratic vote was increased 1,014 over the previous two years.

Previous to the beginning of 1898 it looked as if the Democrats might carry the election. The gold discoveries in the Klondike had not yet increased the volume of money to any great extent, and things were hardly better than in 1896, but the Spanish war came, and with it the Republican appeal to stand by the administration, which, with the impetus given business, made for Republican success.

In 1900 the Republicans were very active and the entire ticket was elected by a majority of 508. This was also the case in 1902 and 1904. At this election, in spite of large Republican pluralities, Mr. John S. McFaddin's vote for Judge was 2,804, 800 more than Parker's, while his opponent defeated him by but a single vote.

July 28, 1906, the Democratic county convention was held and the following ticket was nominated: Representative, Thomas Trueman; Auditor, James E. Elder; Treasurer, Marion Martin; Recorder, A. S. Russell; Sheriff, Alfred S. Boyd; Coroner, C. W. Overpeck. In this campaign the Republicans electioneered Democrats and thus the election was carried by them.

For the first time in eight years the Democrats evinced great enthusiasm in 1908. It was evident that the national convention would consider no other candidate but Bryan, which was very pleasing to the Parke county Democrats. At their county convention the nominations were as follows: Walter Fink, Representative; George L. Laney, Clerk; George W. Spencer, Treasurer; Guy Alden, Sheriff; Dr. C. W. Overpeck, Coroner, of which they elected the Clerk, Treasurer and Coroner. Both parties increased their vote over two years before, but the Republicans lost in relative strength.

The year 1910 brought the first real general success of the Democratic party in the State since 1892, a period of 18 years. The Parke county Democrats held their convention September 10, naming the following candidates: Representative, Fred W. Leatherman; Auditor, James E. Elder; Treasurer, George W. Spencer; Sheriff, Guy Alden; Recorder, Hugh Banta, which was defeated with the exception of Auditor and Treasurer.

In 1912 the Democrats nominated the following ticket: Geo. W. Spencer for Representative; Wm. E. Hawkins for Clerk; Harvey Rush for Treasurer; Charles Smith for Sheriff. Of these George W. Spencer and Harvey Rush were elected.

In 1914 the following were nominated:
 Representative—Fred Clark.
 Auditor—James E. Elder.
 Treasurer—J. Harvey Rush.

Sheriff—R. A. Connerly.

Recorder—Hugh Banta.

Of these only the Treasurer was elected.

Among the early Democrats who played a prominent part in the county affairs were: Austin M. Puett resided in the county from its earliest days to the Civil War, when he moved to Putnam county. Mr. Puett married a sister of Jos. A. Wright, and he was not only active but most aggressive in politics and threw all of his energy and enthusiasm into every fight waged by either General Howard or Governor Wright, who regarded him as the faithful and efficient follower he was. He was a leader in the practical work of every campaign, always fighting for the Democratic party, and also filled various public offices—Sheriff, Treasurer, Canal Trustee and State Senator.

When it comes to considering the men who influenced the public mind of Parke county in favor of the Democratic party after the war it is probable that John H. Beadle ranks first. As a journalist he had made a name for himself before returning to his old home at Rockville in 1879 when he became editor and proprietor of the Rockville Tribune. As western correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial he traveled over all the territories from the Missouri to the Pacific; later as southern correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette he made three tours of the South. From 1870 to 1880 he wrote three books on the West—“Life in Utah,” “The Undeveloped West,” and “Western Wilds.” Until the tariff became the leading issue he was a Republican, but being a Free Trader he could not honestly advocate a protective tariff. At first he attempted to convert his fellow Republicans, but only met with bitter opposition from the politicians of that party. His paper, the Rockville Tribune, however, was quoted widely, and its influence among young Republicans and men open to conviction in Parke county caused a break which ultimately brought to the Democratic party a type of men who greatly strengthened it. Among the young men influenced by Mr. Beadle was Isaac R. Strouse, who as local editor under Mr. Beadle and subsequently his partner, joined in the free trade propaganda, and finally made the Tribune a Democratic paper—the only paper of that faith which has survived in the county.

Mr. Beadle had no intellectual superior in all Indiana. He was an authority on a wide range of topics. He was a graduate of the University of Michigan, from which school he enlisted in the 31st Indiana Regiment. He was a fine Greek and Latin scholar and spoke several languages fluently. His wonderful memory enabled him to retain everything within the scope of his wide reading, and he was familiar with the history of every country in the world. It was fortunate, indeed, that the Democratic party in Parke county had such an advocate during the years when it was in a hopeless minority after the Civil War.

Dr. Harrison J. Rice was one of the leading Democrats of the county, being associated with Wright, Hendricks, Voorhees and McDonald. In 1874 he was Democratic candidate for Congress, but was defeated, although he made a splendid canvass.

Samuel D. Puett, Duncan Puett, as he was known to every man, woman and child in Parke county, was a striking figure in its annals. Upon his graduation from Asbury College in 1872 he entered the law office of Judge S. F. Maxwell and at once plunged into a legal and political career that made him famous. There being a hot campaign in progress and being the only lawyer in Parke county who was a Democrat he at once became the idol of his fellow Democrats, as well as their champion. He became the partner of Judge Maxwell and was associated with him until his death in 1877. For thirty years Duncan Puett was an active participant in the politics of Parke county, always attending the public meetings, caucuses of the party and making speeches, yet never holding any remunerative office. His death occurred in May, 1907.

Samuel T. Catlin was another well-known citizen. In what is known as “practical politics” he was regarded as a wise and far-sighted manager, both in county and State affairs. Acting with the Republican party on the issue of preserving the Union, he was one of the first to abandon that party when, in his opinion, it failed to fulfill its declared purposes. From 1868 to 1886 he acted with the independent faction called the “Greenbackers” and his popularity prompted his frequent nomination for office. In 1882 he was defeated for Legislature by the bare margin of eight votes. Four years later he was elected Auditor of the county in one of the most remarkable campaigns, and was re-elected on the Democratic ticket. Upon the expiration of his term he was chosen President of the Rockville National Bank, which position he held until his death, December 7, 1908.

The Democracy of Parke county can surely take pride in the record it has made in both State and county politics. In the days of Howard, Wright, Davis and Bryant it was unquestionably the foremost county in the State. As has been said, it furnished the leaders who fought the political battles of those days, and for thirty years when it was in a minority its faithful followers never faltered in their work of maintaining their organization and doing all they could, with no hope of reward in the way of office holding.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF PERRY COUNTY

PERRY COUNTY is one of the thirteen original counties which existed as the Territory of Indiana when admitted to Statehood, December 11, 1816, having been organized September 4, 1814, by an Act of the Territorial Legislature forming two new counties (Perry and Posey) out of Warrick and a part of Gibson. Official returns certified to by the clerks of all thirteen counties, and forwarded to the Legislature at their session beginning December 4, 1815, showed Indiana's population to be 63,897, of which Perry county contained 1,720, including 350 white males of twenty-one years and upward. Just how many of these, however, were adherents to that Democracy whose living representative was then Thomas Jefferson himself, there is no means of knowing after a century's lapse, and the organization of Spencer county in 1818 soon abridged the limits of Perry county to the space it now occupies, with a consequent reduction in its population and voters.

Most of the pioneer settlers were representatives of Southern blood, having come across the mountains from the Old Dominion along Daniel Boone's trail across the Dark and Bloody Ground, or else down the Ohio river by keel boat, or "broad-horn" flat-boat. Others had journeyed from those colonial States lying still further to the South. Some few of the more prosperous immigrants had brought their slaves, along with other goods and chattels, as is recorded by the tax list of June, 1815, which shows that two negroes were then held in slavery.

To this early influx of Virginian and Carolinian stock may be traced three generations of political affiliation with Southern principles, ultimately asserting itself at the outbreak of the war between the States, although Perry county boasted many "Union Democrats," and was one of the few counties to supply her full quota of soldiers called for by the State as volunteers.

Passing over those first few decades when county politics felt the sway of personal influence more strongly than partisan bias in either direction, it may be noted that the material development of natural resources toward the middle of the nineteenth century brought into the county an immigration of New England settlers, capitalists and men of means, no less than the industrial workers, and among these was a proportion of Democrats, so that the balance of political power underwent no change.

From Connecticut came a man to whom first mention is due, since he held the highest ranking national office ever filled by a resident of Perry county. Hon. Elisha M. Huntington, grandson of Samuel Huntington, that signer of the Declaration of Independence for whom Huntington county is named, came about 1847 to Cannelton, settling upon an extensive estate, "Mistletoe Lodge," which was his home when appointed in 18... by President as Judge of the Indiana District Federal Court, a position which he held until his death.

Perry county's first citizen elected to a State office was John P. Dunn of Troy, chosen as Auditor of State (then termed Auditor of Public Accounts) in 1852 on the Democratic ticket, headed by Governor Joseph A. Wright. He had been Perry county's representative in the Constitutional Convention of 1851, and to his influence contemporary authorities attribute the provision therein contained for forming a new county out of Perry and Spencer, if desired. It was hoped, of course, that Troy would become the county seat of the new organization, but when submitted to popular vote at the general State election in 1852, the proposition was defeated by 1,041 to 311.

In 1855 Perry county's representative was Ballard Smith, a New Hampshire Democrat, who had settled in Cannelton with two of his brothers. Deserved recognition of his ability was extended by the choice of him as speaker of the lower House for the Thirty-ninth legislative session. Two years later Governor Willard appointed him Circuit Judge, and he was called the most polished man—with the exception of Governor Hovey—who ever occupied the bench of the Third judicial district. After two years of service he moved to Vigo county, where Judge Huntington went about the same time, both spending the remainder of their lives in Terre Haute.

Perry county's first strictly Democratic newspaper was the Cannelton Mercury, the first of whose seven issues appeared on January 13, 1855, with J. B. Archer as editor and proprietor. This sheet was in lineal succession from the Economist, a notably high-class weekly journal, founded at Cannelton, April 26, 1849. It was of independent politics, as were the Indiana Weekly Express and the Cannelton Reporter, under which names it had variously appeared with brief intervals of suspension. The defunct Mercury was revived in a few weeks, as the Reporter, again independent, and two further changes of ownership and name (Independent Republican and Republican Banner) were undergone before George G. Leming and Henry Koetter bought out the plant. They took back the name Reporter, printing, on December 8, 1856, their first issue as a Democratic paper, under which allegiance it remained for twenty years. Koetter sold his interest March 14, 1857, to Jacob B. Maynard, who took over Leming's interest on January 30, 1858. Colonel Maynard was a born editor, gifted with a command of language both forcible and beautiful. His writings from the first attracted wide attention, as the nation-at-large was in a period of simmering discontent soon to boil over, and among the border States the sentiment on both sides was of deep intensity. This journalistic skill found a more extended field later on the old Indianapolis Sentinel, of whose editorial staff he became a member during the sixties. He had sold the Reporter on December 25, 1858, to James M. Moffett and George G. Leming, who very soon sold out to J. C. and J. H. Wade, the former being editor. January 7, 1860, Colonel Maynard again took the paper and edited it during the critical Buchanan-Lincoln campaign. In its columns during January, 1861, are detailed the series of resolutions proposed and in part adopted by public meetings of citizens held at various points in Perry county. Cannelton rejected the last paragraph in the series, although the Reporter openly favored its sentiment that the Ohio river should not be the dividing line if the Union and the Confederacy became separate nations, the final clause of the resolution reading that "we earnestly desire, if a line is to be drawn between the North and the South, that line shall be found north of us." December 6, 1861, Colonel Maynard sold a one-half interest to Mr. W. L. Moffett, and December 5, 1863, sold his remaining half to Henry N. Wales, who became editor. He bought out Moffett on April 2, 1864, but sold in turn to Joseph W. Snow, October 1, 1864. April 12, 1866, the paper was sold to Major Thomas James de la Hunt, in whose family it remained until the spring of 1876, when it became the property of Hiram P. Brazee and H. Marcus Huff, who conducted it a little over a year as a Republican journal.

The Cannelton Enquirer had been founded June 1, 1870, as a Democratic paper by Edwin R. Hatfield, Sydney B. Hatfield and Elisha E. Drumb, the last two being editors. Will N. Underwood bought a one-third interest and became publisher in June, 1873. Drumb and E. R. Hatfield retired in June, 1874, and S. B. Hatfield in June, 1876, leaving Underwood sole proprietor.

The Tell City Commercial had been founded May 3, 1873, as an independent sheet by A. P. Mastin, but he sold it December 3, 1873, to Heber J. May, who made it Democratic and continued the publication until January 1, 1876, when he sold it to W. P. Knight, by whom it was printed several months longer, or until discontinued and removed.

In 1877 William E. Knights, who had been publishing the Grandview Monitor, came to Cannelton and associated himself with Underwood through purchase of the Reporter and its consolidation with the Enquirer under the style of Cannelton Enquirer and Reporter under the joint proprietorship of Underwood & Knights. The first number appeared June 21, 1877, as a Democratic issue, Knights remaining only until January 31, 1878, when he returned to Grandview, leaving Underwood as sole editor and publisher of the only Democratic organ in Perry county. The name of Reporter was dropped from the title after some years, and October 12, 1892, Underwood sold out to Huston and Miller, who reversed the politics to Republicanism.

Edward H. Schuetz and Joseph Sanderson commenced publication of the Cannelton Telephone October 25, 1891, as a Democratic paper. The Troy Times, also Democratic, was started about a year later by John B. Bacon, its outfit being owned by Louis J. Early, then residing in Louisville. The Times, however, was a losing venture, and Bacon soon suspended publication. Mr. Early then came to Indiana and, removing his plant to Cannelton, consolidated with Schuetz on November 28, 1892, under the name of Cannelton Times-Telephone. In May, 1894, he became exclusive owner, and dropping the name of Times, has been ever since the editor and proprietor of the Telephone.

The Tell City News was established as a Democratic paper on Saturday, April 11, 1891, by Philip Zoercher and its history is perhaps the briefest of any here told, as there has been no change of name, politics or day of issue since its founding, and its ownership was transferred after some years to Louis Zoercher (a brother of Philip Zoercher), by whom it is still edited and published.

Reverting to two-score years ago, it must be noted that John C. Shoemaker of Tobin township, who had been Auditor of Perry county from 1853 to 1857, Joint Senator from 1858 to 1863 and Representative from 1869 to 1871, was elected Auditor of State in 1870, after his retirement therefrom becoming principal owner of the Indianapolis Sentinel.

On the State Democratic ticket of 1876 the Clerk of the Supreme Court chosen was Gabriel Schmuck of Cannelton, who had previously served in Perry county as Recorder from 1859 to 1864, Clerk from 1864 to 1870 and Representative from 1872 to 1874.

Heber J. May of Cannelton, who had been elected Joint Senator in 1882, was appointed by President Cleveland in 1885 as Assistant Attorney-General to Augustus H. Garland of Arkansas, who was Attorney-General in the first Cleveland cabinet. Mr. May then made his home in Washington until his death, in 1915.

Philip Zoercher, the founder of the Tell City News, who was elected Representative in 1892, was nominated in 1912 for Reporter of the Supreme Court and was elected, with the entire ticket, to the office which he holds at this writing, having removed his home to Indianapolis and established himself as a citizen of Marion county.

Oscar C. Minor represented the county in the Indiana State Senate from 1899 to 1901, and the present State Senator from Perry county is Joseph M. Hirsh.

All the present county officials are Democrats—not a single Republican has occupied a county office for fifteen years.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF PIKE COUNTY

By Philip D. Abell

PREVIOUS to 1817 the territory now comprising the county of Pike was included in Gibson county. By the act for its formation, December 21, 1816, Pike county included a much larger area than it now does. Examination of a map will show that Pike county at that time included all of its present territory, except a part of Clay township, and in addition took in all of what is now Columbia township and a large part of Barton township, Gibson county, a small part of Warrick and Perry counties, all of Dubois county and that part of Martin county south of Lick creek. By acts of the Legislature in regard to the formation of Dubois county, passed during the session of 1817-1818, the present eastern boundary of Pike was established and the General Assembly of 1823 and 1824 fixed the present western limits. Later, at indefinite periods, parts on the north and south were taken off and formed into the present territory comprising the counties of Knox, Warrick and Gibson, respectively. Previous to 1824 the territory now included in Clay township, except the eastern row of sections which were added in 1825, belonged to Gibson county. In that year it was annexed to Pike county and organized as a separate township. In September, 1838, Patoka township, comprising its present territory and what was afterward formed into Marion township, was organized. The others organized were Logan in 1846, Lockhart in 1852 and Marion in 1857. So that not until 1857 was the county completely organized into its present form and size.

The first Board of Commissioners was elected in 1817.

The first Democratic county chairman that we have any record of was Dr. Alexander Leslie and next was William DeBruler. These two men served the county before the war. During the war William Barr was chairman. The following is the list since 1872:

- 1872. Daniel C. Ashby.
- 1876. Ansel J. Patterson.
- 1878 and 1880. E. P. Richardson.
- 1882. Mart Fleener.
- 1884. E. P. Richardson.
- 1886. Henry W. Wiggs.
- 1888. Daniel C. Ashby.
- 1890. T. K. Fleming.
- 1892. Geo. C. Ashby.
- 1894. M. L. Heathman.

- 1896 and 1898. W. J. Richardson.
- 1900. John Cary.
- 1902. W. A. Battles.
- 1904. David D. Corn.
- 1906. Frank Ely.
- 1908-1910 and 1912. Geo. D. Hollon.
- 1914. W. H. Scales.
- Democratic Sheriffs of Pike county:
1840. Meredith Howard (two terms).
- 1844. M. L. Withers (Dem.) and J. C. Graham (Rep.) received the same number of votes. The latter became Sheriff (two terms).
- 1848. David Miley (one term).
- 1850. Marquis L. Withers (two terms).
- 1854. F. M. Whight (two terms).
- 1858. H. Gladish.
- 1863. H. Gladish.
- 1870. J. W. Humphrey (one term).
- 1874. Wm. C. Miller (one term).
- 1878. Thos. J. Scales (two terms).
- 1884. W. J. Shrode (one term).
- 1890. J. W. Stilwell (one term).
- 1896 and 1898. Wm. Ridgeway (two terms).
- 1900. Richard Bass (one term).
- 1910. Marion Nance (two terms), present Sheriff. He was succeeded in 1914 election by Peter R. Miller (Dem.), who will take office Jan. 1914.

Democratic Treasurers of Pike County since 1847 to 1914:

- 1847. Alexander Leslie.
- 1857. James Crow.
- McCrillus Gray appointed 1860. Crow having resigned.
- 1864. Alexander Leslie.
- 1870. McCrillus Gray.
- 1877. Jefferson W. Richardson.
- 1880. Perry W. Chappell.
- 1884. Fred H. Poetker (one term).
- 1886. (Rep.).
- 1888. (Rep.).
- 1890. Owen O. Smith (one term).
- 1892. (Rep.).
- 1894. (Rep.).
- 1896 and 1898. O. O. Smith.
- 1900-1902 and 1904. (Rep.).
- 1906. O. D. Harris (one term).
- 1908. W. H. Scales (two terms).
- 1912. Christian D. Henke. Present Treasurer and succeeds himself in 1914.

Clerks of Pike county:

- 1855. John B. Hannah.
- 1863. Albert H. Logan.
- 1865. Wm. Barr was appointed, Logan having resigned.
- 1871. J. W. Richardson.
- 1874. (Rep.).
- 1878. Dan C. Ashby.
- 1882. Dan C. Ashby.

In 1886 a Republican was elected to the Clerk's office and continued to serve in that office until 1914, when Edward Scales, a Democrat, was elected. He will take his office in Jan. 1915.

Recorders of Pike county:

- 1851. David Miley.
- 1858. John McIntire.
- 1863. (Rep.).
- 1868. Dan C. Ashby.
- 1876. Mark Powers.
- 1884. Joseph C. Ridge.
- 1888. (Rep.).
- 1892. (Rep.).
- 1896. Nathaniel Corn.
- 1900. William A. Battles.
- 1904 and 1908. (Rep.).
- 1912. Philip D. Abell, present Recorder.

Pike county's Democratic Auditors:

- 1855. W. H. DeBruler.
- 1858. David H. Miley.
- 1862. Wm. C. Davenport.
- 1866. (Rep.).
- 1874. Ansel J. Patterson.
- 1878. Frank R. Bilderback.
- 1882. W. J. Bethel.
- 1890. F. R. Bilderback.
- 1894. (Rep.).
- 1898. Harrison Scales.
- 1902. (Rep.).
- 1906. F. R. Bilderback.
- 1910. John D. Gray, present Auditor and succeeds himself in the 1914 election.

The County Commissioners at present are Charles Robertson, James Bottoms and Frank R. Bilderback, all Democrats.

The strength of the two parties at the presidential elections has been very close. The Democrats have had a small majority in most of the presidential elections since 1840. Woodrow Wilson received the best majority of any President.

Among the men who were elected Representatives from Pike and of which Pike was a part of the district were Alvin T. Whight, in 1841; Robert Logan, 1843; A. T. Whight, 1844; James R. Withers, 1849; G. Masey, 1857; W. H. DeBruler, 1863; J. W. Richardson, 1865; Robert Logan, 1869; James D. Barker, 1873; James W. Arnold, 1875; L. W. Stewart, 1877; Joseph D. Barker, 1879; Samuel Hargrove, 1881; Morman Fisher, 1883; L. Hargrove, 1885; M. L. Heathman, 1891; Sasser Sullivan, 1897; D. D. Corn, 1903.

Among the men who were elected Senators were John Hargrave, 1838-40; Benjamin R. Edmundson, 1844-47; Smith Miller, 1847-50; William Hawthorn, 1852-56; James D. Barker, 1864-68; James B. Hendricks, 1875; E. P. Richardson, 1883-87; Henry Wiggs, 1891-95.

Hon. A. H. Taylor was elected Representative to Congress from Pike county in 1893 and served one term.

Hon. E. P. Richardson served as District Chairman in 1886, 1888, 1904 and 1906.

Petersburg, the county seat, has been the residence of several men of prominence in State and national affairs. Among the earlier may be mentioned Major John McIntire, who served with distinction during the war of 1812 in Colonel R. M. Johnson's regiment. Soon after the organization of the county he took up his residence in Petersburg and from that time for many years filled the offices of County Clerk and Recorder. John Johnson and Thomas C. Stewart were both men of ability. The former organized the county and represented it in the State Legislature for the first eight years. Stewart was agent of the county for several years and was a member of the State Senate from 1835 to 1838. During the "twenties" George H. Proffitt came to Petersburg and engaged in merchandising. He later turned his attention to law and politics, especially the latter. He was a shrewd politician and an orator of great brilliancy. He served two terms in the State Legislature and two terms as Representative in Congress. Upon the ascension of Tyler to the presidency, he championed the President's cause and was made minister to Brazil. He died in the prime of life and was buried in the old cemetery. Hon. John W. Foster, United States Minister to Spain, is the son of Judge Mathew Foster, and it was here that he was born and spent his early years.

Some of the leading Democrats of Pike county are the following: J. W. Richardson, who attended his first convention in 1848 when he was twenty years old and for fifty years never missed a convention; John McIntire was for a number of years Clerk and Recorder at the same time. Among others are James N. Weathers, John Capehart, Marcellus Chew, Frank White, Jack Davis, John J. Robling, J. J. Bowman, Joseph Morgan, Joseph Hanning, Simeon LeMasters, A. J. Patison, Uncle Rote Nelson, George W. Masey, William J. DeBruler, John Thompson, James and Dan Crow, Lewis Beck, George Fettinger, James and Joseph D. Barker, Daniel Davidson, Peter Burkhart, Rev. Samuel Thompson, Frank Bilder-back, Dan C. Ashby, Samuel Hargrove, J. P. Rumble, E. J. Whitelock, John E. Cox, A. H. Taylor, C. D. Henke, A. J. Heuring, Henry J. Wiggs and Charles Robertson.

The first newspaper published in Pike county was called the Patriot, a small five-column folio and the subscription price was $1.50 per annum. It purported to be independent in politics and was owned by a few of the leading men. J. N. Evans was the editor and Henry Stoutt was the printer. It was discontinued after running six months. During the campaign in 1856 Samuel Upton began the publication of the first Pike County Democrat. It was printed in Washington, Ind., but was ostensibly published in Petersburg. It was discontinued after a few months. In 1865 one McGinnis established a paper called the Messenger. It was a strong supporter of Democracy. In 1867 the Messenger was bought by S. T. Palmer, who changed the name to Tribune, and continued the publication until June, 1869, when he sold out to Malachi Krebs. During the campaign of 1868 James E. Huceby published the Democratic Press. He was a staunch Democrat and a firm believer in a "white man's government."

In the fall of 1870 George M. Emack transferred the Otwell Herald, which he had published about six months, to Petersburg. It was a five-column paper, devoted to the interest of the Democratic party. He sold a one-half interest to Alexander Leslie, Jr., and the paper, under the name of the Pike County Democrat, was enlarged to a six-column folio. Emack became involved in some difficulty and left the town. Leslie continued the publication until after the campaign of 1872, when B. F. Wright became the editor. Under his management the paper was not a financial success, and after two months, not being able to pay some of his bills, he gave up the work. Leslie then leased the office to Oscar McDonald and Monroe Crow, who found that there were not "millions" in it, and in six weeks it reverted back to Leslie. Publication was suspended until November, 1872, when the office was sold to M. S. Evans & Co. The paper was enlarged to a seven-column folio and H. S. Evans became editor. In June, 1873, the office again changed hands and William P. Knight and M. L. DeMotte became the owners. The following year DeMotte sold his interest to L. C. Campbell and during the campaign of 1874 the paper was conducted under the firm name of Knight & Campbell. In December of that year Leslie foreclosed a mortgage on the office. The publishers went to Vincennes, purchased the material in the Times office and, without missing a single issue, continued the Democrat. In February, 1875, Campbell sold his interest to Knight and the following November Knight transferred the office to Charles Mitchener. He then went to Tell City, Ind., but in February, 1877, he returned to Petersburg and again became the proprietor of the Democrat. He had with him at various times in the editorial management J. M. Doyle, W. D. McSwane, W. F. Townsend and Fremont Arford. At some time between 1877 and 1885 William P. Knight sold the paper to J. L. Mount. M. McStoops, the present owner, bought it from the Mount heirs in 1892.

The Pike County Democrat is well managed, enjoys a liberal advertising and job patronage, and is one of the leading organs of the county Democracy. The office has been twice totally destroyed by fire—first on December 2, 1882, and again on May 15, 1884.

The Winslow Dispatch was established by Alden J. Heuring in Winslow, Pike county, March 10, 1896. Up to that time there had not been anything much done toward managing a regular newspaper in that town. Mr. Heuring has been a wideawake, untiring editor, and has, since the time the paper started, built up a circulation of 2,100. This is remarkable when we consider that there are only 932 inhabitants in the town. The office is equipped with all new and strictly up-to-date outfit with machinery to supply a much larger circulation.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF PORTER COUNTY

By Alfred R. Hardesty

THE foundations of Porter county were of glacial origin, laid in the Devonian Age. Its surface is interspersed with hills and vales, woods and prairies, springs and streams, and dotted with fine homes and beautiful lakes, being one of the most progressive counties in the great State of Indiana.

This territory, over which four flags, those of France, Spain, England and our own Stars and Stripes, have floated, was the scene of a number of battles in the days when the Indians inhabited it. However, the first inhabitants of this territory are supposed to have been the Mound Builders.

It is not known when white men first visited the country out of which Porter county was formed, but the first white settler, Joseph Bailly, settled here in 1822. He was the only white inhabitant for a period of eleven years. The place where he settled on the banks of the Calumet river has always been known as Bailly Town and his old homestead there was owned and occupied by his granddaughter, Miss Frances Howe, until her death in 1917. She was a very cultured and wealthy lady and an author of considerable note, both in this country and abroad. The years 1833 and 1834 were memorable on account of the large number of white inhabitants settling here. Reason Bell, the first white child born in the county, first saw the light of day January 11, 1834. He afterward held the enviable record of having been four times elected county auditor.

The first public sale of Porter county lands was held at Laporte in 1835. This was the home of the Potawatomes and among the first land owners were the following:

Joseph Bailly, Old-Man-Macito, Chop-i-tuck, Kessis-shadonah, Lemis-shadonah, Mis-sink-quo-quak, Mas-coh, Pa-peer-kah, Nas-wau-bees, Wesaw, Mis-no-quis, Che-apo-tuckey, and James, Ira and Joseph Morgan.

The county was first organized in 1835 by the commissioners of Laporte county, who had charge of all the territory in Indiana west of the western line of Laporte county and lying between the Kankakee river on the south and Lake Michigan on the north. They simply divided it into districts or townships for election purposes. But it was not until January, 1836, that the real organization by the State Legislature took place. The first term of the Porter Circuit Court was held by Judge Sample at the home of John Saylor in October, 1836. The first court house was built in 1837, at a cost of $1,250, which amount was raised by popular subscription among the residents of the county.

Porter county has been the home of numerous authors and writers of note and educational influence and the seat of various educational institutions, including Valparaiso University, one of the largest universities in America. It had for its founder and, for more than forty years, its president, that prince of Democrats, Henry Baker Brown. Another of our educational institutions of note is the Dodge Institute of Telegraphy, including wireless telegraphy and railway service and accountancy. It is perhaps the largest school of the kind in the world and had for its founder and president that noble young Democrat, George M. Dodge.

The first newspaper, the Republican, to be published in the county was established in 1842 by James Castle. It was a weekly and claimed to be independent in politics. In 1844 the name of this sheet was changed to the Western Ranger and its politics to Democratic. In 1849, under the editorship of William C. Talcott, the name was changed to the Practical Observer. In 1853 Mr. Talcott changed his publication to the Republican faith and name, as he was a believer in the doctrines of the new party of that day; and it was largely through his ability, efforts, zeal and influence that Porter county has ever remained one of the strong Republican counties of the State.

In 1859 R. A. Cameron, having become the owner and publisher of the paper, and the last two letters of the name having been lost or destroyed in a fire, the publication continued as the Republic. Mr. Cameron was a member of the legislature in 1860, and went to the war in 1862 and his wife continued the publication of the paper for a time, but soon discontinued it, until 1866, after Mr. Cameron's return, when he again began its publication, but the plant was soon sold to the management of the Vidette, which had been established about this time as a Republican paper by Aaron Gurney. The well-known B. Wilson Smith became its educational editor. With some slight changes in name and ownership, from time to time, the Vidette is still being published as a daily and weekly, and as the leading Republican paper of the county, under the able management of its owner and editor, John M. Mavity.

A Democratic publication, known as the Porter

Democrat, and, later, as the Porter Gazette, was published with some degree of success, from 1856 to 1860. But, in 1871, Englebert Zimmerman, postmaster of Valparaiso, under President Cleveland's first administration, launched the Messenger as a Democratic journal, and it continues as such at the present time and remained under the management of the Zimmerman family until 1915. During all these years it has been the only Democratic paper published in the county. Both daily and weekly editions are published.

Other papers temporarily published in Valparaiso have been the Valparaiso Herald, an independent publication; the Musical Ideal, the Normal Mirror, the Northern Indiana School Journal, the Normal Instructor, and the College Current, all of them being literary and educational publications.

Other papers now published in the county are the Hebron News, the Kouts Tribune, and the Chesterton Tribune, the latter of which was established in 1884, by Arthur J. Bowser, since State Senator, first as an independent in politics, but later changed to a Republican publication. It is still owned, edited and published by its founder and has exerted considerable influence in the political, social and business affairs of the county for many years.

Politically the new county was quite evenly divided between the various parties of those days; but, since the advent of the present Republican party into the political arena, that party has always been largely in the majority in the county. In the last two general elections, however, their majority has been materially reduced and the present Democratic hope is that this majority may be still further reduced in the future.

Although the county has always been strongly Republican, a few Democrats who have been especially strong and popular have been elected to county offices. James R. Malone, an untiring Democratic worker, was twice elected Sheriff. John M. Felton was once elected Clerk and twice elected Treasurer. Cyrus Axe and A. W. Reynolds were each twice elected Treasurer. Ed. C. O'Neil was elected Clerk once and Jos. Sego was elected Sheriff once. Dr. G. H. Stoner was elected Coroner one term and Joseph Quinn is serving as County Commissioner at the present time.

Although Valparaiso is a Republican city, several prominent Democrats have been elected Mayor in times past. Among these were John N. Skinner, twice the nominee of his party for Representative in Congress, who served as Mayor for ten years, and until his death in 1882; then came Frank Jones, a promising young man, whose career was cut short by the inevitable sickle; also,

A. D. Bartholomew, afterward Judge of the Porter Circuit Court, and William F. Spooner, who was elected to this office three times and served eight years, besides serving as chairman of the Democratic county central committee at the same time.

Among other prominent Democrats of the county at the present time are W. E. Pinney, James H. McGill, John T. Scott, present chairman of the county central committee; Walter Fabing, former Prosecuting Attorney; William Daly, former City Attorney; Joseph Doyle, D. E. Kelly, Chas. L. Jeffrey, C. L. Haslett, Gordon Reynolds, Allen Baum, Geo. Gidley, Peter Lyon, Isaac Hoddsden, Bert Hoddsden, Frank Beach, Vernon Beach, B. F. Jones, John W. Freer, William T. Brown, Edward Isbey, Fred Wittenburg, Wallace Wilson, Geo. R. Jones, J. E. Roessler, Englebert Zimmerman, Abe Hermance, A. L. LaBrecque, William Malone, David Fickle, W. K. Mulnix, A. N. Fehrman, R. D. Ross, Alfred Banister, J. D. Stoner, Charles Olfest, John Van Trees, Harve Carey, Newton Anderson, Robert Boone, W. H. Goodwin, Fred Pope, Irvin Talbot, Loren Cornell, Charles Cashon, Cash Brown, John Lawrence, Herman Dye, Ira McConkey, Henry Pahl, W. O. McGinley, J. G. Benkie, A. L. Arnold, Edwin V. Jones, James R. Smiley, H. H. Willing, and E. A. Greene, secretary to Congressman John B. Peterson.

Worthy of notice also are DeFoe Skinner, deceased, a wealthy banker, and twice elected State Senator; and Hubert M. Skinner, a native of this county, a noted scholar, linguist and author, who was Deputy State Superintendent of Schools when John W. Holcomb, who was also a citizen of this county, and a Democrat, was State Superintendent of Public Instruction; and John Brody, former County Chairman of the Democratic central committee and Postmaster under President Cleveland's second administration.

Among past and present Republican citizens of the county are many of more than local political note, among whom may be named the following: Gilbert Pierce, once State Representative, afterward editor of the Chicago Inter Ocean, and later Governor of Dakota and United States Senator for North Dakota. William H. Calkins, State Representative, Congressman, and candidate for Governor of Indiana; Nelson Barnard, State Representative and one of the founders of the Republican party in the county; Marquis L. McClelland, a member of the State Legislature, and private secretary to Vice-President Schuyler Colfax, when that gentleman was a member of Congress; Theophilus Crumpacker, once State Representative. Edgar D. Crumpacker, son of Theophilus, is a brainy man and shrewd and successful politician and represented the Tenth Indiana Congressional District in Congress eight consecutive terms, being defeated for re-election in 1912 by that sterling Democrat, John B. Peterson. Mark L. DeMotte was another Porter county Republican who represented this district in Congress. S. S. Skinner and Newton Patton were members of the Legislature and held various local offices. John W. Elam was another leading Republican politician and had been postmaster at Valparaiso nearly two terms at the time of his death. Frederick Burstrom was a Swedish worker and holder of various local offices. Among other prominent present day workers in the county might be named Charles S. Peirce, former Clerk; L. H. Coplin, former Treasurer; G. A. Bornholt, present Clerk;

George C. Gregg, twice elected to the Legislature; E. W. Agar, former City Attorney; M. L. Stinchfield, Postmaster at Valparaiso; H. H. Loring, Judge of the Porter Circuit Court; C. A. Blachley, Byron Kinne, Edward Freund, A. O. J. Krieger and L. G. Furness, former State Representative.

We could go on ad infinitum naming those who are perhaps just as worthy of being named in both of the parties, but time and space forbids, and we end a worthy list of honored citizens here, hoping that the future of both parties, in Porter county, may be full of honor and that each may strive for the upbuilding and betterment of her people.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF POSEY COUNTY

By Joel Willis Hiatt, A. M.

POSEY COUNTY lies in the extreme southwest corner of the State. In 1814, by an Act of the Legislature, it was formed from parts of Gibson and Warrick counties. In 1818 a portion of it was taken to form a part of Vanderburg county and it was reduced to 420 square miles, its present area. The population in 1910 was 21,670 and the county seat is Mount Vernon, on the Ohio river.

Since and including 1836, it has invariably given its majority support to the Democratic National ticket. It has only occasionally deviated from this record in State, district and county elections.

The vigor and success of the party in the county has been largely maintained by the ability and high character of its leaders. In the earlier times they embraced Robert Dale Owen, Alvin P. Hovey, Dan Lynn, Magnus T. Carnahan and Judge William Edson; in later times, Gustavus V. Menzies, to whose unselfish, unstinted labors the success of the party in this county has been due more than to any other man, Milton Pearse, James W. French, Judge Herdis F. Clements and George William Curtis.

Credit should also be given to the Democratic press of our county. Without exception it has been honorable and high toned and able in its advocacy of Democratic policies and principles.

Only papers whose editors have been Democrats will be mentioned in this sketch.

The first paper published in the county was the New Harmony Gazette. It was edited in part by Robert Dale Owen and William Owen. It was begun October 1, 1825, and continued to October 28, 1828. Its immediate successors were not of political character. In 1842 the Indiana Statesman, edited by Alexander Burns, a relative of Robert Burns the poet, was started in New Harmony and continued until 1845. In 1846 James Bennett started the Western Star, which he published at New Harmony for a year and then the Gleaner, which he discontinued after a year. In 1858 the Register was started in New Harmony by Charles Slater and continued until 1861, when its editor enlisted in the army. In 1867 he and J. P. Bennett resumed the publication of the paper and it has been continued by Charles W. Slater and, on his death, by Harry T. Slater, until the present time. The New Harmony Times was established in 1892 by Clarence P. Wolfe and continues to be published by him. He is now the Democratic postmaster at New Harmony.

In Mount Vernon the Democrat was founded in 1861 by James Huckleby and continued under different publishers until 1864. In 1867 Thomas Collins established the present Mount Vernon Democrat and it has continued until the present time under the successive ownerships of Albert A. Sparks, Peter W. and John Roach and its present proprietor, Peter W. Roach. It is issued in daily form. John Roach died April 1, 1918. The Wochenblatt, the first and only German paper in the county, was established by John C. Leffel in 1875 and continued until 1881. In 1877 Mr. Leffel founded the Western Star, which he continues to publish. It is equipped with a Mergenthaler linotype machine.

In 1882 the Poseyville News was established at Poseyville by Joseph A. Leonard and George J. Waters. In 1884 this paper passed under the control of James I. Brydon and became Democratic in politics, and later John S. Williams bought an interest in it. In 1888 Joseph R. Ha'nes, who creditably served the county two terms as Representative in the Legislature and is at present the Democratic County Auditor, bought the paper and is at present publishing it.

No comparisons can be made between the present members of the Democratic press in the county. Each member is a credit to its publisher and a tower of strength to the party.

The State and even the nation owe a debt of gratitude to the Democracy of Posey county by reason of the character, ability and achievements of some of its sons whom it has placed in public positions.

One of the first to be mentioned is Robert Dale Owen. He served in the Indiana House of Representatives three terms. He was first elected in 1835 and served two successive terms and was again elected in 1851. He was a member of the Committee on Education and devoted his energies to the building up of the State Library, the firm establishment and endowment of the common school system and the amelioration of the condition of women under the law. For his services in this latter direction he has been twice publicly honored by the women of Indiana. In 1851 he was presented with a handsome silver pitcher by the women of the State and recently a bronze bust of him, on a handsome pedestal, was erected to his memory in the State House grounds. The money for both testimonials was voluntarily contributed by the women of Indiana.

He was one of the most active members of the Constitutional Convention of 1850. He was chairman of the Committee on Rights and Privileges of the Inhabitants of the State and of the Committee on Revision, Arrangement and Phraseology. He endeavored to have incorporated in the constitution a provision guaranteeing to married women the right to own and control property, independent of their husbands. The measure was passed, but reconsidered and defeated.

He served the people of our district two terms in the House of Representatives of the United States (1843-47). He contributed materially to the settlement of the dispute between our government and Great Britain in reference to the Oregon boundary. His speech on that subject in the House was one of great force and erudition.

He introduced and secured the passage of a bill to organize the Smithsonian Institution. The bill which he introduced provided for an agricultural experiment station, a national normal school and an experiment school for "Improvements in agriculture, in manufactures, in trades, and in domestic economy." We have here our modern agricultural experiment stations, vocational schools, domestic science instruction, with the further idea of an advanced school for the perfecting of our manufactures. The Germans have successfully employed this latter idea and thereby achieved a world wide fame as manufacturers. This was in 1845. Robert Dale Owen was in advance of his time. These beneficent and far-sighted provisions were stricken out of the bill in the House and the amended bill, which is now a law, was passed by a vote of 85 to 76. At the beginning of this Congress a special committee was created on Organization of the Smithsonian Institution. Mr. Owen was made its chairman and had for his colleagues John Quincy Adams, Timothy Jenkins, G. P. Marsb, Alexander D. Sims, Jefferson Davis and David Wilmot. Andrew Johnson was one of the bitterest opponents of the measure.

Mr. Owen served as Minister to Naples under Presidents Pierce and Buchanan. His subsequent career, so full of active usefulness, cannot be even touched upon here.

William Owen was a director in the State Bank of Indiana and a profound student of economic science. He exercised an important influence on National legislation in financial matters and his thoroughness and clearness of statement were favorably commented on by Senator James Buchanan.

David Dale Owen was State Geologist of Indiana, Kentucky and Arkansas, successively, and was the first United States Geologist. The headquarters of the United States Geological Survey were located in New Harmony for six years. His work was thorough and eminently practical. He is held in the highest esteem by the geologists of today. He first analyzed the waters of French Lick Springs, Indiana, and Hot Springs, Arkansas, and called the attention of the world to their remarkable curative properties.

Richard Owen was State Geologist of Indiana from 1859 to 1861. For many years he was Professor of Natural Science in Indiana State University.

This great family of Posey county was greatly honored by the Democratic party and, in turn, reflected great credit upon it.

Edward T. Cox of New Harmony was State Geologist of Indiana from 1869 to 1879 and did more than any other man to bring our coal deposits into prominence before the world. He was a life-long Democrat.

Alvin P. Hovey served as Circuit Judge, Supreme Court Judge and United States District Attorney. He was appointed to the latter place by President Pierce in 1856, and continued in the position under President Buchanan until his activity in behalf of Stephen A. Douglas caused his removal. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1850 and served on the Committees on Finance and Taxation. In 1855 he was appointed by the circuit court of Posey county as administrator of the estate and executor of the will of William Maclure of New Harmony, Posey county. In 1839 Mr. Maclure made a will in which he provided that all of his property in and around New Harmony should "be applied for the diffusion of useful knowledge and instruction among the institutes, libraries, clubs and meetings of the working classes." Its operation was to be confined to the United States. Judge Hovey distributed $150,000 throughout the west, thus becoming the executive agent of the first Andrew Carnegie. Alvin P. Hovey became a major-general during the civil war, was sent as Minister to Peru by President Lincoln and, as a Republican, represented our district in Congress part of one term, when he was elected Governor of Indiana.

Judge John Pitcher, who was a Whig in his early life, became a Democrat towards its close. He was a man of superb intellect and a splendidly equipped lawyer. While living in Spencer county, he loaned to Abraham Lincoln his first law books.

I have spoken of the activity of Hon. Gustavus V. Menzies in the service of the party. He is the leader of the bar in the county, learned in the law, eloquent and forceful as a speaker and of incorruptible integrity. He was educated for and was a lieutenant-commander in the navy. He was united in marriage to Miss Esther Hovey, the only daughter of General Alvin P. Hovey, with whom, after resigning his commission in the navy, he studied law. He was chosen a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in 1876 and has been a delegate to every convention since. He has been Delegate-at-Large to the last four National conventions. On his motion, in 1884, the nomination of Grover Cleveland was made unanimous. In 1904 he was chairman of the State delegation and a member of the Committee on Credentials. In 1878 he represented the counties of Gibson and Posey in the Senate of Indiana. He served on the Judiciary Committee during the first session and was chairman of the Committee on Insurance. In the second session he was a member of the Committee on Revision and Codification of the Laws, and, in conjunction with the Board of Revision, consisting of Judge James Frazer, Hon. David Turpie and Mr. Stotsenburg, codified and revised the laws of Indiana. It was a laborious task and one that is appreciated by the lawyers of the State. He has twice been nominated by his party for Congress, but, the district being largely Republican at that time, he was defeated on both occasions. Mr. Menzies died December 15, 1917.

Hon. James W. French represented the county in the House of Representatives of the State in 1885. He was a member of the Committee on Education. He was chosen to the State Senate in 1887, where he served on the Committee on Education and was chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and State Library, and of Finance. He was afterwards appointed warden of the prison at Michigan City and, because of the excellent record which he made in that position, President Cleveland appointed him warden of the federal prison at Leavenworth, Kansas.

Judge Herdis F. Clements was a representative in the Legislature for one term (1899-1901). He was a professor in the law department of the Indiana State University during the years 1901-2-3. In the House of Representatives he served on the following committees: Education, Judiciary, Phraseology of Bills and Engrossed Bills. He was elected Judge of the Posey Circuit Court and commenced his first term in October, 1909. He is the nominee of his party to succeed himself and no one has been nominated in opposition to him.

Hon. George William Curtis, age thirty-six, represented the counties of Gibson and Posey in the Indiana State Senate (1911-1913). He was chairman of the Committee on Education in both sessions. He wielded a potent influence in securing the advanced legislation on education that characterized those sessions of the legislature. In collaboration with the leading educators of the State, he prepared and secured the passage of a bill providing for uniform text books in the high schools of the State. He was instrumental in framing a child labor bill which became a law and has taken its place among the best that have been passed in the United States. In the session of 1913, he was President pro tem. of the Senate and, as such, was leader on the floor. He devoted much time to the consideration of the Public Service Utilities, Vocational Education and other educational measures, and his activities were in line with those of the best representatives of the county in the past. He was distinguished for his public duties. Mr. Curtis died October 25, 1917.

Hon. Charles A. Greathouse, Superintendent of Public Instruction for Indiana, was born in Posey county in 1869. He was educated at Indiana University. He was County School Superintendent of Posey county from 1895 to 1905. He was first nominated for Superintendent of Public Instruction in 1900. He was nominated by the Indiana Democratic convention for the position in 1910 and elected and re-elected in 1914.

There is a peculiar fitness in selecting the head of the education system of the State from a county that has done so much for the cause of education in the State. The first manual training school in the West was located in this county; the Pestalozzian system of instruction was first employed here; its legislators, from Robert Dale Owen to the present time, have been watchful and earnest in their efforts in behalf of education; one of its sons was for many years a distinguished member of the faculty of Indiana University; other sons are scattered throughout our country, occupying high positions in the higher institutions of learning. After ninety years of advanced and notable effort in the cause of education Posey county places one of her sons at the head of the educational system of the State.

Some of the things that have been accomplished during Mr. Greathouse's first term of office may be briefly stated, as follows:

(a) The office of high school inspector was created, for the better supervision, organization and equipment of the high schools of the State, that they may be made more profitable to a larger number of young people. By means of this office uniform inspection of high schools will be brought about through the services of one man, with a salary of $2,500, instead of ten, who were allowed five dollars per diem and five cents per mile for traveling expenses.

(b) Uniform text books for the high schools were adopted, to lessen the cost of text books and provide against an expenditure for new books every time a family moved from one corporation to another.

(c) Amendment to the compulsory education law, raising the age limit to sixteen years, unless children have passed the fifth grade in school work and are employed in gainful occupation.

(d) The vocational law was enacted to provide for the very large per cent. of young people who are not reached by our present curriculum of study and drop out of school unprepared to become useful members of society.

(e) Amendment of the minimum wage law to provide more amply for the teachers of longer experience.

(f) Providing a definite income for the higher institutions of learning, which does not mean an increased expenditure for those institutions, but provision for a regular yearly income that will allow plans for their improvements and enlargements in advance and in accord with a known income.

President Wilson has appointed Mr. Charles A. Greathouse a member of the Federal Board of Vocational Education. The board consists of three members. Their duty is to give form and effect to the federal law extending financial aid to vocational education in the States. This law was passed by a Democratic Congress, signed by a Democratic President and a Posey county Democrat, whose early life was given wholly to promoting the educational interests of his county, is chosen as one of the executive agents to effect the operation of the law.

After the lapse of more than seventy years the idea which Robert Dale Owen of this county unsuccessfully sought to make one of the features of the Smithsonian Institution in his bill in Congress establishing that corporate body, has come into fruition, and a member of his own party, from his own county, is chosen to give substance and effect to the federal act.

This is the crowning achievement in the efforts of Posey county Democrats to further the cause of education.

With a record of undeviating loyalty to the National ticket for over three-quarters of a century, Posey county sends greeting to the Democracy of the State.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF PULASKI COUNTY

PULASKI COUNTY is located in ranges 1, 2, 3 and 4 west, and townships 29, 30 and 31 north. It is eighteen miles by twenty-four miles, including 432 square miles, in twelve townships. The population in 1910 was 13,312.

The political features of the county may be summed up in a few words. It has been stated frequently, and is so understood and maintained in the county, that at no time in the past has the opposition to Democracy succeeded in carrying an election; but when the tally-sheets, which are yet in existence, though yellow and faded by the passage of time, are examined a different tale is told. That the county, even from its organization in 1839, when out in full strength, may have been Democratic, does not alter the fact that at two general elections the Democratic candidates have been retired by small majorities. On the other hand, it is known that the full Democratic strength was not out. Still, owing to the small majority which the successful candidates received there is serious doubt whether the Whigs, in view of the superior numerical strength, were justly entitled to their victory.

At the gubernatorial election in August, 1840, when the polls were opened in but two townships in the county, and when the enthusiasm of the Whigs over the approaching presidential campaign was deep and universal, the county went Whig by the following small majority: For Governor, T. A. Howard, Democrat, 58; Samuel Bigger, Whig, 59. In 1843, at the August election, the following votes were cast: Samuel Bigger, Whig, 99; James Whitcomb, Democrat, 95. In the presidential election of 1840 we find that 60 votes were cast for Van Buren, Democrat, and 51 for Harrison, Whig. In the election of 1860 Stephen A. Douglas, Democrat, received 632 votes; Lincoln, 488. In 1864 McClellan received 718, while Lincoln received only 488. In the election of 1868 Seymour received 928 and Grant, Republican, 648. In the election of 1880 Hancock received 1,004 votes; Garfield, Republican, 897. Since that time Pulaski county has always been placed in the Democratic lists, the majorities running from 150 to 700.

This county has never produced a national nor a state officer. Medary M. Hathaway was at one time the Democratic nominee for Congress against A. L. Brick from the Thirteenth Congressional District, but on account of the overwhelming Republican majority in St. Joseph county, was defeated.

Former Superintendent of Schools J. H. Reddick was a candidate for the nomination of State Superintendent of Public Instruction, but was defeated in convention.

Judge George L. Burson was an elector when Tilden was a candidate for President.

The following men were considered as leaders for the party from 1880 to 1900: M. M. Hathaway, Joseph Steis and Henry Steis. J. H. Reddick, T. B. Hedges, John L. Burton, Judge Burson, J. J. Gorrell, Drs. G. W. and H. W. Thompson, and many others from various parts of the county whose names cannot be recalled.

The recent leaders of the party were M. M. Hathaway, Joseph Steis and Henry Steis, all of whom are deceased, and the present leaders are Ellis Rees, W. B. Henry, T. B. Hedges, William Wendt, H. L. Rogers, Peter Follmar, J. J. Blas-sar, J. D. Gettinger, Burt Burson, Clarence Puk, E. C. and J. J. Gorrell, A. C. James, Frank Dules, William March, D. E. Skillen, E. S. Deck, John Burton and John C. Reidelbach, together with many others, whose loyalty to the party has never been questioned.

Among the Democratic legislators of this county we find the following enrolled in the House of Representatives: E. P. Washburn, Peter Follmar, George L. Burson and Felix Thomas, and in the Senate Dr. H. W. Thompson, William C. Barnett and John C. Reidelbach.

The spirit of loyalty to the county, state and nation has always been shown by the Democracy of Pulaski county. As long as the party lasts that same spirit will be shown. She has faced defeat with that unflinching courage that made her prepare for the next contest; her victories have always been celebrated with that manner that made her friends rather than enemies.

Homer L. Rogers was born September 30, 1885, on a farm in Starke county, where he was reared, attending the county schools and graduating from the Knox High School in 1904. He became a student at Valparaiso University and the Indiana State Normal School, after which he taught for five years and was elected county superintendent of schools of Pulaski county December 26, 1908, which position he held until August, 1917, when he voluntarily retired and moved to his farm.

Mr. Rogers was a delegate to the Democratic state convention in 1912 and 1914.

He is married and has one child.

Mr. Rogers is affiliated with the Masons and Odd Fellows and is a member of the Methodist church.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF PUTNAM COUNTY

By Courtland P. Gillen

IT seems that the territory now comprising Putnam county was originally a part of Knox county, which in the early history of Indiana, extended as far north as the northern boundary of what is now Putnam and Parke counties. In 1816 the counties of Daviess and Sullivan were formed out of the northern part of Knox county. Later, on January 21, 1818, Vigo county was formed out of territory cut off from Sullivan county, and on December 21 of the same year Owen county was cut out of territory then comprising the counties of Daviess and Sullivan. Before the close of the year 1821, Putnam county was formed out of a part of Vigo and Owen. On December 21, 1822, the boundary lines of Putnam county were changed to the present lines, with the exception of Mill Creek township, which lies northwest of Eel river in Townships 13 and 14 north, in Range 2 west of the second prime meridian, which was annexed from Morgan county in March, 1861.

Putnam county was, from its organization in 1822, inclined to the support of the Democratic party. The voting population crystallized on party lines quite early in the forties. While the majority of the voters were Democrats a Whig was occasionally elected. The first Clerk, Arthur McGaughey, was a Whig, but since his day there has been an unbroken line of Democratic Clerks, except in 1850 to 1855 the office was held by a Whig. In the early days the Sheriff's and Treasurer's offices were occasionally captured by the Whigs, and since 1860 the Treasurer's office has been occupied four terms by Republicans. With these and a few minor exceptions Putnam county offices have always been occupied by Democrats, and it is to be said to the credit of Putnam county that she has never failed since 1852 to return a Democratic plurality or majority for a Democratic candidate for Governor of the State or President of the United States.

Unfortunately, no records have been kept of the various Democratic county organizations in the early days; not as much importance attached to the county chairman and his executive committee as at present. The voting population was much less and each voter was wide awake and made himself a committee of one to further the principles in which he believed and for which he so zealously fought.

The Democrats who have served as county chairmen of the Democratic party for Putnam county since 1860, and within the memory of some of the old-time Democrats now living, are as follows, in the order named: Clinton Walls, Melvin McKee, Henry B. Martin, Moses Lewman, M. D. Bridges, Willis G. Neff, James J. Smiley, Harrison M. Randel, Pressly O. Colliver, Jacob C. Ratcliff, John R. Gordon, Frank D. Ader, William B. Vestal, John F. Cooper, Alec A. Lane, Arthur J. Hamrick and Wm. M. Sutherland, who is the present county chairman.

Among many prominent Democrats of Putnam county there stands the name of Courtland C. Matson, without special mention of whom the history of the Democratic party in Putnam county would not be complete. Colonel Matson, as he is more familiarly known, was chairman of the Democratic State Committee in 1878 and as such did great work for his party. In 1881, 1883, 1885 and 1887 he was elected to Congress from the Fifth Congressional District of Indiana, and served his constituents with much credit. He took a great interest in pensioning the old soldier, and while in Congress was chairman of the committee on invalid pensions. In the forty-ninth session he introduced a bill and had it passed under a suspension of the rules, known as the "Dependent Pension" bill. In 1888 he received the nomination for Governor of the State of Indiana, but was defeated in the election. He served on the Board of State Tax Commissioners from 1908 to 1912 under appointment of Governor Thomas R. Marshall.

The Democracy of Putnam county has not been so fortunate in electing Democrats to the State Senate as it has to the House of Representatives. This has been due to the fact that Putnam county has nearly always been joined with an adjoining county whose Republican majority was always large enough to offset the Democratic majority in Putnam, consequently the joint Senators have been mostly Republican. Just two Democrats have been elected to the State Senate from Putnam county: Archibald Johnson, who served from 1857 to 1871, and Francis C. Tilden, who served from 1908 to 1912.

That Putnam county is a banner Democratic county will be seen from the long list of members of the House of Representatives of the State Assembly elected from that county. The names of the Democratic Representatives and the order in which they served are as follows:

- 1831-32. Henry Secrest.
 1832-33. John McNary.
 1835-36. Daniel Harrah.
 1838-39. Joseph F. Farley and John McNary.
 1840-41. Daniel Harrah.
 1842-43. William D. Allen, John Reel.
 1848-49. William D. Allen, Archibald Johnson.
 1845-47. Henry Secrest.
 1850-51. Bradford Glazebrook, Archibald Johnson.
 1857. William F. McGinnis.
 1863. Austin M. Puett.
 1865-67. Austin M. Puett, Samuel Colliver.
 1869-71. Willis G. Neff.
 1873. Weller B. Smith.
 1875. James G. Edwards.
 1877. George W. Priest.
 1879. Russell Allen.
 1881-83. Willis G. Neff.
 1883-87. John R. Gordon.
 1889-91. Frank D. Ader.
 1893. John Q. Vermillion.
 1897-01. John H. James.
 1903-05. Jackson Boyd.
 1907-09. David B. Hostetter.
 1911-13. John B. McCabe.
 1915-17. Andrew E. Durham.

There has been no elective State office filled by a Democrat from Putnam county.

James Athey, the first white person to settle in the county, 1818, was a Democrat. He, together with many more of the early settlers, were Democrats, and it was from these that most of the Democrats of today in Putnam county have descended. Among the old-time Democrats may be mentioned the following: Edward Silvey, George and Harvey Jeffries, Jacob Crosby, William Miller, Thomas Batman, Joseph Lafollett, Jesse Hymers, Philip Carpenter, William Sutherland, John Foshier, Edward Newgent, Eli Brackney, Andrew Sigler, John Sigler, Thomas Heady, William Randall, William Todd, Samuel Shinn, Thomas Jackson, James Grooms, John Matson, Henry Secrest, Samuel Wright, John Reel, Thomas McCullough, Daniel Hepler, George Hurst, Absalom Hurst, Thomas Broadstreet, Melville McHaffie, Judge Delano R. Eckles, Judge Solon Turman, James J. Smiley, Willis G. Neff, Tarvin C. Grooms, H. M. Randel, Elijah Grantham, Lewis H. Stewart, Solomon Marshall and many others just as prominent in party affairs, but who cannot be named here for lack of space.

The first Democratic newspaper was the Press, published at Greencastle, the county seat, which was established in 1858 by Howard Briggs. He continued its publication until 1887 when it was purchased by Frank A. Arnold who was then publishing the Star, and who merged the two under the name of the Star-Press. The Star had originally been founded by Mr. Arnold and Henry J. Feltus in May, 1874, as an independent paper. When the Star and Press were united it was announced that the paper would support the principles of the Democratic party. In 1903 it was consolidated with the Democrat, a weekly established by H. B. Martin about 1893, and subsequently owned by F. D. Ader and R. F. Carpenter in succession, after which the name was changed to the Star and Democrat. A short time after Mr. Carpenter disposed of his holdings in the paper to Charles J. Arnold, who is now sole owner and editor and publishes the paper weekly under the title of Herald-Democrat. Mr. Arnold also publishes a daily called the Herald. It is said that Putnam county has never failed to return a plurality for a Democratic candidate for President. At least this is true since the election of James Buchanan to the Presidency, for whom a plurality of 537 was given. Other Democratic Presidents, of whom we have any record, gave Grover Cleveland, in 1888, 445 plurality, and in 1892, 465 plurality. In 1912 she gave a plurality to Woodrow Wilson of 1,568 votes.

The present office holders are all Democrats and are as follows: James P. Hughes, Judge; Courtland C. Gillen, Prosecuting Attorney; Andrew E. Durham, Representative; Harry W. Moore, Clerk Putnam Circuit Court; Joe M. Allen, Auditor; Howard M. Harris, Sheriff; Henry H. Runyan, Treasurer; John W. Shannon, Recorder; Sylvan A. Vermillion, Assessor; L. G. Wright, Superintendent of Schools; Arthur Plummer, Surveyor; J. C. McCurry, Coroner; Charles W. Dagg, H. Witt Sutherland and Reason E. Larkin, Board of Commissioners; John H. James, County Attorney; Dr. Jerome M. King, County Health Officer; Frank Davis, Clay Bridges, John Sinclair, E. McG. Walls, David Skelton, J. B. Burris and Ora Day, members County Council.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF RANDOLPH COUNTY

By J. L. Smith

THE county of Randolph was organized January 12, 1818, thirteen months after the admission of the State of Indiana into the Federal union. Prior to this date, the land comprising this county and a vast deal more to the northward and westward had been a part of the county of Wayne. After the organization was effected, the northern point extended as far as the present city of Fort Wayne. Indeed, the incorporation papers of that prosperous city are to be found in the records at Wirchester. The early comers were settlers from the Carolinas, Maryland and Virginia. The name of the county was bestowed upon it by some of the pioneers in honor of Randolph county, North Carolina, their old home.

A glance backward through the vistas of one hundred years gives one a thrill of inspiration—of aspiration. James Monroe was then President. The "era of good feeling" had broken down all partisan barriers. The party of Jefferson, Madison and Monroe was supreme. They called themselves Republicans throughout the first two decades of the nineteenth century. During Monroe's second term the party was called Democratic-Republican, and a little later the party name of Democrat became firmly established.

Men of fine mettle, rugged in physique, great in intellect, forceful in character, were dominating factors in the young republic. President Monroe surrounded himself with men of unquestioned greatness. John Quincy Adams, past master of diplomacy, who had been called "Washington's Boy Minister," was made Secretary of State, having renounced Hamiltonian ideas. William H. Crawford, a man of sterling patriotism and fluent tongue, was Secretary of the Treasury. John C. Calhoun, the master logician, was Secretary of War. William Wirt, brilliant in oratory and the author of the "Life of Patrick Henry," was Attorney-General.

Henry Clay was speaker of the House and was acting in harmony with the party in power. Our great Chief Justice, John Marshall, famed also as author of an extended "Life of Washington," was at the head of the Supreme Court, and although a former Federalist, was now in concord with Democratic principles. Daniel Webster had been four years in Congress, and at this period was making learned addresses, setting forth the dire evils resulting to the people from such class of legislation as was embodied in the doctrine of the protective tariff.

These great men were all imbued with an unwavering zeal to make good the declarations of the preamble to the Constitution. The star of each man was not yet midway to its zenith. Andrew Jackson was the idol of heroism—the soldier behind the cotton bales at New Orleans, who brought low the banner of the haughty Pakenham, and at this particular time was driving the Seminoles into the Everglades of Florida.

In 1818 a new flag was authorized by Congress, providing for thirteen bars and a star for each State. Indiana's star was there. William Hendricks was our sole representative in the lower House, and James Noble and Waller Taylor were the United States Senators. All were Democrats. The county remained under Democratic control until the rise of the Whig party in 1840.

During those years party spirit was but little in evidence among the pioneers of Randolph county. They thought much more of carving out habitable homes for their families than they did of political affairs. There was little to divide the voters. Hamilton's concentration idea and Jefferson's "rule of the people" were practically the only antagonisms in the young Republic. The slavery question was just beginning to effervesce. When Monroe was re-elected in 1820 there was only one electoral vote cast against him, and that was cast by an elector from New Hampshire, who said that he so voted to keep any other candidate for President from rivaling Washington.

Men were usually elected to county offices without references to party fealty, although the greater number of them, if pressed for their views, would have proclaimed themselves disciples of Jefferson.

Charles Conway, an avowed Democrat, was the first clerk of the court elected in 1818. He was regularly re-elected and served until 1839, performing not only the duties of that office, but the duties that now belong to the auditor's office, and also of the recorder's office as well. The same rule of service was frequent with other county offices, particularly the county commissioners.

Ephraim Overman was the first representative to the General Assembly, serving jointly for Wayne county, with Joseph Holman and John Scott. In 1827 Daniel Worth was the sole member from Randolph, but also representing Allen county and the territory north of Madison and Hamilton counties not attached elsewhere. Andrew Aker, in 1831, was the first to represent Randolph county in the Legislature. In 1834 Andrew Aker represented Randolph, Delaware and Grant counties in the State Senate. In 1840 his brother, Michael Aker, was State Senator. The Aker families were uncompromising Jacksonians in that day.

In 1842 Edward Edger, another of the dyed-in-the-wool type of Democrats, was chosen representative from Randolph county, and that sturdy yeoman started from Deerfield early in December and walked all the way to Indianapolis to attend the session of the General Assembly. He was the father of Edward Shields Edger, present postmaster of Winchester, the latter having been born while the father was serving the State, and the babe was almost three months old before the father saw him. In passing let us be reminded that the present Governor of Indiana, the Hon. James P. Goodrich, is a grandson of that noble old Democrat.

Among the ablest men of affairs in the twenties and thirties were the judges of the courts, who made their extended circuits on horseback. No more renowned members of the Judiciary could have been found in the entire Northwest Territory than the men who held courts in Wayne and Randolph counties in those days. A few of them may be named here: John Watts, Miles C. Eggleston, Samuel Bigger, Isaac Blackford, John Sample, Charles H. Test, Oliver H. Smith, Caleb B. Smith and Jeremiah Smith. All of these men were admitted to the Randolph county bar, and practiced and served as either prosecuting attorney or judge. Few of the foregoing were residents of the county. Jeremiah Smith was an exception, but they all exerted a marked influence on public affairs in the county.

Oliver Hampton Smith was admitted to the Randolph county bar in 1825. He served as prosecuting attorney and also as judge for several years. He was a native of New Jersey, born in 1794, and came to Wayne county with his parents in 1817. He served in the State Legislature in 1827; was elected to Congress as a Jackson Democrat. In 1836, however, he united with the Whig party and was elected to the United States Senate. After his term expired he removed to Indianapolis and engaged largely in railroad enterprises. He was one of the chief promoters of the Indianapolis and Bellefontaine railroad, the old Bee Line, now a branch of the New York Central from Cleveland to Indianapolis. In 1834 he published "Recollections of a Congressional Life," and in 1857 his "Early Indiana Trials, Sketches and Reminiscences" was published after first appearing in the columns of the Indianapolis Journal. This volume contains many interesting historical facts about Randolph county, men and measures paramount in those pioneer days. Senator Smith died in Indianapolis in 1859.

Charles H. Test was admitted to the Randolph county bar in 1827. He was also prosecuting attorney by judicial appointment. His home was in Centerville, Wayne county, while serving in this district. He was a circuit judge from 1830 to 1838. Later he moved to White county. He served several different counties in the State Legislature, was also a judge of the Lafayette Circuit Court. He was Secretary of State from 1849 to 1853. He finally removed to Indianapolis, and practiced law successfully many years.

Caleb B. Smith was admitted to the bar in this county in 1829. He was also a prosecuting attorney for this circuit. His home was at Connersville. In 1832 he established the Connersville Sentinel. In 1834 he was elected a member of the General Assembly, and served five terms. From 1843 to 1849 he served in Congress as a Whig. Later removing to Indianapolis he was chosen Secretary of the Interior by President Lincoln. He resigned this position in December, 1862, to become circuit judge for Indiana. He died at Indianapolis in January, 1864.

Jeremiah Smith, familiarly called "Jere," was conspicuous as a man of affairs as well as a fine lawyer. He was a native of South Carolina, but in early youth came with his parents and settled in Randolph county in 1817, which, by the way, was a year before the county was organized. He held various public offices and filled all of them with efficient service. He was by turns county surveyor, county treasurer, prosecuting attorney, school examiner and circuit judge two separate terms, and for more than thirty years was a successful lawyer. He was associated with Oliver H. Smith in the building of the Indianapolis and Bellefontaine Railroad, later known as Indianapolis and Cleveland Straight Line Railroad. He became president of this road and also president of the Cincinnati, Union and Fort Wayne road. He was owner of the land and laid out the town of Union City, Indiana. Most of his life was spent in Winchester. He died in 1874, leaving six sons and two daughters. The sons have always been active in promoting the cause of Democracy.

Beattie McClelland, a native of the Emerald Isle, came to Randolph county in early manhood. He was admitted to the Randolph county bar in 1839. He was made probate judge in 1842, serving with credit for a period of seven years. In 1851 he was chosen as Randolph's member of the State Constitutional Convention. In 1861 he moved to Columbus, Indiana, and later served as judge of Bartholomew county. He was a forceful speaker and entertaining because of his Irish wit.

Smith Elkins was another of the prominent judges of the period, who had great force of character, as well as judicial poise. He served one term as probate judge.

Edmund B. Goodrich, grandfather of Governor James P. Goodrich on the paternal side, was also a sterling Democrat, who came from Virginia in 1831, and settled in Randolph county. He was prominent as an attorney and was elected probate judge in 1836, serving six years. He was active in business affairs, as well as in matters legal and political.

Randolph county was always anti-slavery and the Friends Church, strong in the same regard, was one of the foremost factors in molding public sentiment against slavery. With the rise of the Whig party, and later the Republican party, Democrats of prominence became few and far between. Indeed, many Democrats in this part of the country became strong Union men, and during the Civil War and afterward, many were allied with the party of Lincoln. Some became Free-Soilers, and among the staunchest remained Democratic followers of Douglas, who also stood for the preservation of the Union.

After the beginning of the Civil War—from 1860 to 1912—no Democrat was elected to a county office. Consequently, Democrats who had aspirations to enter public life sought more congenial climates, if their political principles were not reversible. Republican majorities kept mounting ever higher until they attained the ratio of about three to one. The Republican party of the county waxed mighty, and eventually became a dominant factor in State politics, and many prominent characters went forward to State and National positions. With political power came domineering arrogance toward the minority. Without hope of any victory whatever, the Democracy of Randolph always put up its ticket for every contest. The party in the county is nothing, if not militant. The fathers and sons of such families as the Smiths, the Akers, the Summers, the Davis', the Lasleys, the Shockneys, Arbogasts, Hindsleys, Fields, Sipes and Walls, not to mention others, have always gone into the tournament with banners flying.

Isaac Pusey Gray came to Randolph county in 1855, and began the practice of law in Union City in 1858. He served in the Civil War as a colonel of the 4th Indiana cavalry. He was first affiliated with the Republican party, served in the State Senate from 1868 to 1872, and the latter year became an active member of the Democratic party. In 1876 he was elected Lieutenant-Governor with James D. Williams. In the latter part of the year 1880, Governor Williams died and Mr. Gray became acting Governor to the end of the term. In 1884 Governor Gray was elected, serving the full term. He died while minister to Mexico, in 1895, and his body was brought back to Randolph county and reposes within a beautiful mausoleum at Union City. This history elsewhere has a full report of his career.

Governor Gray's two sons, Pierre and Bayard, were men of character and lived the Democratic principles in which they believed. Bayard was the owner and publisher of a Democratic paper at Frankfort, Indiana, for several years. Pierre became a successful attorney at Indianapolis.

John Enos Neff studied law with Thomas M. Browne. In 1874 he was elected Secretary of State and re-elected in 1876. After his term of office he returned to Winchester and took up the practice of law again, with Martin B. Miller, but death cut short what promised to be a brilliant career soon afterward. His Democracy was of the irrefragable brand; and he doffed his hat to no Republican Gesler.

Martin B. Miller was admitted to the bar here in 1859, practicing with Jeremiah Smith. At the outbreak of the Civil War he went forth to fight for the preservation of the Union, a Douglas Democrat, ever remaining loyal to his convictions. At the conclusion of that fratricidal conflict he was mustered out with the rank of brevet colonel. He practiced law in Winchester for many years with splendid success. In 1893 President Cleveland appointed him to a responsible position in the Pension Bureau at Washington, which place he retained until his death in 1910.

Levi W. Study was another Democratic lawyer who fought for his party most zealously and indefatigably, but never held a public office. He was admitted to the bar in 1872, and achieved marked success. But in 1886 he died, cutting off what promised to be a splendid legal career. Ralph Study, a son, is now a prominent member of the legal fraternity in New York City.

Garland D. Williamson, a native of Pennsylvania, and a soldier in the Civil War, came to Winchester and began the practice of the law in 1880. In 1894 he was appointed circuit judge by Governor Claude Matthews, to fill a vacancy occasioned by the election of Judge Leander J. Monks to the supreme bench of the State. In 1895 he bought the Winchester Democrat, and conducted it several months, selling out to J. L. Smith in October of that year. Judge Williamson was always active in party service and a judicious counselor. The arrogance of the opposition always bumped up against an immovable obstruction when an attempt was made to ride over him. He was appointed postmaster at Ridgeville by President Wilson in 1913, still serving with commendable faithfulness.

Emerson E. McGriff, now judge of the Jay county Circuit Court, is a native of Randolph county, and began the practice of law here in 1885. In the same year he was appointed by Governor Isaac P. Gray to the office of Prosecuting Attorney, serving until the election in 1886. In 1895 Mr. McGriff moved to Portland, Indiana, where he pursued his profession with honor and the confidence of his clients until he was exalted to the bench by the Democrats of Jay county in 1916.

Frederick S. Caldwell was admitted to the bar in 1890, having served as principal and superintendent of the Winchester schools prior to that time. He has been credited as being one of the foremost lawyers of Indiana, and for many years has been a loyal mainstay of his party in the Democratic county organization. He was appointed to the Appellate Court in 1913, by Governor Samuel M. Ralston, to fill out the unexpired term of Judge A. A. Adams; and was nominated and elected by the Democratic party in 1914, still serving in that tribunal.

At intervals during the period of the Civil War, the Democrats of Randolph county established newspapers in Winchester and Union City, but the tenure of their existence was of brief duration. It was not until 1885 that a newspaper was founded that has enjoyed continued existence up to the present time. This was the Winchester Democrat, now at its greatest height in worth and influence. The paper was established by J. R. Polk. In the same year the Ridgeville Banner was purchased by Mr. Polk and consolidated with the Democrat. A few years later the Democrat was sold to Joseph Gorrell, who successfully edited it until 1893 when he sold it to Lew G. Ellingham. Mr. Gorrell went from here to Winamac, Ind., and bought the Winamac Democrat, which he still publishes. Mr. Ellingham published the Democrat here until the latter part of 1894, when he removed to Adams county and started the Decatur Democrat. In 1910 and 1912 Mr. Ellingham was elected Secretary of State, and after his retirement in 1915, he bought a half interest in the Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette, which is one of the acknowledged leaders in moulding public opinion in harmony with Democratic ideals.

The Fawcett brothers in 1894 brought to the county another plant and continued the Democrat, publishing it for a few months, later selling it to Garland D. Williamson. The latter published it until October, 1895, when it was sold to J. L. Smith, former owner of the Vermilion County Democrat. Mr. Smith put in an entire new plant, and conducted the paper until March, 1897, when he removed to Richmond, Indiana, and became half owner of the Richmond Sun. Meanwhile, the Democrat was conducted by three of four publishers in 1897 and 1898, in the latter year becoming the property of Alva C. Hindsley, who later served as deputy in the Secretary of State's office, under Mr. Ellingham. Mr. Hindsley sold the paper to L. C. Rockwell in 1911, and in July the same year, D. W. Callahan, the present owner, purchased the plant. For many years the Democrat was the only paper in the county advocating Jeffersonian principles.

In 1872 a Democratic paper called the Independent was started at Union City by W. R. Hedgepath, and advocated the election of Horace Greeley. It suspended soon after the election of that year.

The Union City Eagle was founded in 1863 by L. G. Dines. The paper was Republican in politics, undergoing the common lot of most county newspapers, that of frequent changes of ownership, passing through the hands of half a dozen owners until 1914, when its politics were changed and it became a full-fledged Democratic paper under the control of Don C. Ward. In 1915 Mr. Ward became postmaster at Union City, and a stock company was organized to conduct the paper, which issues both a daily and weekly edition. The paper was instrumental in making Union City a Democratic municipality, and holding control now for more than six years.

Another Democratic paper published at Union City, called the Plaindealer, was established by Stephen M. Wentworth in 1877. It was published for about six years, when it was sold and consolidated with another local plant, and Democracy was left without an organ. At the present time the Winchester Democrat and the Union City Eagle are staunch defenders of the faith of Democracy—ardent backers of Woodrow Wilson.

Because of the fact that no Democratic newspapers, prior to 1885, have enjoyed continuous existence, it is impossible to get any correct data as to the organization of the party in Randolph county earlier than that year. Many times a man was chosen for chairman who served merely during the campaign, and the organization was only temporary. With a Republican opposition three to four times greater, there was but little incentive to maintain an organization. In 1888 Sol C. Brown of Ward township was elected county chairman. Two years later Frederick S. Caldwell was chosen and served two years. He was followed by Erastus C. Lollar; G. D. Williamson served from 1892 to 1894; Charles C. Smith served in 1896 to 1898; Clifton M. Kelley from 1898 to 1900; Edward M. Semans from 1900 to 1904; Alva C. Hindsley from 1904 to 1910; E. S. Edger from 1910 to 1915, and D. W. Callahan from that date to the present time.

On account of the division in the Republican party brought about by the uprising of the Progressive party in 1912, the Democrats elected nearly all of their county ticket that year, the first time that party had elected a candidate since the Civil War. The Hon. Clarence S. Pierce of Union City was elected a member of the General Assembly and served with distinction in the session of 1915. Bert. E. Woodbury was elected Prosecuting Attorney for the 25th judicial district, the only Democrat ever chosen in the county to that office. Joseph C. Gard was elected county clerk, and is still faithfully performing the duties of the office. John C. Henning has served two terms as sheriff and won deserved popularity by his ability and generous impulses of heart and hand. William W. Smullen and Clarence Mullen were elected as county commissioners, serving out their terms honorably and retiring with the esteem of all the people. The county coroner, David C. Roney, also a Democrat, was elected, but on account of ill health resigned in 1913 and Dr. Sater Nixon filled out the term. In 1914 the Democrats elected seven of the twelve township trustees of Randolph county. By the aid of the Democratic votes, also, Judge Theodore Shockney, nominated on the Progressive ticket, was exalted to the circuit court bench, where he is serving the people of the county with marked distinction, and with a just sense of equity and clearness of judicial vision.

Contingent upon the election of a Democratic board of county commissioners, came the privilege of appointing numerous other men to office. Dr. J. H. Moroney was appointed as secretary of the county board of health. Henry Judy was appointed superintendent of the County Infirmary. Both of these officers serve four years. Robert A. Jellison was appointed road superintendent. Abner Davis was made custodian of the court house. John A. Shockney became county attorney and Dr. Clifton M. Kelley physician to the poor.

Two townships, namely Jackson and Ward, have for two generations been strongly Democratic. In these the Democrats have always elected their township officers. In municipal affairs Union City has been Democratic for ten or twelve years, electing mayors and a majority of the members of the city council.

Again we repeat that among the faithful none are more faithful than those who stanchly defend their principles against tyrannical majorities. They have met the bristling phalanxes of Republican opposition and have gone down in defeat "with heads bloody but unbowed." With the heroism of an Arnold Wilkenreid they have breasted the spears of the serried ranks of the army of special privilege and came back to the arena again to battle.

Jeffersonian democracy is the fruit of liberty. Its creed is the Declaration of Independence. Its pivotal idea is equal rights to all men. Government must come from the consent of the governed. Democracy means unimpeded progress along the broadway to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." No hereditary bondsman can be a Democrat. No sycophant, no mendicant, no truckler, no hypocrite can utter the language of Democracy. It is not spoken by autocrat or despot except for intrigue and chicanery. Democracy is made counterfeit when the self-seeker feigns to speak for "the people." By treachery he attains tyranny. The golden rule embodies the gospel of Democracy. Every man must be granted that degree of equality that shall enable him to be what God intended he should be. These are some of the fundamental ideals that actuate the Democratic sons of old Randolph. Talk not of Spartan fortitude when courage would be emblazoned on the escutcheon of political integrity—turn to Randolph's Democratic sons. Leonidas at Thermopylae stood for savagery to the death. Democrats of Randolph stand for eternal verities in life as well as death.

"They never fail who die

In a great cause; the block may soak their gore,
Their heads may sodden in the sun; their limbs
Be strong to city gates and castle walls—
But still their spirits walk abroad. Though years
Elapse, and others share as dark a doom,
They but augment the deep and sweeping thoughts,

Which overpower all others, and conduct
The world at last to freedom."

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF RIPLEY COUNTY

By Peter Holzer

THE territory of Ripley county belongs to the Grouseland purchase, and with Dearborn, Ohio, Switzerland, Jennings and Jefferson counties, was in the possession of the whites soon after the commencement of the present century. The first white person known to have been in the county was a man by the name of Ross. He wandered up Laughery creek, and after reaching the mouth of a little branch at a point on this stream one mile east of the present location of Versailles, he was discovered by the Indians. To make his escape he ran up that little creek, which, in memory of this occurrence, has always been called "Ross' Run." It is supposed by some of the old citizens that this man Ross was one of the Archibald Laughery party that were attacked by Indians in 1781 at the mouth of Laughery creek, on the bank of the Ohio river, within the boundary of the present Ohio county.

The first settlements in the county were made in Shelby township by Daniel and Henry Wooley, in 1814. Daniel entered his land in this township, near Versailles, but he did not come and settle on it until 1817. Soon after Daniel Wooley came and settled in Shelby township, followed shortly after by Henry Yater, Jesse Cole, the Bartlett and Brown families, James King, P. Young, John Kirby, James McKaskey, George Wagner, John McDowell and William McLuser. These all came before the close of the year 1818. John Snodgrass was the first settler in Franklin township. He came in 1815, before the close of the year. Sanfred Hawley, Robertson Gookins, Esquire Robertson, Philip Newfarth, Samuel Montgomery and John Chamberland had settled here. In the spring of 1816 the Wallace, Shanes and Delay families became citizens of the present Franklin township. A settlement was made in 1815 in Adams township by Richard Workman, Thomas Sunman and several families of McKees. At a later date George Clark and Thomas Summerville also settled in this township. Another settlement was made about the same time in Laughery township by a man named Ball. It is supposed that he came in the spring of 1815. Walter Thackery and Robert Birchfield located in the fall of the same year.

The first settlement in Brown township was made by John Herson in 1815. Before the close of the year 1818 the following early settlers were living in Brown township: Richard Galaband, Moses Roberts, James Curry, A. Young, Ira Young, Isaac Paugh, David Runner, Lewis Meyers, Jacob Hewit, Frederick Buba, James Benham, Thomas Spencer, John Holgarth and Zebulon Brason. The latter was a famous hunter and claimed the honor of killing 108 wolves in Ripley county.

The first settler in Johnson township, about Versailles, was John Hunter, who located in 1816. Before the close of the next year the following persons were living in the township: Benjamin Purcell, Thomas Davis, Thomas Kern, afterward Probate Judge; Charles Lewis, James Muir, Thomas Logiston, Thomas Goodrich and Garrison Bossal. In 1818 Henry Yater, Silas Reed, James Dickerson, William Holman, Joseph McCluska, John Rea—afterward Sheriff of the county; William Holland, Jacob Kiser, Colonel Smith and Presley Gray settled.

Ripley county was organized by an act of the Legislature of 1817-18 and named in honor of General E. W. Ripley, an officer of the war of 1812. The first Circuit Court met at the house of Benjamin Brown at New Marion on the 23d of July, 1818. John Test, presiding Judge of the Third Judicial Circuit, and John Richey and Thomas Currie, Associate Judges, were present. The only business transacted at this session was the adoption of a county seal.

The March term, 1819, of the Circuit Court was held at Versailles, according to the orders made at New Marion, at the July session, in 1818. At this term John Watts appeared and presented his commission as presiding Judge and the oath of office was administered to him by Jesse L. Holman. The first case in this court was presented in assumpsit, Jeremiah Burchfield against Cyrus Webster. This case resulted in a personal encounter, in which Burchfield received a severe drubbing. Webster was indicted for assault and battery, and at the October term, 1819, pleading guilty, was fined one dollar and cost.

The first term of the Probate Court was held at New Marion, in the house of Benjamin Brown, November 9, 1818, the associate judges presiding. The court simply met, organized and adjourned, to meet at the house of Joseph Bently, in Versailles, on the 15th day of March, 1819. The first business of this court was the appointment of John Johnson, guardian of Richson Blair, orphan of James Blair, deceased.

The Board of County Commissioners met on the 11th day of May, 1818. Present, the Commissioners: James Wooley, William Buchanan and Freeburn Hall. They divided the county at this meeting into three townships—Graham, Perry and Laughery. They ordered an election in each township to elect justices of the peace, and appointed David Wooley inspector of election in Graham township, William Buchanan in Perry, and Samuel Hodes in Laughery.

The county officers then elected were: Clerk and Recorder, Conrad Overturf; Treasurer, Roswell Johnson; Sheriff, Benjamin Kirby; Prosecuting Attorney, Nathaniel French.

The first grand jurors of the county were Henry Banta, Jerry Salyers, Samuel Overturf, James Whitham, Wilson Buchanan, William Buchanan, Charles Divan, Jacob Roberts, Henry O'Neil, Jerry Talbot, Mathew H. Patton, Daniel Wooley, Jacob Kirby, John McDowell, Joseph Clark, Bartless Brown, Carney Goodrich and James Steel. This grand jury met, and having no business, they reported to the court and were discharged.

The first attorneys admitted to practice law in the courts of Ripley county were Nathaniel French and William Hendricks.

Before 1876 politics in Ripley county was largely personal. Political campaigns were not conducted as they are today. County chairmen were not looked upon as of much importance, except to call the county convention, at which the ticket was named. After the ticket was in the field the candidates usually organized the campaign themselves and worked in groups of twos and threes. For instance, the candidate for Sheriff and Treasurer would work one end of the county, while the candidate for Auditor and Representative would be working some other part of the county. The plan was to work for the whole ticket as they went along. But if they found a voter who was displeased with any portion of the ticket they usually made a note of him and notified the candidate who seemed to displease him. He in turn then called upon him and often succeeded in adjusting matters. This method of campaigning was kept up to greater or less extent until possibly 1880, when the county chairman and county organization became a more important factor, and the county began to be organized along lines in which politics is worked today.

No record was kept of the early county chairmen, but the following names have been preserved as chairmen of Ripley county, beginning back with 1882: George R. Griffin, T. L. Hughes, James B. Lloyd, John Spencer, James Lemon, James M. Singer, Nicholas Cornet, James E. Wright, O. R. Jenkins and W. P. Castner, the present County Chairman. During that time the Democrats won twelve complete victories out of seventeen campaigns. They elected the majority of the county officers in 1886 and in 1888, when the State went Republican.

There is no record of the vote for President in Ripley county prior to 1876, but it is safe to assume that it gave a Republican majority. In 1876 Mr. Tilden carried the county by 215 votes, Mr. Hancock also carrying the county by seventy-one votes, Cleveland in 1884 by 127 votes, Cleveland in 1892 by 192 votes, Bryan in 1896 by 19 votes, and Bryan again in 1908 by 89 votes, and Wilson in 1912 by 939 votes.

Ripley county has been represented in the State Legislature by the following Democrats: Thomas Sunman, Adam G. Hoyer, John B. Kennedy, James B. Lloyd, Davidson Ray, Chester R. Faulkner, Robert Creigmile, L. C. Tucker, Madison Holman, Frank Galbraith, George C. Bos, William Holland, F. M. Alexander, James M. Singer and Rowland Jackson. While none of these men have ever achieved any national prominence, they all served in the State Legislature with credit to themselves and honor to the party. Nor is it on record that any of them is the author of any great constructive piece of legislation. All of them were either farmers, lawyers or business men and returned to their former occupation after leaving the halls of the Legislature. To this general rule there was one exception, Chester R. Faulkner, who became the private secretary of Hon. Daniel W. E. Voorhees, and also held a position as Chief of the Recording Division of the Pension Department, and at the time of his death was superintendent of one of the public buildings at Washington, D. C. Mr. Faulkner came into prominence in 1878 when Ripley, Dearborn and Rush counties were joined together, forming a representative district with a normal Republican majority of 1,000. The republicans had nominated Colonel Wolfe of Rushville, and it seemed almost a forlorn hope to take the nomination against him. Mr. Faulkner volunteered to accept the nomination and make the fight. Of course, it was tendered him by acclamation. He set to work at once to make a personal canvass in the three counties, and imagine Colonel Wolfe's surprise, as well as the surprise of everyone else when Mr. Faulkner was elected. Nicholas Cornet, one of the county chairmen of Ripley county, also served as Auditor of Ripley county for one term and is at present a member of the Joint Land Commission of Panama. One other Ripley county Democrat has also been successful in working his way up to a position in the national government, Kennie F. Rea, son of Davidson Rea, who was appointed a page in the House of Representatives through the influence of Hon. W. S. Holman and is today Chief Clerk of the Committee on Appropriations.

The people of Ripley county are practically an agricultural people, and there are no large cities. The early settlers were kept busy clearing away the forests and draining the "flats," as were also their immediate descendants, and but very little attention was paid to office holding. However, they were not indifferent to the great political questions of the day and kept themselves fully informed on them and the names of her citizens that appear on the roster of the country's defenders attest their patriotism. Ripley county has always kept pace with the other parts of the State in the development of her schools and her farming industries. Being a people devoted largely to agriculture probably accounts for the fact that none of her citizens have aspired to high political honors, and not because they lacked ability, but because their training and business interests led in other directions. The result of their labors are seen today in the splendid farms and farm buildings, of which none better can be found anywhere in this section of our great State.

Ripley county has two Democratic newspapers. The Osgood Journal, at Osgood, which is the older of the two, was founded in 1868 by Adam Stockinger and has been owned and edited by the following gentlemen: Samuel Pappet, John B. Day, Nick R. Pappet, George R. Griffin, Charles Gray, Everett and Clarence Shockley, Shockley & Anger and by Richard J. Beer, who is the present owner and editor. Charles Gray, one of the editors of the Journal, was a perfect double of William J. Bryan and was often mistaken for Mr. Bryan. The Democratic Herald, at Batesville, was established in October, 1892, and was owned by a stock company. Its first issue appeared on October 13 of that year. Its first editor was Robert Bragg. It was then edited successively by B. F. Jackson, Charles Johnson, Charles Ebel, Charles L. Johnson, A. G. Nusbaumer, Peter Holzer and Peter Holzer and Charles V. Hirt, who are the present owners. Both newspapers enjoy wide popularity and are in excellent financial condition.

The present county officers are all Democrats. They are: State Senator, Rowland Jackson, representing the counties of Ripley, Switzerland and Jefferson; Representative, George Bos; Judge of the Circuit Court, Robert A. Creigmil, for Ripley, Jennings and Scott; Auditor, J. Francis Lochard; Clerk of the Circuit Court, Josiah P. Day; Treasurer, John N. Hess; Recorder, Howard L. Akers; Sheriff, Henry Bultman; Surveyor, James E. Wright; County Superintendent of Schools, Charles R. Hertenstein; County Assessor, Frank Talbett; County Attorney, William Huntington; County Commissioners, Charles Mehrle, Henry Lemon and A. J. Chance; County Coroner, M. L. Samms. Ten of the eleven Township Trustees are Democrats.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF RUSH COUNTY

By Howard E. Barrett, Esq.

RUSH COUNTY lies just a little southeast from our capitol city. Rushville, the county seat, located near the center of the county, is forty miles by rail. By the treaty of St. Marys, Ohio, October 2-6, 1818, the Delaware Indians ceded to the United States all their claims to land in the State of Indiana. Prior to that treaty the region now comprising eastern and central Indiana, from the Ohio northwest to White river, lay in the shadow of an unbroken forest, through which roamed bands of Indian hunters and warriors and the wild beasts native to it. The old boundary of this purchase was about half way between Connersville and the present east line of Rush county, which is a part of the territory thus acquired.

The Legislature of 1821 passed an act for the formation of a new county west of Franklin and Fayette counties and at the suggestion of Dr. William B. Laughlin, who was then a member of the Legislature, the name of the new county was called Rush, in honor of his old preceptor, the distinguished Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia.

Jonathan Jennings, the first Governor of the State of Indiana, approved the act for the formation of the new county December 31, 1821, and the act became effective April 1, 1822, at which time Amaziah Morgan, Jehu Perkins and John Julian, county commissioners, John Hays, sheriff, and Robert Thompson, clerk, met at Perkins' house five miles southeast of the present city of Rushville and proceeded to organize the new county of Rush and ordered an election to be held on the 27th of the same month.

At the second meeting of the Board of County Commissioners, held on the 10th day of May, 1822, tavern rates were fixed as follows: Whisky, per half pint, 12½ cents; all foreign spirits, 50 cents per half pint; peach and apple brandy, 25 cents per half pint; gin, 25 cents per half pint; every meal, 25 cents; bed, 6¼ cents; corn or oats, 12½ cents per gallon; horse standing at hay over night, 18½ cents. To provide revenue for public expenses personal property was assessed as follows: Every horse, mare, mule or ass over three years old, 37½ cents; every yoke of oxen over three years old, 25 cents per head; every four-wheeled pleasure carriage, etc., $1.25; every two-wheeled carriage, $1.00; every gold watch, 50 cents; every silver watch, 20 cents; on each male person over the age of twenty-one years, 50 cents. The first allowance made out of the county funds was $25.00 to Benjamin Sailors for listing the property of the county. The assessed valuation of the real estate in Rush county for the year 1916 was $14,769,125.00 and the personal property $5,947,810.00. The total amount of taxes collected for the last year was $616,050.99.

The early pioneers of Rush county came largely from the South, especially Kentucky and Carolina, and were from Democratic stock. At the first presidential election held in the county, in 1824, Andrew Jackson received 119 votes and Henry Clay received 108 votes. Fifteen votes were cast for Adams. During a period of sixteen years following, the total vote increased to 1,914 and the Democratic majority to 420. But the memorable campaign of 1840 carried the county into the Whig column, Harrison receiving a majority of 356 over Van Buren out of a total vote of 2,696. It remained there till 1856, the birth year of the Republican party, when Buchanan had forty-one plurality over Fremont out of a total vote of 3,414. The fact that a majority of the men of Rush county had southern blood in their veins adds interest to the vote which reflected their political sentiments. In 1860 Breckinridge and Johnson, ultra southern candidates, received only 476 votes; Douglas and Johnson, 1,119; Lincoln and Hamlin, 1,757, and Bell and Everett, 35. With a few exceptions the county has continued to be Republican the greater part of the time since the war, with varying majorities. The Democrats elected their county ticket in 1876, although Hayes received a majority of 266 over Tilden. In 1912 the Democrats elected their ticket and a part of it in 1914.

NEWSPAPERS.

It is no longer possible to make an accurate list of Rush county's newspapers and their owners and editors in their proper order. William D. M. Wickham, the pioneer printer, printed the first paper, a small sheet, about ten by twelve inches, called the Dog Fennel Gazette. He printed it on a sycamore stump, using a pole lever to make the impression. Later he built a better one of timbers. In September, 1831, he issued the first number of the American, its neat appearance indicating better facilities. It had four four-column pages and lasted about two years. He soon made a third venture with a paper called the Gazette, of about the same size but not so attractive in appearance. His papers followed the policies of Andrew Jackson. Following him Samuel Davis and Thomas Wallace started the Herald, a Whig paper. About 1840 Donovan and Tizzard bought it, changed the name to the Hoosier and Democratic Archive and switched it over to the Democracy. Samuel Bratton bought them out and renamed it the Jacksonian. In 1873 George H. Puntenney and William E. Wallace bought the paper and successfully managed it, most of the time in partnership, for thirty-four years, Mr. Puntenney retiring in 1900. In July, 1907, Mr. Wallace sold the paper to a new company, the Democrat Publishing Company. The paper is now owned and published by R. W. Noyer and is run as a daily.

Surely the Democrats have good reason to be proud of the part played by members of their party in the history and development of this county. Among those who have taken a prominent part in this work the writer would mention the following:

Amaziah Morgan, of whom the late Dr. Arnold, in writing a history of Rush county, said: "I must notice a few of our early political leaders. Amaziah Morgan was the most able and distinguished of these. He was one of the first county commissioners, and by his energy and executive ability did much to organize and put in motion the machinery of county business. He was really a great man, fully meeting the requirements of those days, and representing the wishes, wants and feelings of his constituents. He had a strong, practical mind, with all the qualities necessary for a leader in pioneer life. Brave, hospitable, generous and public-spirited, he possessed a rough, earnest eloquence that produced a powerful influence on his auditors, and gave him a wonderful popularity and influence. He served about one year as county commissioner and then resigned, and was elected the first representative of Rush county. He served in this office two years and was then elected to the State Senate, serving about nine or ten years. During this time he was unquestionably the most able and popular politician of our county. He was one of the leading spirits of the Senate, and his influence was felt all over the State. Nature had been generous to him both physically and mentally. Tall and erect, with well-cut and strongly-marked features, a full and clear black eye, alike capable of expressing the fiercest passion or the most tender emotion. A strong, clear voice, an earnest delivery and an imposing presence gave additional force to his impassioned utterances. At home he was careless in his attire, generally wearing linsey pantaloons, a buckskin hunting-shirt, with a belt around the waist, a soft hat or coon-skin cap, no boots or shoes on his feet; with his long rifle on his shoulder, he looked the genuine backwoodsman, ever ready to help to raise a house or roll the logs for his neighbors and to bear his part in the shooting matches, then so popular."

William S. Hall was elected a justice of the peace for Washington township in 1839 and served until 1847. In 1853 he was elected trustee of the same township and held the office until 1862, when he resigned and accepted the nomination for representative in the State Legislature upon the Democratic ticket. He was elected by a good majority and served during the exciting session of 1863. At the close of his term as legislator he was once more elected trustee of his home township and served continuously until 1878. He was indeed a "forward looking Democrat." His heart was set upon the common schools as the best means of giving the boys and girls a good start in life. His interest in the country schools and the study of how to better them amounted to almost a passion with him. Feeling that the country child, even up to a few years back, was yet hampered as he had been in his chance for a good education, with prophetic foresight he early dreamed of creating a township central school that would, without private outlay, give an education the equal of any academy or high school in the city. He was the pioneer of the centralized county school system, and held the honor of having established the first school of the kind in the United States, and in the little town of Raleigh, Rush county, Indiana. He was the father of a large and influential family, among whom is Hon. Frank J. Hall, Lieutenant-Governor (1909-1913). Mr. Hall died May 5, 1905, at the age of ninety-one years.

One of the most positive and forceful characters among the Democrats of Rush county was George H. Puntenney, lawyer and editor of the Rushville Jacksonian from 1873 to 1900. He was known as a lawyer of much originality and marked ability. The Rushville Jacksonian while he was its editor was a power for democracy in this section of the State. His early training was according to the Republican faith, but after the Civil War, in which he served for three years, ranking as Sergeant Major, he espoused the cause of democracy and the fearlessness of his tongue and pen were recognized by all who came within the circle of his acquaintance. He was a close student of public questions and had the courage of his convictions. He was the first mayor of the city of Rushville.

So far as the writer has been able to learn, Mr. Puntenney was the first to offer proof, in the campaign of 1896, that gold and silver were coined at the ratio of 16 to 1 in the days of Abraham. From an article on this subject, published in his paper in the issue of September 10 of that year, I quote the following:

"Now, the silver shekel weighed about one-half ounce. It was twice the weight of the golden shekel and worth 50 to 62½ cents. Now, since the golden shekel was worth $4.00 and was only half as heavy as the silver shekel was, then two golden shekels were worth $8.00—sixteen times as much as the silver shekel and about its weight. That is sixteen to one. So the Hebrews came as near having the ratio of sixteen to one as we had before silver was demonetized."

Mr. Puntenny died on June 1, 1910, at the age of eighty-two years.

Ben L. Smith was another of the sturdy Democrats that have done much to make Rush county democracy what it is. A lifelong Democrat, born and reared in the county, educated in its common schools and at Asbury University, a soldier in the Civil War for three years, ranking as captain, prominent and successful as a lawyer for over forty-five years, member of the board of trustees of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans Home near Knightstown, in this county, for a number of years, where he served with honor and credit to himself and his party. He retired from the active practice of the law January 1, 1915, and died at his home here in Rushville on the 25th day of December, 1915, at the age of eighty years.

John L. Robinson was another of the prominent men in the early history of Rush county. He was elected clerk of the Circuit Court in 1843 and was afterwards elected to Congress from the fourth district when Rush county was in that district. He was United States Marshal for the district of Indiana from 1856 to 1860. During all of his long and useful career he was ever ready with voice and pen to advocate the cause of Democracy.

David S. Morgan of this county was one of the very truest and most consistent Democrats among the many that fought the battles of Democracy in this section. He was a prominent attorney at the bar of the Rush Circuit Court for many years and stood at the front rank among the lawyers.

To mention all those who are at present taking an active part in the affairs of the Democratic party would be to practically make a list of the Democratic voters of the county, for Democrats here are awake and are as well organized as any other county in the State. Among those who have occupied positions in the party that gave to them more prominence, perhaps, than others, the writer would mention the following:

Hon. Douglas Morris, judge of the Circuit Court from 1898 to 1904, and judge of the Supreme Court from 1910 to 1916. Ever ready and willing to do his part to further the interests of the party in any capacity he might be called to work.

Frank J. Hall, lifelong enthusiastic worker for democracy, Lieutenant-Governor from 1909 to 1913, a fearless and consistent Democrat, son of William S. Hall.

Cary Jackson, representative from this county in the State Legislature during the sixty-fifth session and trustee of Washington township from August, 1890, to August, 1895. Elected to represent the district composed of the counties of Hancock, Rush and Fayette, in the State Senate during the session of 1913.

Leonidas H. Mull, lifelong consistent Democrat, always ready with his money and his time to assist the Democrats of the county and the State to hold up the banner of Democracy. He was elected representative from this county to the State Legislature by a handsome majority when all the remainder of the county ticket was defeated.

Will M. McBride, a Democratic descendant from the old stock. Made an enviable record as trustee of our Rushville city schools and was twice elected treasurer of this county, serving from 1910 to 1914.

John D. Megee, for many years past one of the most prominent lawyers of the county and at all times a Democratic worker. State committeeman from the sixth district for a number of years, appointed judge of the Rush Circuit Court by Governor Ralston and served for about two years, his term expiring the first of January, 1915.

Allen R. Holden, for three years a trustee of our city schools and auditor of Rush county from 1912 to 1916, and an enthusiastic Democrat at all times and under all circumstances.

Arie M. Taylor, a royal Democrat, one of the leading educators of the county for a number of years and elected clerk of the Circuit Court, serving from December, 1912, to December, 1916, with much credit to himself, as well as his party.

Voorhees Cavit, county chairman for the last campaign, twice elected sheriff of this county and serving his second term at this time. Popular with all classes and a Democrat without apology.

James T. Arbuckle, Democrat of the old school, always a loyal and enthusiastic worker. Prominent lawyer for many years. Deputy prosecutor from 1900 to 1904, member of the city school board from 1910 to 1913 when he resigned to accept an appointment as member of the State Board of Pardons. tendered him by Governor Ralston. Grand Master of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, 1914-1915.

Benjamin A. Black, prominent business man for many years. Served as mayor of the city of Rushville for four years, 1910 to 1914. Always an enthusiastic worker.

Adolphus Cameron, a young and enthusiastic Democrat. Twice elected county surveyor and served with much credit to himself and all his friends.

Oliver C. Norris, a Silver Republican Democrat since the memorable campaign of 1896, a loyal and enthusiastic worker. Elected to the State Legislature and served during the session of 1915. Great Sachem of the Imp. O. R. M., 1910 to 1911.

George W. Campbell, another Silver Republican Democrat, and one of the prominent lawyers of this county for many years. One time prosecutor of the district composed of Rush and Decatur counties. An able and forceful advocate of Democratic policies.

Wallace Morgan, son of the late David S. Morgan, prominent lawyer at this time. Served as county chairman for two terms, city attorney for two years and county attorney for two years. Always an enthusiastic worker for the Democracy.

Samuel L. Trabue, county chairman for two terms preceding the last campaign. A consistent, loyal and enthusiastic worker for the Democratic party at all times.

Samuel L. Innis, an able attorney and for three years a member of the Rushville city school board, and at all times a Democrat.

Donald L. Smith, an attorney, son of the late Ber L. Smith and prosecuting attorney for Rush county, 1913-1915, by appointment by Governor Ralston.

W. L. Newbold, lawyer, Democratic county chairman for two terms, deputy prosecuting attorney for one term, and afterwards editor and one of the publishers of the Rushville Jacksonian for several years.

John E. Gantner, present secretary of the Democratic county committee and for three sessions of the Legislature chief engrossing clerk for the Senate. John Kelley, Sr., chief doorkeeper for the State Senate, session of 1913.

Gesten P. Hunt, always an ardent Democrat and at present postmaster of Rushville. Will S. Meredith, postmaster of Rushville during one of the Cleveland administrations. Mark Purcell, deputy postmaster under Postmaster Meredith and for two years Democratic county chairman of Rush county.

Will Leach, a staunch Democrat and the present city chairman of Rushville. Rush G. Budd, an old-line Democrat and is at this time one of the trustees of the epileptic village at Newcastle, having been appointed to that position by Governor Ralston in 1915.

In view of the long, tardy recognition of the rights of the women of our country—now about to be shown by all the States—the writer feels that no more fitting close to this article could be made than a few lines from a historical sketch of Rush county, written by the late John F. Moses, entitled, "The Pioneer Woman."

"Men write histories and figure most in them. Up to this point little has been said about woman's part in this wilderness life. The hardships were by no means all man's, nor the toil. She cooked at the open fireplace, stooping at most of this work, with her head exposed to the heat. Her equipment of kitchen furniture was meager. There were a few iron pots, a skillet or two, a 'Dutch oven' for the baking, a crane in the chimney for the mush and hominy pot, a few gourd dippers and a few dishes and knives. She made the soap, hackled the flax, carded the wool, spun and dyed the yarn, wove the cloth, cut and made the family clothing; and blankets, sheets and towels were the product of her industry and skill. She gathered herbs and was the family doctor. She bore and raised the children. With all these manifold duties she found time to help out with the corn planting or hoeing. Her willing hands were ever busy with acts of neighborly kindness. She sat by the sick bed and comforted the troubled. Her womanly virtues and graces gave the hard life of that time such refinement as it had. She was the best part of the church and she taught her daughters to be modest and homekeepers and her sons to be good men. With brave heart she toiled through her allotted years, then slipped away into some little graveyard to rest. It may be that its fences have long since rotted down and the cattle trample upon her grave or the plow goes over it today, but on that last day when the Book of Remembrance is opened, she will come forth to her reward."

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF ST. JOSEPH COUNTY

THE county of St. Joseph is in the middle of the northernmost tier of counties of Indiana. To the east are the counties of Elkhart, LaGrange and Steuben; to the west, those of LaPorte, Porter and Lake. On the south are the counties of Marshall and Starke, and on the North is the county of Berrien, in the State of Michigan. The northern part of the county is in the St. Joseph Valley, and the southern part in the Kankakee region. A goodly number of lakes were once within the territorial limits of the county. Of these most have become extinct through various causes, but those remaining constitute a source of joy to thousands who have a fondness for healthful outings, for invigorating boating, and for exhilarating fishing. The most important of the remaining lakes are the Notre Dame, the Chain and Bass Lakes in Warren township, west of South Bend, and Hudson Lake near New Carlisle.

St. Joseph county's organization was effected under an act of the General Assembly, approved January 29, 1830. The first election in conformity with this act was held on the first Monday in August, 1830. At this election Lathrop M. Taylor was chosen Clerk and Recorder, and Lambert McCombs, Adam Smith and Levi F. Arnold were chosen as justices of the peace. The board of justices held its first meeting at the house of Alexis Coquillard, August 27, 1830. At this meeting John D. Lasly was appointed Treasurer. His bond was fixed at $1,000. Assessors and collectors were also appointed at this meeting. Licenses were granted the American Fur Company (Alexis Coquillard, agent), and to Samuel Hanna & Co., of Fort Wayne (Lathrop M. Taylor, agent), to vend foreign merchandise within the county of St. Joseph for the term of one year. The fee for this privilege was $10 each.

The last (fourth) meeting of the board of justices was held November 12, 1830. By an act of the General Assembly, approved January 19, 1831, a board of county commissioners was substituted for the board of justices. Under this act a county government was provided for and the various officers serving thereunder were required to be chosen by popular election. The first board of commissioners chosen was composed of Aaron Stanton, David Miller and Joseph Rohrer. South Bend was in 1831 made the seat of justice for the newly-organized county. Lathrop M. Taylor served seven years as clerk and recorder. This office combined the duties of clerk, auditor and recorder. Taylor was succeeded by Tyra W. Bray, who also held the office for seven years. John F. Lindsay, the last clerk under the constitution of 1816, was in office from 1844 to 1851. Under the constitution of 1851 the tenure of the county clerk's office was reduced to four years with the right to one re-election. Samuel M. Chord was elected in 1851 and re-elected four years later. Elias V. Clark held the office from 1859 to 1867; George W. Matthews, to 1875; Captain Edwin Nicar, to 1879; Timothy E. Howard, to 1883; George H. Alward succeeded Howard, but died November 11, 1885, and by appointment was succeeded by his son, George H., who served until 1887. In 1886 William C. McMichael was elected clerk, being succeeded by George M. Fountain in 1895. In 1903, George H. Alward became clerk by election, and in 1907 he was succeeded by Frank P. Christoph. The present incumbent of this office is George M. Raab. Fourteen different individuals have filled this important office since the organization of the county. Edwin Nicar was elected by a combination of Independents and Democrats. Timothy E. Howard was the first Democrat to be chosen county clerk. William C. McMichael, Frank P. Christoph and George M. Raab also were later on elected as Democrats. These three were residents of Mishawaka.

As county auditor, L. M. Taylor served from 1830 to 1837; Tyra W. Bray from 1837 to 1845; George W. Matthews from 1845 to 1849; Aaron B. Ellsworth from 1849 to 1859; W. J. Holloway from 1859 to 1867; Alfred Wheeler from 1867 to 1875; William D. Smith from 1875 to 1883; Aaron Jones from 1883 to 1891; Robert Myler from 1891 to 1895; Geo. W. Loughman from 1895 to 1899; John M. Brown, from 1899 to 1903; John W. Harbou from 1903 to 1911; Clarence Sedgwick from 1912 to 1915; Arthur F. Wolf from 1915 to 1919.

Samuel L. Cottrell was the first sheriff of the county. Those succeeding him in that office were: Benjamin McCarty, 1831; Scott West, 1832; Daniel A. Fullerton, 1832 to 1833; Samuel L. Cottrell, 1833 to 1838; Charles M. Tutt, 1838 to 1842; Lott Day, Sr., 1842 to 1846; Lott Day, Jr., 1846 to 1850; Ralph Staples, 1850 to 1852; Benjamin F. Miller, 1852 to 1856; Evan C. Johnson, 1856 to 1860; Nelson Ferris, 1860 to 1864; Solomon W. Palmer, 1864 to 1868; Geo. V. Glover, 1868 to 1872; Joseph Turnock, 1872 to 1876; Robert Hardy, 1876 to 1878; James Dougherty, 1878 to 1880; Zachariah M. Johnson, 1880 to 1884; George Rockstroh, 1884 to 1886; John Finch, 1886 to 1890; Andrew J. Ward, 1890 to 1894; James C.

Eberhart, 1894 to 1898; Charles E. McCarty, 1898 to 1903; Schuyler C. Robinson, 1903 to 1905; David B. J. Schafer, 1905 to 1909; Millard F. Kerr, 1909 to 1913; Edward S. Swanson, 1913 to 1915; Charles E. Bailey, 1915 to 1919. Of these Staples, Dougherty, Rockstroh, Ward and Bailey were elected as Democrats.

As first treasurer of the county John D. Lasly was appointed by the board of justices for the year 1830. September 7, 1831, Aaron Miller was appointed treasurer by the board of county commissioners to hold until his successor was duly appointed and qualified. He was required to give bond in the sum of $2,000. By an act of the General Assembly, approved February 12, 1841, the office of county treasurer was made elective. From the time when the office was made elective the county treasurers have been: Albert Monson, 1841; John K. Wright, 1850; Robert B. Nicar, 1851; Solomon Miller, 1856; John H. Harper, 1860; Ezekiel Greene, 1864; Hiram Miller, 1868; David B. Creviston, 1872; C. Henry Scheerer, 1876; John Hay, 1878; Frederick Lang, 1880; Emanuel R. Wills, 1884; George H. Stover, 1888; Simon Yenn, 1892; William H. Oren, 1894; John W. Zigler, 1898; Adam Hunsberger, 1903; William C. Stover, 1907; Marshal Hughes, 1909; Fred W. Martin, 1913; Ed. F. Keller, 1917. Of these Hay, Wills, George H. Stover, Yenn, W. C. Stover, Martin and Keller were elected as Democrats.

During the existence of the Whig party the county remained steadfastly of that faith. A pronounced Free-soil sentiment was developed during the forties. In 1848 there was quite a sentiment in favor of the Van Buren and Adams ticket, staunchly supported by Samuel J. Tilden, but the bulk of the Democratic vote was cast for the regular ticket, Cass and Butler. When the Republican party was formed nearly the entire Whig element joined that party, together with some of the Free-soil Democrats. Know-Nothingism never gained much of a foothold in St. Joseph county, though the People's party, preceding the Republican organization, developed much strength during the fifties. In the memorable campaign of 1860 the Democrats stood unflinchingly by Stephen A. Douglas. This was largely due to the attitude of ex-Congressman Norman Eddy, though his defeat as a candidate for re-election to Congress was directly attributable to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, in the main brought about through the persistent efforts of the "Little Giant," in the sincere but vain hope of appeasing the South and averting a sectional conflict. John Brownfield, who for many years presided over the conventions of the St. Joseph county Democracy before, during and after the Civil war, maintained a conservative attitude regarding the presidential contest of 1860. A native of Pennsylvania, by nature and inclination a conservative, he favored the nomination of James Guthrie of Kentucky as a compromise candidate. But compromise was out of the question, and the great split in the Democratic party of 1860 made it easy for the young, vigorous and enthusiastic Republican party to elect its honored standard-bearer to the presidency.

The first rupture in the Republican party followed the Greeley or Liberal revolt in 1872 and the enactment of the Baxter law by the Indiana Legislature of 1873. This break in the solidity of the Republicans was largely due to the influence exerted by David R. Leeper, who up to that time had been a staunch Republican. He was nominated for the Legislature by a coalition of Democrats and Liberal (or Greeley) Republicans, but declined the nomination. In 1874 he was again nominated for the Legislature and triumphantly elected, and re-elected in 1876. By that time he had become a full-fledged Democrat. In 1878 he was elected state senator for St. Joseph and Starke counties by the phenomenal majority of nearly 800. He made a splendid record in both houses of the General Assembly. As senator he served with marked ability as member of the committees on finance, on railroads, on education, on public buildings, on banks, on several committees of conference on appropriation bills and on other important special committees. He had much to do with shaping legislation for the erection of a new state house at Indianapolis and for the enlargement of the facilities for caring for the insane of the State. By reason of his achievements at Indianapolis he was strongly urged by party leaders to accept a nomination for Congress by the Democrats of the Thirteenth District in 1882, but could not be persuaded to do so. Instead, however, he consented to make the race for county auditor, in the hope of retrieving to some extent the financial loss sustained by having gone on the bail bond of a defaulting city treasurer. As a result of tactics first applied during the Hancock-Garfield campaign, the bulldozing of factory employes, the entire Democratic ticket of 1882 was defeated. Mr. Leeper, however, had the proud satisfaction of receiving the largest vote cast for any candidate on his ticket. With these experiences in public life he felt that he had enough of politics. Accordingly he devoted much of his time and attention to travel, literature and music. He wrote a great deal for the public press, and finally turned his attention to formulating a masterpiece in the literary line. This he entitled "The American Idea." The manuscript was submitted to a number of competent critics, all of whom spoke of it as a production of unusual and extraordinary merit. G. P. Putnam's Sons proposed to produce it in their series of "Questions of the Day," but no conclusion was reached regarding the matter. Quite recently his brother Samuel, president of the American Trust Company at South Bend, decided to perpetuate the author's memory by causing "The American Idea" to be printed in book form and placed within reach of appreciative students of government. The appearance of this exceedingly interesting volume has been greeted with marked favor by some of the leading papers of the country, among them the New York World, San Francisco Chronicle and numerous other extensively circulating periodicals.

In the spring of 1892 the South Bend Democracy found itself in straits for an available candidate for the mayoralty. Factional troubles had rendered the prospect of success at the polls anything but assuring, so aspirants for the nomination any way desirable were not conspicuously in sight. Leaders put their heads together and finally decided to bring the strongest possible pressure to bear on David R. Leeper to induce him to make the race. It was no easy task to bring him around. Argument upon argument was adduced why he should make the race for this important office. Still he held out. Final pressure was brought to bear on him during the afternoon preceding the nominating convention, which was held in what was then known as Price's Theater, on North Michigan street. He tenaciously held out against it until it was nearly time for the convention to assemble, and as he lived on the outskirts of the city, the person commissioned to extract from him the promise to accept had to make all possible haste to reach the convention hall. No time was lost in placing Mr. Leeper in nomination. Manifestations of genuine joy greeted the announcement and the nomination was acclaimed with vociferous shouting. By a narrow margin his election at the polls was accomplished, only one of his associates on the ticket being fortunate enough to "pull through." The Republicans succeeded in electing the greater part of their nominees. Two years later the party insisted on nominating him for re-election. Determinedly he resisted all efforts in that direction. While pressure was brought to bear on him to yield, the convention proceeded deliberately with the preliminaries, the managers all the while eagerly looking toward the door for the "pressure committee" to put in an appearance. Definite action could no longer be deferred. Nominations were made. Leeper's consent, wrought from him amidst the shedding of tears, could not be obtained until the convention had just about finished its work. A clever young Democrat named George A. McComber headed the ticket. The joy depicted upon Leeper's countenance upon learning that he would not have to pass through the ordeal of a campaign revealed the true inwardness of his innermost feelings and his deep-seated aversion to making a distasteful race. The election resulted in a sweeping Republican victory—David B. J. Schafer heading the ticket of that party. The panic of 1893 effectually destroyed every prospect of Democratic success at the polls in those perilous days. The only office Mr. Leeper thereafter accepted was that of police commissioner, by appointment of Governor Matthews. It is worthy of note that every nomination conferred upon Mr. Leeper was by unanimous vote and that in every instance he polled more votes than any of his associates on the ticket. Had his ambition been equal to his ability and his sterling worth, he would in all probability have occupied conspicuous places in State and national councils.

By virtue of legislative authorization, dated January 15, 1844, South Bend became an incorporated town that year, with Benjamin F. Price, William H. Patteson, John Brownfield, Abraham Wilson and Ricketson Burroughs as trustees. John Brownfield was made president and William H. Patteson clerk of this board. The first election for town trustee was held March 3, 1845, and resulted in the election of John Brownfield, Benjamin F. Price, William A. Patteson, Ricketson Burroughs and Joseph Andre. This board selected John Brownfield as president, Charles M. Heaton as clerk, Schuyler Colfax as assessor, Albert Monson as treasurer, and William Snavely as marshal. The presidents of subsequent town boards were: 1846, John Brownfield; 1848, John A. Henricks; 1850, Solomon W. Palmer; 1851, Mathias Stover; 1858, Henry Carleton; 1859 and 1860, Benjamin F. Price; 1861, Edmund Pitts Taylor; 1863 and 1864, John A. Henricks; 1865, Henry Carleton.

South Bend became a city in 1865 when, on June 5, William G. George was elected mayor; George H. Alward, clerk; George W. Matthews, treasurer; Daniel Roof, marshal; Washington Saunders, civil engineer; Elisha Sumption, assessor. Subsequent mayors were installed: In 1866, William G. George; 1868, Louis Humphreys, serving four years; 1872, William Miller; 1876, A. N. Thomas; 1878, Lucius G. Tong; 1880, Dr. Levi J. Ham; 1884, George W. Loughman; 1888, William H. Longley; 1892, David R. Leeper; 1894, David B. J. Schafer; 1898, Schuyler Colfax; 1902, Edward J. Fogarty; 1909, Charles L. Goetz; 1913, Fred W. Keller. Dr. Ham was the first Democrat to be elected mayor of South Bend. Other Democratic mayors were Longley, Leeper, Fogarty and Goetz. Keller, though politically a Progressive and Republican, was elected over Pat. A. Joyce as the nominee of a "conglomeration of incongruous elements" styling itself "Citizens' party." No man in the city was better equipped for the mayoralty than Mr. Joyce. His record as Councilman for the fourth ward stamped him a highly sagacious and ruggedly honest municipal legislator. He was the one man who courageously and conscientiously stood out against the granting of franchises that in subsequent years were utilized to be bartered away to corporations at enormous profits. He repeatedly demonstrated his ability and adaptability to intelligent and efficient municipal service while filling the important office of City Controller during the Goetz administration. Yet he was defeated, partly through duplicity and treachery, partly through hypocrisy and cant, and not inconsiderably at the expense of truth, justice and righteous citizenship. Undeceived and basely betrayed, the electorate of South Bend would, if it could, gladly undo the foolishness of 1913.

The office of postmaster of South Bend, under Democratic administration, was filled by Sorden Lister and Walter Harrigan. The present incumbent is George W. Zinky. Lister was for many years the recognized leader of Democratic forces in city and county. He served a number of years in the city council and had an ambition to become mayor. Factional troubles rendered impossible the gratification of this ambition. Mr. Longley had the honor of defeating one of the strongest and most resourceful Republicans of the city, viz.: "Buffalo" Miller. To Mr. Fogarty belongs the honor of having served longer than any other individual chosen as mayor of this city since its organization. The honor of having been elected by the largest majority ever accorded to an aspirant to the South Bend mayoralty belongs to Charles L. Goetz. He was very reluctant about entering the race, and held out against making it until only a few days before the assembling of the convention. Senator Shively presided. The nominating speeches by Harry Wair, George Ford and F. E. Hering were of a high order. Unbounded enthusiasm prevailed. The ticket placed in nomination was exceptionally strong. Charles L. Goetz for mayor, G. A. Farabaugh for city judge, and Timothy E. Howard for councilman-at-large, appealed strongly to the electorate. On election day this combination swept everything before it. The majority reached 2,500. Goetz carried every ward and every precinct except one. The campaign was conducted upon a high plane and elicited unstinted commendation. Charley Goetz was a prime favorite with the people. He was a true-hearted man and a superb mixer. The defeat of his friend Joyce in 1913 grieved him sorely. There are those who believe it contributed to his premature death, June 23, 1915, when only 56 years of age. For a quarter of a century he was among the most efficient party workers and managers in the State. His passing entailed an irreparable loss.

In the General Assembly St. Joseph county was represented, beginning in the seventies, by Representatives David R. Leeper, Wm. C. McMichael, Henry Ginz, Thomas J. Garoutte, William H. Stull, Edward A. Metzger, George H. Stover, George V. Byrket, Joseph F. Suchanek, Charles Weidler, George W. Sands, Charles A. Hagerty, George Y. Hepler, Marion Gorsky and G. A. Haslinger, and by Senators Joseph Henderson, David R. Leeper, Timothy E. Howard, E. Volney Bingham and Charles A. Hagerty.

St. Joseph county Democrats elected to Congress were Norman Eddy, George Ford and Benjamin F. Shively. Eddy and Ford served each one term; Shively, three and a fraction; later on he was twice elected to the U. S. Senate—first by the Legislature and six years later by popular vote. In 1896 he was the Democratic nominee for governor and was defeated by James A. Mount by about 25,000 majority. Schuyler Colfax and Abraham L. Brick were the only Republicans elected to Congress from St. Joseph county. Colfax was first chosen in 1854 to succeed Colonel Eddy and was re-elected to six consecutive terms. Three of his races were made against that forceful debater, David Turpie. In 1868 Colfax was made vice-president of the United States. That was his last public office. He died at Mankato, Minn., January 13, 1885, while on a lecture tour. Brick was first elected in 1898 and re-elected to four consecutive terms. He died at Indianapolis, April 7, 1908.

In 1870 Colonel Norman Eddy was nominated by the Democrats for secretary of state and triumphantly elected by about two thousand majority over Dr. Max F. A. Hoffmann of Logansport. Colonel Eddy died during his term. His son, Owen M., was graciously and generously permitted to serve the remainder of the term, although John F. Farquhar was by the governor named to fill the vacancy. Timothy E. Howard was elected to the supreme bench in 1892 and William P. O'Neill was chosen to the office of lieutenant-governor in 1912. In 1904 Edward J. Fogarty received the Democratic nomination for secretary of state, but with the rest of the ill-fated Alton B. Parker ticket experienced overwhelming defeat.

Upon the death of James D. Reid, warden of the Indiana state prison seven or eight years ago, former Mayor Edward J. Fogarty was appointed to fill the vacancy. He holds the position at this time. By general concurrence that institution has been pronounced the model state prison in the United States. Several years ago Warden Fogarty installed an extensive binder twine manufacturing plant within the prison walls. This has been operated to marked advantage. Operations therein have been impeded of late on account of the exorbitant advance in the price of sisal, caused by the war in Mexico. In lieu of binder twine production, Warden Fogarty has turned his attention to extensive farming operations in the western part of St. Joseph county. He leased from the Reynolds estate 2,200 acres of choice land in Olive township and the Hubbard farm of 600 acres, near by. Vast quantities of wheat, oats, potatoes, peas, beans, etc., have resulted from the first year's experiment. Much greater results are calculated on next year.

At the urgent request of Governor Marshall seven years ago John B. Stoll accepted the tender of a position as trustee on the Indiana prison and parole board. He was made president of the board immediately upon becoming a member thereof, and is now serving his seventh year in that capacity. His commission runs to January, 1921.

At the election of 1912 two South Benders headed the electoral tickets of their respective parties—Aaron Jones, Sr., that of the Roosevelt and Parker ticket, John B. Stoll that of the Wilson and Marshall ticket. Owing to the Republican split the Wilson ticket was elected by an unprecedented plurality—119,883. Mr. Stoll was delegated to convey the result of the Indiana election to the secretary of the Senate at Washington. In 1896 Mr. Stoll headed the Bryan and Sewall electoral ticket, which was defeated by about 18,000.

St. Joseph county has two cities—South Bend with a population of between 60,000 and 70,000, and Mishawaka with about 15,000 inhabitants. There is but little difference between the ages of the two places. In 1835 a town organization under the name of the St. Joseph Iron Works was authorized. In 1838 a reorganization was effected by combining the four different organizations into one. The name Mishawaka was given the merged corporations. For over sixty years this sort of local government was maintained. Early in 1899 a movement was inaugurated to convert the town into a city. There was strong opposition to this movement, but an election ordered to determine for or against the change resulted thus: For city government, 702; against, 336. This test of public sentiment was made February 20, 1899. An election for city officers was thereupon ordered to be held May 2, 1899. It resulted in the election of Manuel M. Fisher as mayor, Henry C. Eggleston as clerk, William M. Clark as treasurer, Charles H. Doolittle as street commissioner and Grant Needham as marshal. After this election the board of town trustees met for the last time on May 8, 1899, to close up town affairs and turn over the government to the city officers. A cash balance of $10,746.75 was turned over to the newly installed city treasurer. Thereupon the board of trustees of the town of Mishawaka, after a government extending from January 31, 1835, to May 8, 1899, adjourned sine die, and Mishawaka auspiciously entered upon its career as a city.

May, 1902, Mayor Fisher was succeeded by Melville W. Mix, who subsequently was re-elected in 1904. In November, 1905, Charles Frank succeeded to the mayoralty, and he in turn was succeeded by John A. Herzog, now postmaster of Mishawaka. In 1913 Ralph W. Gaylor, running as the nominee of a citizens' combination, was elected over Melville W. Mix, the Democratic nominee. Fisher, Frank and Gaylor were affiliated with the Republican party; Mix and Herzog are Democrats. For many years E. Volney Bingham served efficiently as member of the school board. Before his election to the state senate he held the position of town attorney. Frank P. Christoph, now generally considered the Democratic wheel-horse of Mishawaka, was in the fall of 1917 the nominee of his party for mayor, with the present incumbent as his successful competitor.

Besides the two cities of South Bend and Mishawaka there are five incorporated towns in St. Joseph county, viz: Walkerton, New Carlisle, North Liberty, Lakeville, Wyatt.

The newspaper field has been well filled from an early period of the county's existence. As fittingly observed by Judge Timothy E. Howard, "The history of our newspapers is co-eval with that of South Bend itself. The editors, in the main, have been intelligent and broad-minded, and have acted on the assumption that their readers were all people of refinement and intelligence. Appeals to passion and prejudice have been the exception. The appeal has been rather to reason, morals, patriotism and good citizenship and the general welfare of the country."

The first paper ventured in the county was called the Northwestern Pioneer. It was established November 16, 1831, by John D. and Joseph H. Defrees. There was at that time no paper published north of Indianapolis or west of Detroit. Even Chicago was without a newspaper. Six months later the name was changed to the St. Joseph Beacon. In 1833 Joseph H. Defrees sold his interest to his brother and moved to Goshen, where he engaged and prospered in the mercantile business, was repeatedly elected to the General Assembly of Indiana, and in 1864 was made a member of Congress for the Fort Wayne district, erving one term. John D. Defrees abandoned the South Bend field and moved the Beacon to White Pigeon, Mich., where he disposed of the plant to a Mr. Gilbert. Returning to South Bend a short time afterward, Defrees equipped himself for the practice of law, acquired a lucrative practice, was elected to the State Senate, became editor of the Indianapolis Journal and was by President Lincoln appointed public printer at Washington. Several years after the war Mr. Defrees modified his political views and in 1872 vigorously supported Horace Greeley for the presidency as against Grant.

South Bend was not to be without a newspaper any length of time. In 1836 William Milligan established the Free Press. This paper was fairly well supported, but in 1845 the plant was transferred to Albert W. West and Schuyler Colfax. These gentlemen established the St. Joseph Valley Register, the first number of which made its appearance September 12, 1845. It grew rapidly in popular favor. On the slavery question it opposed both abolition and slavery extension. The conservative middle ground on that "burning issue" was chosen and steadfastly maintained, though the editor was uncompromisingly opposed to every scheme for the extension of human slavery into any new territory. After seven months Mr. Colfax became sole proprietor. In 1851 he received his first nomination for Congress, but was defeated at the election. He fared better later on, being first elected in 1854 and thereafter re-elected for seven consecutive terms. In 1869 he became Vice-President of the United States. During his first congressional campaign a bright lawyer and vigorous writer named James Davis occupied the Register's editorial chair. During his second race Alfred Wheeler wielded the editorial pen. In April, 1857, Mr. Wheeler became a partner, and later on sole owner. In November, 1865, Archibald Beal, who for eight years had been the publisher of the Mishawaka Enterprise, purchased the Register in partnership with C. E. Fuller. Two years afterwards Alfred B. Miller and Elmer Crockett, who had been engaged on the paper, purchased Mr. Fuller's interest, and the firm became Beal, Miller & Co. In January, 1872, Mr. Beal purchased the Miller and Crockett interests, and in 1873 Daniel S. Marsh became associate editor. In February, 1874, D. J. Benner acquired a half interest in the Register and became one of the editors, Mr. Marsh remaining but a short time longer in that capacity. In August, 1875, The Register Company was formed with Mr. Beal as president. Several changes in management occurred thereafter, but the establishment in 1872 of the Tribune by Alfred B. Miller, Elmer Crockett, James H. Banning and Elias W. Hoover had so undermined the old Register that in 1887 it finally yielded to the inevitable and was merged into its more successful and prosperous rival. The Tribune was established March 9, 1872. May 28, 1873, a daily issue was added. The publication of the weekly was abandoned after it had been demonstrated that the people in the "rural districts" were desirous of being served daily instead of weekly. The Tribune experienced its greatest "lift" during the McKinley campaign in 1896. Mr. Crockett was a member of the Republican state committee and was made chairman of the publicity bureau. There being no limit to Republican campaign funds that year, it was an easy matter to "introduce" the Tribune into practically every household in the county for missionary purposes. Besides this very substantial financial reinforcement, Mr. Crockett had for four years been enjoying the emoluments of the South Bend postoffice. All in all, the Tribune fared exceedingly well during these years of Democratic tribulation.

Upon the death of Alfred B. Miller, in the fall of 1892, his son, Fred A., became editor-in-chief. The paper is still owned by Miller and the two Crocketts. Its business is quite prosperous.

During the campaign of 1840 Dr. E. W. H. Ellis, publisher of the Goshen Democrat, conducted a paper at Mishawaka in the interest of Martin Van Buren. The venture failed to prove remunerative.

In 1841 Wilbur F. Storey, who in later years gained national fame as an editor, established the Mishawaka Tocsin. A short time thereafter Storey sold the paper to George Merrifield, who in 1845 unloaded it on Thomas Jernegan. The Tocsin was moved to South Bend, where it peacefully passed away. Storey, upon leaving Mishawaka, located in Laporte, where he engaged in the drug business and acquired an interest in the Herald, of which he became editor. He did not cut much of a figure in the newspaper field at Laporte, but later on gained quite a reputation as editor and publisher of the Detroit Free Press. Shortly before the Civil war he got hold of the Chicago Times and made quite a paper out of it. On account of some disloyal utterances in 1863 the Times was temporarily suppressed by order of General Burnside. This gave that paper much notoriety, just what Storey wanted. About the time Vallandigham proclaimed his New Departure, early in the seventies, Storey renounced his fealty to Democracy and made the Times rampagiously independent. He branded the Democratic party "a putrid reminiscence" and viciously opposed Greeley's candidacy in 1872. The Chicago Tribune, then edited by Horace White, on the other hand, earnestly supported Greeley. These departures in newspaper attitudes proved highly beneficial financially to Storey. He became a very rich man—and correspondingly foolish. A grotesque matrimonial venture unbalanced his mind. At enormous expense he built a castle on a fashionable boulevard of Chicago. It was never entirely finished. A few years later it was torn down. Some of the stone and marble of which the palace had been built was brought to South Bend by heirs of the Storey estate.

In the year 1853 Ariel Euclid Drapier and his son, William H., established the St. Joseph County Forum in South Bend. This was the first attempt at conducting a regular Democratic newspaper in St. Joseph county. Under the leadership of Schuyler Co'fax the Whig and later the Republican party were so strongly entrenched in popular favor as to render the Drapier venture exceedingly hazardous. The Drapiers were forceful writers, but their path was strewn with so many obstacles that success proved to be unattainable. On account of some indiscreet utterances regarding the Civil war the Forum was for a time suppressed by order of Gen. Milo S. Hascall of Goshen. Some time afterward the plant was sold to Edward Molloy, who had rendered gallant service in the Union army, and who gave the new enterprise the suggestive name, The National Union. The paper prospered fairly well. It was ably edited under the wise guidance of Col. Norman Eddy, who at that time held the office of collector of internal revenue by appointment of President Andrew Johnson. In 1870 the Union passed under the control and ownership of Judge James D. Osborn, an able Democratic lawyer of Goshen, and an exceedingly forceful political writer. He associated with himself Herbert S. Fassett, up to that time foreman of the Ligonier Banner, owned by John B. Stoll, and who "stood good" for a Campbell power press stipulated to be installed as Fassett's interest in the establishment. About two years later Judge Osborn, having tired of unremunerative newspaper life, sold his interest in the Union to John Brownfield, Jr., and returned to Goshen. In compliance with persistent clamor for a German newspaper in South Bend, Brownfield and Fassett, in 1873, established Der Indiana Courier, with John B. Stoll as editor-in-chief and Gustav Fikentscher as local editor. For six months Mr. Stoll came from his Ligonier home to South Bend the middle of each week to supervise the issuing of the new candidate for popular favor. In course of time Der Courier was transferred to Fikentscher & Troeger. In later years various forced changes took place in the management of Der Courier, which finally was gently put to sleep by Otto Sandmayr some time during the first decade of the present century.

About a year after the breaking out of the disastrous panic of 1873 the Union was purchased by Charles L. Murray of Goshen, who placed the establishment in charge of his son, Charles T., an exceedingly vigorous and versatile writer. The name of the paper was changed to the Herald. So vigorously did young Murray wield his pen that he was shot in the abdomen by a man named Palmer, but luckily not killed. In 1876 the senior Murray moved to South Bend and took personal charge of the Herald. He made it an exceedingly interesting publication, but early in the eighties sold the plant to Henry A. Peed, who came very near playing havoc with the staid old Plymouth Democrat. Before locating at Plymouth Peed had been a state senator from the southern part of Indiana and had acquired some distinction by ostentatiously attempting to imitate the majestic tread of Daniel W. Voorhees. Peed had but little money and bought the Union mainly on credit, pledging the plant as security. Unable to meet his obligations, foreclosure of the mortgage became inevitable. The well-worn type and presses were turned over to Murray, who used the same to publish a prohibition paper called the Sun, which a few years later was moved to Indianapolis and issued under the name of The Indiana Phalanx.

Peed retained the Herald subscription list, which incautiously had not been covered by the mortgage. Meanwhile Peed had organized a stock company to purchase a new outfit wherewith to publish a new paper. He named the paper South Bend Times. Every particle of stuff in the shop was mortgaged to Marder, Luse & Co., in Chicago. Poorly conducted as it was, the Times failed utterly to ingratiate itself in popular favor. Peed made a desperate effort to find a purchaser. For months he bombarded John B. Stoll to take the concern off his hands. Besides the Ligonier Banner Mr. Stoll had a newspaper on his hands in the city of Elkhart. Notwithstanding the ample-ness of these burdens, Mr. Stoll finally consented to take the bankrupt publication off Peed's heavily burdened shoulders. Peed said all he asked was that he be paid for the stock that he personally held in the concern and that in turn he would see to it that all the other stockholders turned their valueless certificates over to the purchaser of the plant. In accordance with this proposition Mr. Stoll went to Chicago and had the mortgage held by Marder, Luse & Co. assigned to him, paying spot cash for the entire claim. Included in this deal was Peed's stock which he represented to hold in his possession. Stopping off at South Bend on his return trip, Mr. Stoll, by appointment, met Peed and told him he was ready to close the deal upon Peed's turning over his certificates of stock. Going to the Times office, Peed went to the little unlocked safe and for quite a while fumbled around, ostensibly to find "his" certificates. Having completed his aimless and fruitless search, he turned around and blandly remarked to Mr. Stoll: "I just happened to remember that I hypothecated this stock to Marder, Luse & Co. for additional security." To this Mr. Stoll replied that he was fully aware of all this. He then drew the certificates out of an envelope in his coat pocket and showed them to Peed. Unabashed by this disclosure, Peed complacently urged that the deal be closed, nevertheless, as he had proposed. Mr. Stoll replied that in point of fact Peed had no claim whatever on the concern. "Notwithstanding all that," Mr. Stoll said, "I am going to pay you dollar for dollar for the stock bearing your name, although as a matter of fact I have already bought it from Marder, Luse & Co. and paid them for it." This was done, and early in April of 1883 Mr. Stoll took possession of the shop, placing Charles A. McDonald in charge until removal to South Bend could be effected. In order to give the institution some standing and prestige, many debts owed by Peed were liquidated by Mr. Stoll, although the latter was under neither legal nor moral obligations so to do. These and other acts of kindness were rewarded later by Peed instituting suit against his fellow stockholders in the sum of $1,300 for editorial service. Needless to say that Judge pro tem. Lucius Hubbard unceremoniously kicked this absurd case out of court as soon as the facts in the premises had been laid bare. A daily edition of the Times was launched December 3, 1883.

Of the Times under Mr. Stoll's management Judge Timothy E. Howard in his St. Joseph County History speaks thus on page 469:

"In the spring of 1883 the controlling stock in this corporation was transferred to the Hon. John B. Stoll, the brilliant editor of the Ligonier Banner, which Mr. Stoll had made 'the ablest Democratic paper in Indiana,' as William S. Holman declared to the writer years afterwards. Of the succeeding history of the Times it is perhaps sufficient to say that the Democrats of the city and county soon became satisfied that they had in that paper one of the very best in the country and in its editor-in-chief one of the ablest and wisest editorial writers in the United States. Closely associated with Mr. Stoll, from 1883 until his lamented death, December 15, 1906, was Charles Albert McDonald. But better than mere party service, however desirable that may be, the Times and its accomplished editors had and still have a constituency far beyond all partisan lines. The paper has been in the best sense independent in politics and in all other matters affecting the public welfare. The independence of the press is one of the chief safeguards of the liberties of the people; and this truth the people themselves are quick to recognize. It does not follow that the independent paper does not sometimes make mistakes, grievous mistakes occasionally; does not at times do violence to the feelings and convictions of its readers and particularly its party supporters. This, however, is far better in the end than to take a cowardly part in the discussion of public questions. Party principles, as in the case of all other principles, must of course control in large degree the sentiments of a party newspaper; any other course would be dishonest with its readers. But within the lines there is ample room for a free and manly course, as was exemplified in the career of Peter Stirling. In this best sense the Times has been an independent party paper; and the people, without respect to party, have appreciated the strong, manly course pursued by the Times and have accorded to it a most generous support. There is indeed no town in the State, perhaps in the whole country, that has two better newspapers than the South Bend Times and the South Bend Tribune."

The most trying period through which the Times passed was during the free silver agitation in 1896. Nearly the entire local business element of the Democratic party arrayed itself against the 16-to-1 propaganda and the candidacy of Mr. Bryan.

The Sunday News was established in April, 1887, by Chauncey N. Fassett, who had previously been editor of the old Register. In course of time, late in the nineties, a morning paper called the News was launched in connection. This venture was largely engineered by William A. McInerny and one other member of the Fogarty administration. Failing to make it a financial success, McInerny in the summer of 1911 induced Gabriel R. Summers, a wealthy patent medicine man, at present a state senator, to acquire the South Bend Times and merge the two plants into one. Summers was already principal owner of the News. The morning and evening editions of the News-Times are issued from the Times building on Colfax avenue. Under the present management and the editorship of John Henry Zuver, these papers espouse the cause of prohibition, woman suffrage and mildly the initiative and referendum, government ownership of public utilities and kindred "progressive" doctrines. The war policy of President Wilson has from the beginning had this paper's unstinted support. McInerny and his immediate followers eliminated themselves from the News-Times nearly two years ago. Then Fassett also severed his connection with the News-Times and is now a feature writer on the Tribune.

About two years ago there was established in South Bend a new German paper called Germania. Its publisher is J. Baumbach. He came from Milwaukee, but had previously had some newspaper experience in Iowa.

The New Era was originally established in South Bend by Ralph E. Hoyt. March 27, 1880, it fell into the hands of Benjamin F. Shively, who devoted its columns to a vigorous advocacy of the principles of the Greenback party. Shively ran as the Greenback nominee for Congress in 1882, and turned the paper over to D. M. Eveland, in whose hands it gave up the ghost in 1883. Its subscription list was transferred to the Times.

Early in the nineties a Michigander named Brown started a morning paper in South Bend that was called the Post. He held out about a year, when he unloaded in order to go South for the benefit of his wife's health. The paper passed through several changes and finally gave up the ghost while in the keeping of John W. O'Bannon. The material of this plant was sold to the Times during the latter part of the century.

The Mishawaka Enterprise was established in 1853, first under the name Free Press. Connected with its publication at various times were D. C. Ireland, L. A. Elliott, Archibald Beal, S. T. Montgomery and Norman V. Brower. In 1872 the Enterprise became the property of its present owner, Edward A. Jernegan. He has proved himself a capable newspaper man.

A second paper called the Democrat was established in Mishawaka in 1891 by William P. O'Neill, who later on was elected Lieutenant-Governor in 1912. The paper at no time became remunerative or profitable.

Weekly papers are published at Walkerton and North Liberty. They have been in existence for quite a number of years and seem to be doing fairly well—as well as can reasonably be expected in limited fields.

THE JUDICIARY.

St. Joseph county has been singularly fortunate in the quality and caliber of its judicial officers. The first presiding judge was John R. Porter, 1832. His successors on the bench were Gustavus A. Evarts, Samuel C. Sample, Ebenezer M. Chamberlain, Albert G. Deavitt, Thomas S. Stanfield, John B. Niles, Andrew S. Osborn, Daniel Noyes, Lucius Hubbard, Walter A. Funk, Niles, Osborn and Noyes were residents of LaPorte.

The Superior Court, established in 1907, was first presided over by Vernon W. VanFleet, who was succeeded by the present incumbent, George Ford.

PRESIDENTIAL VOTE IN EARLIER YEARS.

In 1832 Henry Clay, Whig, was credited with having received 123 votes, as against 121 cast for Andrew Jackson, Democratic Republican. No record has been found of the vote cast in 1836, when Martin Van Buren and William Henry Harrison were rival candidates for the presidency. Subsequent votes of the county follow:

1840—Martin Van Buren, Dem. Rep., 444; William Henry Harrison, Whig, 809.

1844—James K. Polk, Dem., 683; Henry Clay, Whig, 863; James G. Birney, Abolitionist, 33.

1848—Lewis Cass, Dem., 667; Zachary Taylor, Whig, 817; Martin Van Buren, Free-soil, 332.

1852—Franklin Pierce, Dem., 1,052; Winfield Scott, Whig, 998; John P. Hale, Free-soil, 174.

1856—James Buchanan, Dem., 1,509; John C. Fremont, Rep., 1,812; Millard Fillmore, American, 6.

1864—George B. McClellan, Dem., 1,558; Abraham Lincoln, Rep., 2,188.

1868—Horatio Seymour, Dem., 2,249; Ulysses S. Grant, Rep., 3,075.

1872—Horace Greeley, Liberal Rep. and Dem., 2,402; Ulysses S. Grant, Rep., 3,426; Charles O'Connor, Bourbon Dem., 13.

THE BEST-MANAGED CAMPAIGN IN THE HISTORY OF THE COUNTY.

It is the consensus of opinion among those qualified to judge of such matters that the best-managed campaign on the Democratic side of the house was made in 1884. Four years before the Republicans had carried the county for General Garfield over the gallant Hancock by 498 majority. By compact organization and by painstaking supervision of public speaking, together with vigorous yet judicious newspaper support, the county was carried for Cleveland, Hendricks and Gray by almost identically the same majority. No speaker from abroad was permitted to be assigned to St. Joseph county until pronounced "sane and safe" by the local management. By superb generalship the St. Joseph county Democracy achieved a signal victory in 1884.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF SCOTT COUNTY

SCOTT COUNTY was formerly a part of Jefferson, until 1820, it was made a separate county, and the county seat was located at Lexington, which was founded in 1800. Lexington continued to be the seat of justice until 1873, when the county seat was removed to Scottsburg.

The first court held in the county was July 3, 1820, and the county was in the second judicial circuit.

The first Sheriff of the county was Major Elisha G. English, father of the late William H. English, and grandfather of Hon. W. E. English, of Indianapolis.

Michael G. Bright and his brother, Jesse D. Bright, were naturalized in the court of Scott county. The latter was United States Senator and was noted as one of the great men of Indiana, as well as a national figure. He was an uncle of Hon. Bernard Korbly, Democratic State Chairman, and ex-Congressman Charles Korbly of Indianapolis.

The Democrats were a minority party in Scott county until the advent of the Free Soil and Republican parties in 1856 and 1860. But when the Whig party went on the rocks a large number of them came to the Democratic party, and from that time until the present the Democrats never lost the county on the State and National tickets. But six Republicans have ever been elected to a county office in the county.

Scott county produced two Congressmen, father and son. William H. English was elected to Congress four times, viz., 1852, 1854, 1856, and 1858, from this district, while a resident of Lexington. He was a Democrat, and in 1880 was nominated for Vice-President with Winfield Scott Hancock. His son, Hon. W. E. English, was elected to Congress from the Seventh District in 1882, as a Democrat, but in 1896 left the party on the free silver issue. William H. English was given credit for being the main force who secured the admission of Texas to the union.

Daniel Blocher was a noted Democrat in his day in Scott county, and served as a member of the lower House of the Indiana Legislature in the year 1873. He had the distinction of having shaken hands with every Governor, except Governor Jennings, up to the time of his death, in 1903.

Colonel Charles L. Jewett, now of New Albany, was born and reared in Scott county, and while a resident was elected to the Legislature, and was twice Speaker of the House. C. W. Cruson, S. B. Wells and Mark Storen, now United States Marshal of Indiana, all Democrats, were members of the Legislature. A strange coincidence is the fact that the first and last United States Marshals were from Scott county, Major Elisha G. English being the first.

Judge Joseph H. Shea of the Appellate Court, a Democrat, is a native of Scott county, and was State Senator, representing Clark, Scott and Jennings counties in the Senate.

Elijah A. Gladden, now Secretary of the State Board of Forestry; Charles W. Cruson, who died in Indianapolis, March 17, 1914; W. L. Morrison, Superintendent of the Scottsburg High School; Noble J. Hays, now in the Internal Revenue service under Hon. Isaac Strouse; Hon. Mark Storen and Hon. Frank Gardner, an attorney of Scottsburg, have been the Democratic county chairmen of Scott county in the last twenty-five years.

The first Democratic newspaper was the Cornucopia, published in Lexington while Governor Jennings was Territorial Governor of Indiana.

The Scott County Democrat was started in 1873 by John H. J. Seirp.

The Scott County Journal was founded by Mark Storen and C. C. Foster at Lexington in 1885, and was purchased and moved to Scottsburg by James F. Ervin in 1886. S. B. Wells purchased the Scott County Journal in 1909, and in 1912 purchased the Scott County Democrat and consolidated the two, and since that time the Scott County Journal is the only Democratic newspaper in the county.

The largest Democratic majority cast in the county for a Presidential candidate was for W. J. Bryan in 1896, 400. In 1900, 358, and in 1908 Bryan carried the county over Taft by but 267 majority.

The majority of Woodrow Wilson over Roosevelt was 502, and over Taft 706, and he had a plurality over both of 275.

Every county office is filled by a Democrat. N. V. Howell is Clerk; Hugh Colvin, Treasurer; Robert Blunt, Auditor; Joseph N. Keith, Recorder; Walter Sarver, Assessor; Allen Maggard, Surveyor; Dr. J. P. Wilson, Coroner; Charles M. Montgomery, Allen Clark and Solon O. Payne, County Commissioners, and Frank Gardner, County Attorney.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF SHELBY COUNTY

By Charles A. Hack

THE history of the Democratic party in Shelby county properly begins with the formation of the county in the year 1821. The county is located south and east of the county of Marion, contains 408 square miles, or 261,120 acres of valuable farm land. Shelby county was named after the Hon. Isaac Shelby, the first Governor of the State of Kentucky. Shelbyville, a city of more than 10,000 inhabitants, is located on the main line of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis railroad, about twenty-seven miles southeast of the city of Indianapolis. The county is devoted largely to agriculture and stock raising.

From the very beginning of the county as an organization Democrats have been prominent in all public affairs; in fact, Shelby county is recognized by politicians throughout the State as one of the "strongholds" of Democracy. Shelby county is noted for its barbecues and pole raisings. In the past pole raisings, barbecues, big tent gatherings and rallies have been conducted by the Democratic organization at almost every campaign, much to the discomfort of the Republicans. The Democrats of the county have always maintained a permanent organization and are so strongly intrenched that a nomination on the Democratic ticket for a county office is looked upon as equivalent to an election.

Beginning with the year 1832, the Democrats carried the county by a plurality, for President, of 248 votes; in 1836 the county was carried by the Whigs by 13 votes; in 1840 the Democrats again carried the county for President by 233 votes; in 1848 by 292 votes; in 1852 by 441 votes; in 1856 by 565 votes; in 1860 by 147 votes; in 1864 by 386 votes; in 1868 by 523 votes; in 1872 by 443 votes; in 1876 by 436 votes; in 1880 by 907 votes; in 1884 by 565 votes; in 1888 by 532 votes; in 1892 by 828 votes; in 1896 by 660 votes; in 1900 by 555 votes; in the presidential election of 1904 the county was carried by Theodore Roosevelt by 110 votes; in the election of 1908 the Democrats carried the county by 506 votes; in 1912, with both Republican and Progressives in the field, by a plurality of 1,463 votes; and in the election of 1916, with the Republicans and Progressives united, the Democrats again carried the county for President by 699 votes.

Among many of the prominent Democrats who have represented the county in the Legislature are: The Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks, Jacob Mutz, Isaac Odell, Albert F. Wray, James G. Curtis, Oliver J. Glessner, Squire VanPelt, Charles Major, the well-known author; Adam F. May, Everett E. Stroup, Robert Harrison, Harry S. Downey, David Poer, Robert Tomlinson, George Billman, Will A. Yarling, Bellamy S. Sutton, William J. Lowe, and the present incumbent, Maurice Douglas.

The county at this time has a complete set of Democratic officials in the persons of: Alonzo Blair, Judge; Claude R. Henry, Prosecuting Attorney; Frank Fagel, Auditor; Gordon Thurston, Clerk; Thomas Fox, Recorder; Scott A. Brown, Treasurer; Alvin O. Baker, Sheriff; George E. Oltman, Surveyor; Dr. G. I. Inlow, Coroner; Frank Mohr, County Assessor; William Everson, County Superintendent of Schools, and William J. Lowe, William Robertson and John Dobbins, County Commissioners. Lee B. Hoop is the present Mayor of the city of Shelbyville and one of the prominent Democrats of the county.

Among the names of many of the Democrats who have served as chairman of the Democratic county central committee are: Judge Kendall M. Hord, Tilghman A. H. Lee, E. T. Carson, Bellamy S. Sutton, Thomas A. Hawkins, P. P. Fettig, J. H. Deitzer, Thomas H. Campbell, Otto L. Coyle, and Charles A. Hack, the present incumbent.

Some of the different newspapers that have been printed and edited in opposition to Democracy in the county were the Lancet, the Hawkeye, the Independent, the Scissors and Quill, the Banner, the Shelby Union and the present Shelby Republican.

The newspapers printed and published in the county at this time are the Morning News, the Shelby Republican and the Daily and Weekly Democrat. The Shelby Democrat, as known today, is not the successor of any other Shelby county newspaper. It was established in June, 1878, by Bellamy S. Sutton and W. Scott Ray. In November of the same year Mr. Sutton sold his interest to Albert McCorkle, the Sheriff of the county, after which the paper was published under the name of Ray & McCorkle until 1880. The Daily Democrat was established by W. Scott Ray on May 4, 1880. On June 1, 1904, the Shelby Democrat Publishing Company was organized, the stockholders of the company being among the leading Democrats of the county. The officers of the company during the time of its existence were: W. W. Ford, President; Peter G. Kemp, Vice-President, and John D. DePrez, Secretary-Treasurer. After its organization the company purchased the Weekly and Daily Democrat. On December 1, 1915, the Democrat Publishing Company was organized with a capital stock of $15,000. After its organization the new company purchased the old company and continued the publication of both the Weekly and Daily Democrat, each of which has a large circulation in Shelby and adjoining counties. The present officers of the new company are: Gordon Thurston, President; Pleas Greenlee, Vice-President, and John D. DePrez, Secretary-Treasurer. Mr. DePrez, the editor of the publications, is one of the Democratic leaders of the county and well known throughout the State.

The Democracy of Shelby county has furnished its quota of men who have achieved distinction as statesmen, lawyers and writers of both poetry and prose.

Alonzo Leora Rice, a prominent Democrat of Union township of the county, is widely known throughout the literary world as a writer of poetry. Several volumes of his poems have been published. His productions appear in many of the leading journals and magazines of the country.

The name of Leonard J. Hackney is well known to every leading Democrat and every lawyer in Indiana. Mr. Hackney was one of the Democratic leaders of the county during the eighties. His rise as a lawyer and political leader was rapid. He was elected to the office of Prosecuting Attorney for Johnson and Shelby counties in the fall of 1878, and in the year 1888 was nominated and elected Judge by the Democrats of the same counties. In 1892 he was placed on the Democratic State ticket for Judge of the Supreme Court of Indiana, and elected. At the close of his career as Supreme Judge he became connected with what was at that time known as the "Big Four" Railroad Company. His rise as a railroad attorney was rapid. At this time he occupies a position as general counsel for the western division of the New York Central railway lines. Mr. Hackney is now a resident of Cincinnati, Ohio.

Among writers of fiction none stand higher in our State than Charles Major. Mr. Major was a resident of the county from the time he was fourteen years of age until the time of his death. By profession he was a lawyer. He was admitted to practice law at the Shelby county bar in 1877 and practiced his profession until the later years of his life, which were devoted almost wholly to literary work. He was nominated and elected by the Democrats of the county as Representative to the Legislature and served during the sessions of 1886 and 1887 with credit to himself and the party. Among some of his literary productions are: "When Knighthood Was in Flower," "The Bears of Blue River," a story for boys; "A Forest Hearth," "Yolanda" and "A Gentle Knight of Old Brandenburg." His book, "When Knighthood Was in Flower," was dramatized for the famous actress, Julia Marlowe, and became one of the most popular plays of the day.

The rise of Alonzo Blair, the present Judge of the Sixteenth Judicial Circuit, and one of the leaders of the Democratic party in the county, was rapid. He was admitted to practice law at the Shelby county bar in the year 1890. In the year 1896 he was nominated and elected by the Democrats of Shelby and Johnson counties as Prosecuting Attorney, which office he held for two consecutive terms, at the close of which he was again nominated and elected by the Democrats of Shelby and Rush counties to fill the same position for an additional term of two years. At the close of his career as Prosecuting Attorney he practiced law in the county and soon became one of the leading attorneys. In the summer of 1910 he was nominated, without opposition, by the Democrats of Shelby and Rush counties as their candidate for Judge of the Sixteenth Judicial Circuit and elected in the fall of that year. In 1913 Shelby county was made a separate judicial circuit. At the primary held in the spring of 1916 Judge Blair was again nominated without opposition by the Democrats as their candidate for Judge of the Shelby Circuit Court, was elected in the fall of the same year, and entered upon his duties as Judge for a second term on the first day of January, 1917. Judge Blair is well known among the leading Democrats of the State.

The Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks, one of the greatest Democratic leaders, and one of the most profound and eminent statesmen of his time, was a resident of Shelby county from the time he was scarcely three years old until the year 1860, a period of more than thirty-eight years. The rapid rise of this great character was phenomenal. He began the practice of law at the Shelby county bar in the year 1843. From the very beginning his career as a lawyer and public man was assured. He soon became one of the leading citizens of the county, as well as one of its most successful lawyers. Following his admission to the bar, he soon became the recognized leader of the Democratic party of the county. In the year 1848 he was nominated and elected to the Legislature by the Democrats, and here proved himself a forcible speaker and sound reasoner. Later he served with distinction as the county's representative in the constitutional convention which convened in 1850. At the Democratic congressional convention of the Fifth district, held in the city of Indianapolis in 1851, he was nominated on the thirty-third ballot as the Democratic nominee for Congress and afterward elected in the fall of the same year. In the National Congress he rapidly won the respect and admiration of his colleagues and soon became one of the leaders of the Democratic party. His career as United States Senator, as Governor of the State of Indiana and as Vice-President of the nation is familiar to all and need not here be repeated. He continued to reside in Shelbyville until 1860, when he removed to the city of Indianapolis, where he afterward resided until the time of his death.

The Democrats of Shelby county point with pride to the name of the Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks, once the humblest among them, then their leader, then the State took him from them and placed upon him the mantle of her highest honors—then the Nation took him from the State and recognized him as one of the most eminent and profound statesmen of his time.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF SPENCER COUNTY

SPENCER COUNTY was organized under an act of the legislature in 1818, just two years after the state was admitted to the Union. Since that time her political favoritism has not been all shown to one party by any manner of means. Her majorities either way, Democratic, Whig or Republican, have never been anything for either party to brag about. Even in presidential elections Spencer county has been held rather uncertain and results have been sufficiently close to make party organization a very important factor in determining results. In state and county elections not only efficient political organization, but the comparative worth of candidates has been a large determining factor. Such a condition usually contributes to and accomplishes good government by retaining men above the average in public offices.

Although the early election returns, those prior to the election of 1832, were all destroyed in the court house fire which occurred in 1833, most of what happened during these first fourteen years of the county history was brought about through Democratic officials.

It was from 1832 to 1840 that things began to grow more uncertain, and in the years following this condition has grown decidedly more pronounced. For instance, in the presidential election of November, 1832, Jackson, the Democratic candidate, received 191 votes to 106 for Clay, the opposing Whig candidate. Just two years later, in 1834, Noah Noble, the Whig candidate for governor, was given 240 votes against 163 for James G. Reed, the Democratic nominee.

In the presidential election of 1836 came one of those peculiar things that happen in politics, described as a "landslide." In the contest for governor John Dumont, the Democratic nominee, received almost the entire vote, having 544 against David Wallace, the opposing Whig candidate, who received only 40 votes, showing absolute independence of party lines.

In the November election of 1840, wherein Harrison and Van Buren were the contending candidates, Harrison received 589 votes, and Van Buren but 316. Thus the Democrats were defeated by a substantial majority—in fact, receiving almost two to one in the vote cast, while but three years before the Whigs received no consideration whatever.

The population of the county was increasing considerably, making the larger vote, and the Democrats gained something from this in the four years preceding 1844. Clay, the Whig candidate, in this year received three less votes than Harrison in 1840.

Polk, the Democratic nominee, added 180 to the vote accorded Van Buren in 1840. The vote stood 586 for Clay, and 496 for Polk.

In the election for governor in 1846 Joseph G. Marshall, Whig candidate, received 513, to 490 given James Whitcomb, the Democratic nominee. The Whigs further improved conditions for themselves in 1848, the voters of Spencer county giving to Taylor, the Whig candidate for president, 681, and to Cass, the Democratic nominee, but 471, showing a majority of 210 in the county for the Whig nominee.

Joseph A. Wright, candidate for governor in 1849 on the Democratic ticket, improved conditions for his party both at this election and in that following in 1852. In the first election he received 534 votes, to 591 cast for James A. Matson, the Whig candidate, and in 1852, when Wright opposed Nicholas McCarty, Wright received 757 votes, to 570 given McCarty.

The 1852 election having also been presidential year, Pierce, the Democratic nominee, carried Spencer county with 709 votes, against 685 accorded to Scott, the Whig candidate. That was the last campaign for the Whig party. The name of the political organization was changed to "Republican," and in the first election held under the new name the adherents in Spencer county certainly had much to discourage them. Buchanan, the Democratic nominee, received 1,259 votes, the Republicans only 225 under Fremont, while Fillmore, heading the ticket of the American party, received 808.

In that same year Oliver P. Morton, who was the Republican candidate for governor, fared much better than the presidential part of the ticket, although the state election was held earlier in the year than the presidential, and personal popularity of the candidates had greater chance for consideration. Morton had 1,083 votes as the head of the Republican ticket, while A. P. Willard received 1,295.

November, 1860, brought the famous Lincoln and Douglas campaign to a close, and in Spencer county, as in most of the counties of Indiana, Abraham Lincoln led. Even had the Breckinridge vote of 175 been given to Douglas, the Democratic ticket would still have been shy of enough to carry the county. Lincoln received 1,296 votes, against 1,105 for Douglas.

In the state election of 1860 Spencer county gave Thomas A. Hendricks 1,367 votes, against 1,265 for Henry S. Lane, and two years later, in 1862, James S. Athon, Democratic nominee for secretary of state, had 1,159 votes, to 1,003 given his Republican opponent, W. A. Peelle.

Democratic sentiment and organization continued strong during the war, and when Lincoln appeared for his second election, in 1864, he received 1,558 votes, against 1,417 for McClellan, the Democratic nominee.

In that same year for governor, two men of recognized ability being candidates, Oliver P. Morton, Republican, received 1,577 votes, to 1,468 for Joseph E. McDonald, Democratic nominee.

In 1866 and 1868 the county continued to give Republican majorities, although in the latter year Thomas A. Hendricks was the candidate for governor. He received only 1,872 votes, against 1,943 given to Conrad Baker, Republican nominee.

In the presidential election Grant received 1,982 Spencer county votes, while Seymour, the Democratic nominee, had only 1,849.

Democratic organization succeeded in 1870 in reducing the Republican lead to 13 votes. In fact, in some portions of the ticket the Democrats won, and in 1872 Thomas A. Hendricks in a splendid state campaign was given 2,245 votes in Spencer county, to 2,177 received by Brown.

That was presidential year, and from the appearance of the presidential vote it is easy to determine that the lead accorded Hendricks was brought about by his individual popularity. Grant for president received 2,131 votes, against Greeley with 1,974.

As a result of the Hendricks campaign and success in 1872, two years later the Democrats again carried Spencer county by good majorities; and in 1876, the presidential year, the vote was decidedly Democratic, Hendricks at that time being candidate for vice-president on the ticket with Tilden. The Democratic vote was 2,455, against 2,040 for Hayes.

In that same year Spencer contributed her portion to the success of James D. Williams, candidate for governor, against Benjamin Harrison. Williams was accorded 2,475, while Harrison received 2,123, and other candidates on the two tickets ran in about the same proportion.

Indiana had another vice-presidential candidate in 1880, when Hancock and English were the respective nominees for president and vice-president. They carried Spencer county with 2,475 votes, to 2,363 for Garfield and Arthur. While Franklin Landers, Democratic nominee for governor, in that year was given a good lead in Spencer county, H. E. Porter, the Republican nominee, defeated him in the state.

Democratic leads in 1882 were rather narrow, and in the presidential election and that for governor two years later, in 1884, there was very little difference in the vote given the national and state nominees. Cleveland had Hendricks for his running mate in that campaign, and received in Spencer county 2,530 votes, to 2,408 given Blaine and Logan.

From this time forward and until the Progressives broke their lead in 1912, the Republicans did most of the winning—in fact, carrying all of the presidential campaigns, usually by very close majorities. The state elections were a little more fortunate for the Democrats, but even there they encountered a long losing streak.

In the presidential elections, for instance, beginning with 1888 and to 1908, the Spencer county results were these: In 1888, Democratic, 2,685, Republican 2,732; in 1892 only one Democratic elector received a majority over his Republican opponent. This was William H. Bracken, elector-at-large, who received 2,496, against Robert B. F. Pierce, who had 2,478 votes. The other Democratic electors received 2,458 votes and the Republicans 2,464, a majority of only 6, but sufficient to carry the county.

In 1896, Democrats 2,745, Republicans 3,047; in 1900, Democrats 2,816, Republicans 2,979; in 1904, Democrats 2,495, Republicans 3,017; in 1908, Democrats 2,662, Republicans 2,920.

In 1912 came the Progressive campaign. This year the Republicans usually ran third, but in this instance they managed to be second. Spencer county gave the Democrats 2,448, the Republicans 1,268 and the Progressives 1,142 for the presidential electors.

In 1916, the Progressives not being sufficiently strong to make any impression, the Democrats received 2,335, Republicans 2,560.

In the state elections following 1884 the results show, as stated, more favorable for Democracy, although the Democratic party since that time has had nothing to brag about in victories. The results have been these:

In 1884, for governor, Democrats 2,533, Republicans 2,409.

In 1886, for secretary, Democrats 2,555, Republicans, 2,467.

In 1888, for governor, Democrats 2,684, Republicans 2,736—a Republican victory.

In 1890 there was a material falling off in the vote: Democrats 2,256, Republicans 1,855, for secretary of state.

In 1892, for governor, the Republicans had a majority of two in the county: Democrats 2,458, Republicans 2,460.

In 1894, for secretary of state, Democratic 2,420, Republican 2,735.

In 1896, another presidential year, the vote for governor was: Democratic 2,697, Republican

3,014. That was Bryan's first campaign, and he lost the county in about the same proportion as the state ticket suffered.

In 1898, for secretary of state, Democratic 2,543, Republican 2,744.

In 1900, for governor, in Bryan's second race, the vote was 2,778 Democratic to 2,930 Republican.

In 1902, for secretary of state, Democratic 2,499, Republican 2,764.

In 1904, when Parker was a candidate for the presidency, Spencer gave to the Democratic candidate 2,472 and to the Republican candidate 2,973.

In 1908, Democratic 2,635, Republican 2,876.

In 1910, for secretary of state, Democratic 2,673, Republican 2,659.

In 1912, for governor, this being the year when the Progressives predominated, Spencer county cast 2,387 for the Democrats, and 1,244 for the Republicans, giving to the Progressives 1,128.

In 1914 the Progressive campaign was less serious to the Republicans, the vote being Democratic 2,268, Republican 1,878, Progressive 723, these being the votes on United States senator.

In 1916 John A. M. Adair, Democratic nominee for governor, received 2,341 votes, to 2,492 given to James P. Goodrich, his Republican opponent.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF STARKE COUNTY

IN 1838 the territory of northern Indiana, though sparsely settled, was divided by an act of the Legislature into districts or counties and the county boundary lines were established. Starke county was one of these counties thus formed and because of it being so thinly settled it was joined with Marshall county for county purposes and continued to be so joined until 1850, when a call was sent out to the inhabitants of Starke county for a mass-meeting for the purpose of talking over county organization and formulating a plan whereby it could be consummated. This meeting was held as near the center of the county as was convenient, and after some deliberation a committee was appointed to locate and lay out a county seat, which was done on April 1, 1851, by a locating committee consisting of the following named persons: William C. Barnett, L. Chamberlain, William M. Patterson, and named Knox in honor of General Henry Knox of Revolutionary fame. The committee then proceeded in the usual way to perfect the organization of the county and the following named people who, of course, seemed to be the prime movers in the process of organization, were appointed the first officials of the county: Stephen Jackson, county clerk; Jacob G. Black, county auditor; Jacob Bozarth, county recorder; Jacob Tilman, county treasurer; James B. Prettyman, county coroner; Jacob S. Wampler, county sheriff; William Parker, George Esty, John W. Hopkins, county commissioners; John S. Bender, county surveyor. It happens that Starke county was settled principally by men who were leaders in the Jefferson principles of Democracy. So far as can be learned there was no Democratic organization or central committee as we have today. It seems that Charles S. Tibbets can be spoken of as the first Democratic county chairman or leader. In all probability and from the best records obtainable he shared this honor at succeeding elections with James H. Adair, John Good, Solon Whitson, Jacob Black, M. T. Hepner and others between the years 1850 and 1874, at which time W. C. Boyles became county chairman, who, in 1876, was followed by Sylvester McCrackin. In 1878 Robert H. Bender was chosen and served until 1884, when Samuel S. Bonner was selected, who was followed in succession by the following named men: 1886, John G. Kratli; 1888, William B. Sinclair; 1890, Jacob Bozarth, who served until 1898, when James C. Fletcher became county chairman and served until 1902, when he was followed by Robert D. Peters, who in 1904 gave way to George Rogers, who in turn was succeeded by James C. Fletcher, who served until 1908, when Clarence M. Fuller became the leader and served until 1914, when August H. Knosman, our present county chairman, was chosen. Starke county, though sparsely settled and small in size, was considered a Democratic county with a great degree of certainty from 1850 to 1894, when, for the first time in its career, it was carried by the Republicans on the State ticket. Most of its county officers have been Democrats; in fact, it was a very strange thing that a Republican was elected to office in Starke county from 1850 to 1894; however, occasionally one was successful.

Starke county has never been entitled to a representative in the State Legislature, but has always been joined with some other county for legislative purposes. However, the following named men from Starke county have several times represented the district in the State Legislature: Lloyd Glasebrook, so far as I am able to learn, was the first one, who was succeeded by his son, Dr. Lorenzo Glasebrook; who was followed, possibly not in succession, by William Perry; who gave way to James Peele, and he to Sylvester Bertram, and he to Lon E. Bernethy. These men, from the best information obtainable, served their districts with credit to it and honor to themselves. They were also found steadfast in the cause which they represented and ready and willing to support any worthy cause for the best interest of the State. The only representative in the upper branch of the State Legislature that Starke county can lay claim to is the Hon. Chester A. McCormick, who was elected Joint Senator from Jasper, Newton, White and Starke counties in 1912. He made a very enviable record for himself in both the 68th and 69th sessions of the Legislature. The most prominent Democrats in county affairs that Starke county can claim are perhaps in the order of prominence named as follows: Solon O. Whitson, James H. Adair, R. H. Bender, John S. Bender, M. T. Hepner, A. P. Dial, Wingate Prettyman, Jacob Bozarth, James C. Fletcher and Henry Schricke, of Knox, and Jacob Keller, Charles W. Weninger, Lon E. Bernethy, Chester A. McCormick and others, of North Judson. The Hon. George W. Beeman was also one of the very prominent Democrats of Knox. He was the first and only Democratic Judge of the Forty-fourth Judicial District who lived in Starke county. Of the above named gentlemen Mr. Keller perhaps was the most widely known. He was an energetic merchant and politician and always favored any movement which would benefit his native town or county. When the new tax law was passed he, against his wishes, was prevailed upon to serve his county in the capacity of county assessor. Starke county has had the honor of having one candidate on the State ticket since its origin in 1850, namely, Prof. William B. Sinclair, who was the choice of his party on two different occasions for the office of State Superintendent of Public Instruction. As has been said before, Starke county has been a Democratic county from its origin until quite recent years. It has invariably returned a Democratic majority in state and national tickets varying from 50 to 300, the cause of the variation being the increase in population.

The first newspaper in Starke county, strong in the support of Democratic principles, was launched in Knox, the county seat, in the summer of 1861 by J. A. Berry, its editor and publisher. This paper was known as the Starke County Press and was ably edited until its suspension near the close of the war. The next frontier journalist to link his fortunes with a newspaper in the county was Oliver C. Musselman, who launched the Starke County Ledger in Knox during the early months of 1867. Mr. Musselman continued to edit and publish the Ledger, with the assistance of his son, Clum Musselman, until 1892, when he sold the plant to J. Don Gorrell, who changed the name of the paper to the Starke County Democrat and modernized it in many respects. Mr. Gorrell was an enthusiastic, energetic Jeffersonian Democrat, who brought new life and vigor to the forces of his party in the county. In 1893 he was succeeded by his brother, Samuel M. Gorrell, who continued as editor and publisher of the Democrat until September 1, 1908, when Henry F. Schricker, a native son of the county, purchased and took charge of the plant. Mr. Schricker is still at the helm and his strong advocacy of Democratic doctrine has been a source of strength to his party throughout the district. Much can be said in regard to the efficient work of the Democratic paper of this county. In fact, many prominent Democrats believe that it was a very efficient means by which the Democratic candidates were able to win the confidence of the citizens of the county, thus securing their success at the polls. The following is the list of Democratic officeholders, both appointed and elected, from 1850 to 1914:

CLERK OF CIRCUIT COURT.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF STEUBEN COUNTY

By Frank B. Van Auken

A REPUBLICAN chairman once exclaimed, "Where the hell is Steuben county?" Well, it is in the cool corner of Indiana adjacent to Michigan and Ohio. Yet, when fifteen hundred Democrats impinge against twenty-five hundred Republicans in campaign times, the heat becomes torrid.

To explain these age-long contests with some account of the captains who have led the fray need not take very long. The results have been so distressing that within the last fifty years only a very few live Democrats have caught any glimpse of the promised land. Does this seem discouraging? Not so. The contest for an equal and just government bequeathed, like "freedom's cause," "from bleeding sire to son," has produced a body of men not lured by the bribe of office, but held together by abiding faith that "ever the truth comes uppermost and ever is justice done." Time has seemed long, but the reward of victory great, for Wilson has written "in letters of living light, no question is ever settled until it is settled right."

The earliest teachers of Democracy in this corner of Indiana was a band of Maumee Indians. They taught by example. Was not every warrior the equal in privilege of every other save as wisdom in council or prowess in war gave him prestige? So Democratic were they that a red man wearing a white man's coat was driven from the tribe in disgrace. They called Steuben county their "good hunting ground." And why not? Did not its many kinds of forests, its prairies and marshes, waving with luxuriant grasses, its streams dammed with great jam piles and much more imposing then than now; and almost a hundred enchanting lakes surrounded with shaded hills—a land abounding with great nut-bearing trees, wild fruit, fish and game—who doubts that this was to the child of the forest a paradise of repose? Resentment against the pale intruders caused the "Great Father" to lead the last remnant of these wild people forever toward the setting sun. They had already heard the tramp of Anthony Wayne's pale warriors as they marched through the magnificent region from Detroit to Fort Wayne, and Tecumseh, the mighty, had read his doom in the dark waters of Tippecanoe.

Between May, 1837, when the county was organized, and the Civil War the Democrats carried the county twice only. Lewis Cass, Democrat, for president in 1848 over Taylor and Van Buren by a plurality of 37, and Franklin Pierce in 1852 over Winfield Scott and John P. Hale by a plurality of 56, out of a total vote of 1,163. These were the only candidates who ever carried the county in a general election and their success was due probably to the division of the Whigs on the question of slavery and the question of free schools. At all other general elections, before or since the war, the Whigs or the Republicans have been triumphant.

In 1874 the Democrats and Liberal Republicans in a coalition elected part of the county ticket. In 1912, thanks to Taft and "Teddy," the usual majority of 800 to 1,000 was almost annihilated.

The pioneers of the county came from Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio, bringing very strong anti-slavery sentiments with them and this has tinged the politics of the county to this day.

The two most prominent pioneer families were the Stayners of Jackson Prairie at the west, and the Powers family who laid their family altars among the sugar groves at the east. The impress of these noted families can still be read in the community life about them. John Stayner, man of property and first settler, represented Steuben and Dekalb in the Legislature of 1850. All four brothers of the Powers family, Clark, Stephen, Winn and Calvin, were noted men, Stephen having been surveyor at different times; Calvin, county commissioner, and Clark, representative in the General Assembly of 1845-6. In 1888 Stephen A., son of Clark Powers, was chosen after a remarkable contest, Circuit Judge by a majority of 7, the district being Steuben, Dekalb and Noble, and in 1908, after a house-to-house canvass, he was elected Joint Senator from Steuben and Dekalb. In the Assembly he was noted as chief opponent of the "Marshall" revision of the constitution. His long gray hair led to much merriment about the capitol, the boys giving him the soubriquet, "Quaker Oats." He was widely known as president of the "Old Settlers," whose meeting became an institution. This fine citizen and patriot died in 1913. His eulogy should be "One of the Kindest of Men."

Frank M., son of Calvin and cousin of Stephen A. Powers, was chosen to the Circuit Court bench of Steuben and Dekalb, the Thirty-fifth Judicial District, in 1910, and elevated to the Appellate Court of Indiana in 1914. His premature death from pneumonia, after a few weeks at the capital, cast a pall of sadness over the entire State. His fame as a jurist was based upon an insight of justice which, like that of the ancient patriarch, rose above the written statute and made him, to the humble and the great, a plain, wise, just judge.

Cyrus Cline, of Angola, a lawyer and banker by profession, was elected to Congress in 1908, re-elected in 1910, 1912 and 1914, and is the only Steuben county Democrat who ever became a member of that body.

At the election of 1912 two young Democrats of the county were successful, James R. Nyce as Prosecuting Attorney of the Judicial District of Steuben and Dekalb, and Glenn Van Auken as Joint Senator for the same counties.

Among the noted Democrats who have presided over the Steuben County Court are Charles W. Ewing, Henry Chase, John W. Wright, Elza McMahon, James L. Worden, Edwin R. Wilson, Robert Lowry, Hiram Tously, Charles A. O. McClellan, F. M. Powers, and last, but not least, our present Circuit Judge, Daniel M. Link.

Distinguished Democratic lawyers who have graced the county bar, so far as the writer can learn, have been Edward R. May, William G. Croxton, George B. Adams, S. A. and F. M. Powers, Benjamin F. Dawson, Cyrus Cline, Alphonso C. Wood and Charles A. Yotter, for many years able speakers and workers for the county Democracy.

Democrats who have represented the county in the State Senate have been Madison Marsh, 1846; Reuben F. Dawson, 1849; Stephen A. Powers, 1908, and Glenn Van Auken, 1912.

Democrats in the State House of Representatives, as near as can be ascertained, have been George W. Balding, 1846; George W. McConnell, 1851, and Lewis Price, of Lagrange county, in 1912.

A list of Democratic chairmen is more or less incomplete, as some of the early names seem covered with the dust of oblivion. Within forty years the list is: Harmon Freygang, George E. Young, John Somerlott, Cyrus Cline and A. C. Wood.

To Harmon Freygang the writer awards the palm as our greatest Democrat—faithful, wise, adroit, fearful to the enemies of Democracy, yet gracious to all and trusted by all. "Honor and the good repute which follow faithful service as its fruits be unto him whose memory we salute."

In medicine and surgery four brothers, A. C., H. D., T. F. and F. Wood, have given prestige to the county. Three of them have been noted Democrats. Alphonso C., killed in a runaway in 1868, was mourned as our first citizen. In this sketch belong the names of Doctors M. F. Morse, T. B.

Williams, G. W. McConnell and Thomas J. Creel, present Mayor of this beautiful city of Angola.

The first and only Democratic paper, the Angola Herald, was founded in January, 1876, by Isaac L. Wiseman, and still enjoys modest prosperity. July, 1877, W. K. Sheffer became owner and editor, continuing for twenty-nine years, to 1906. C. C. Klink and H. W. Morley, present proprietor and editor, complete the list to the present time. W. B. McConnell was for two years part owner and editor. Mr. Sheffer still abides among the faithful as reporter for the Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette.

Some account of the campaign of 1848 may be of interest. Cyrus G. Luce, who settled on a wild farm and with his own hands split the rails to fence it, said to the writer: "I made a furious campaign in Steuben and Dekalb counties on a platform of Free Schools and lost." Reuben F. Dawson and Mr. Luce rode from place to place on horseback and in their joint debates abuse played as great a part as argument. The same Mr. Luce was afterward twice Governor of Michigan. How public opinion changes! A leading Republican of those days said to a friend now living, "You don't know what you're doing. This free school law would be the ruination of the country."

The campaign of 1841 sounds like an Indian story, but it is true and illustrates mightily the importance of getting out the last Democratic vote. Dr. Madison Marsh, noted Democrat of the county, lost on the face of the returns by one vote to his Republican opponent, Captain Beall. On a contest it was decided that one vote for Mr. Marsh, that of Henry Shoemaker, whose ballot had been received after the time limit but before the box was closed, had been improperly thrown out and he was declared elected to the Legislature. Edward A. Hannegan was elected United States Senator by one vote, Dr. Marsh casting the deciding vote. Texas was admitted to the Union, it is declared, by a majority of one, Hannegan being the man of destiny to decide the momentous issue. The Mexican war ensued as well as other mighty consequences and all is traced to Steuben or Dekalb county's careless Democratic voter, and as the boys say, "What do you know about that?"

It may be interesting to some Democrats farther south to hear something about an "underground railroad," some of which traversed Steuben county. One of the three main lines through Indiana started at Cincinnati, running to Richmond, Winchester, Portland, Decatur, Fort Wayne and through Steuben county to Coldwater and Battle Creek, the objective point being Windsor, Canada. Of course, their operation was forbidden by both Federal and State law, and therefore their operation was carried on with great secrecy. I mention one station on the State road through this county—Farnam—where, to the writer's knowledge, a secret basement was made under the feeding floor of a cattle barn, where "colored gentlemen" were hid and fed during the day and at night taken in a close carriage, or more often in a wagon partly filled with straw, covered with blankets, and delivered in record time to the next station, ten or fifteen miles farther north. For a Democrat to turn the darkies back or cause their arrest would lead to intense denunciation and sometimes to mob violence by the anti-slavery zealotry whose hot rancor has hardly cooled to this half century day. But the war settled the "Impending Crisis," the interne-cine strife of a country "half slave and half free" for all time and made what was a tragedy to one generation an amusing story to the next.

Does this have to do with the Democratic history of a county? Yes; much with the party history of every county in Indiana. These things were done under the doctrine that "the end justifies the means." Did not Lincoln teach his party that on a moral question "one is a majority," and did not Sumner say "on slavery there is no other side?" Democracy was antagonized by a great party ruled by no consideration but expediency. If the constitution or Supreme Court got in the way it was treated with defiance just as Webster said it would be. because did not their ends justify any means to their accomplishment? Witness the throwing out of States to usurp the Presidency in 1876, the buying of an election in 1880, "blocks of five" in 1888, and in 1896 advocating free silver before election and gold standard after.

The writer organized the first graded schools in the county. Professor H. H. Keep, now head of Science Department, Angola High School; C. C. Sherrard, Dean of the Department of Pharmacy, and Willis A. Fox, of the Tri-State College, are prominent and strong Democrats of the present day.

Steuben county is about twenty miles square, the contour undulating and picturesque, the soil responsive and fertile. It was once covered, except Jackson Prairie, by magnificent forests. Many of the handsomest lakes in Indiana abound. Lakes James, Crooked, Clear, Gage and Fish are widely known as resorts, and increasing in fame from year to year. Clear Lake was the scene in July, 1858, of the most distressing accident in the county's history. Sixteen young people in a pleasure boat were capsized and eleven were drowned. The pilot was in his cups.

The county lies some thousand and twenty feet above the gulf—a glacial drift hundreds of feet thick—producing the finest grains and fruits, a county of great railways, schools and churches. Its 13,000 progressive people descended from the brave pioneers

"Who cleft the forest down
And planted in the wilderness
The hamlet and the town."

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF SULLIVAN COUNTY

By John S. Taylor

ORIGINALLY the lands through the Middle West were peopled and controlled by the American Indian. The French government, through its agents, acquired much land by treaty from these Indians. In 1742, by treaty, certain Frenchmen acquired a vast amount of territory in the vicinity of Vincennes, Ind., later known as the Vincennes district. The general description of the Vincennes district at that time was—"lying between the point above, Pointe Coupee en haut, and the river Blanche, below the village, with as much land on both sides of the Wabash as might be comprised within the said limits." Pointe Coupee was a mile or so above the mouth of Busseron Creek, in the southwest corner of what is now Gill township, in Sullivan county. The village referred to in the treaty was Vincennes, and the river Blanche was White river. The treaty of 1742 thus comprised practically all of Knox county and the southern portion of Sullivan county, besides some lands west of the Wabash river.

By the treaty of June 7, 1803, General Harrison concluded an agreement with a number of Indian tribes whereby more lands were ceded. The line ran in a southeasterly direction from Pointe Coupee. This boundary is the "Old Indian Boundary" which figures in land descriptions in the south part of Sullivan county. The south part of Gill and Jefferson townships and most of Haddon township, in Sullivan county, were included in this cession of 1803. The present town of Carlisle was also included.

By the Indian treaty of September 30, 1809, the Indians ceded all the country between the boundary line established by the treaty of 1803, the Wabash river, and a line drawn from the mouth of Raccoon creek in a southeasterly direction to White river. Raccoon creek is a few miles above Terre Haute. By this treaty the United States public domain was extended from about the locality of Carlisle to about the northern limit of Vigo county. The area gained by this treaty was called the "New Purchase," in distinction from the "Old Purchase," which lay south of the Indian boundary line.

An act of the State Legislature in January, 1816, directed that the townships of Palmyra and Busseron, in Knox county, be extended north to the Harrison Purchase line, meaning thereby the line of the purchase of 1809. This placed, temporarily, all of the territory later comprised in Sullivan and Vigo counties in the two townships named, and so it remained until the organization of the new county.

In December, 1816, an act was passed providing for the organization of Sullivan county in the following January, Section 1 thereof being as follows: "Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That from and after the 15th day of January next, all that part of the county of Knox contained within the following boundaries shall constitute and form a separate county, viz.: Beginning on the Wabash river where the line dividing Townships Five and Six crosses the same; thence running east with said line until it strikes the west fork of White river; thence up the said fork to the Orange county line; thence with said line to the Indian boundary line; thence with said boundary line crossing the Wabash river to the line dividing the State of Indiana and the Territory of Illinois; thence with said line south to the Wabash river; thence down the said river with the meanders thereof to the place of beginning." The following section of the Act states in part that said new county shall be known and designated by the name and style of Sullivan. The north and east boundary lines of the county have been changed from time to time and consequently the area has been somewhat reduced; otherwise there has been no material change since its organization in 1816.

In the early days there was no county organization, so-called, but a few ardent Democrats planned together for the cause of Democracy. The first known county organization took form in 1860.

The first Democratic county chairman in Sullivan county was Dr. Michael Branson. Some members of the committee were A. Van Fossen, W. W. Owens and S. G. Burton.

There was never a man who could remember far enough back to establish the fact or show any well-developed symptom that Sullivan county ever was any but a staunch Democratic county. Occasionally, as must of course happen, the enemy would train its guns on one, or perhaps two, county candidates and slip in a local official, but all Democratic state and national candidates, and as a general rule all the county candidates, have always won in Sullivan county by wide margins. This splendid record has been largely due to qualified and active county chairmen, a list of whose names follow:

1860. Dr. Michael Branson.
 1862. Willis G. Neff.
 1864. Michael Malott.
 1868. W. E. Catlin.

The only representative Sullivan county ever had in Congress was Hon. John W. Davis. He first went in 1835, and was returned three times.

John W. Davis was speaker of the twenty-ninth session of the National House of Representatives. He had the distinction of being the first of three Indiana men who served in that high capacity.

Mr. Davis also served six times in the State Legislature and was three times speaker of that body.

In a county wherein Democrats have thrived so abundantly it is painful to attempt to choose between them for this bit of honorable mention. Would that it were possible to write volumes upon their deeds and valor. It is not that others were less worthy, but that those here named chanced to be the first called to mind, that their names and sketches of their public careers are here given:

Ransom W. Akin. 1804-1880. From Virginia. The pioneer member of the Akin family in the county all of whom are Democrats. A son, Charles T. Akin, has served three times with honor in the State Senate.

Joshua Alsop. 1807-1876. Born in England. Helped construct the first railroad through the county and he later became a director of the company. He repeatedly refused to accept public office but accepted the nomination and was elected to the State Senate in 1870.

Ferdinand Basler. Born in Switzerland. In 1885 elected Justice of the Peace; was county auditor, 1864 to 1868; was a member of the State Board of Agriculture in 1872, and was appointed by that Board a Delegate to the Vienna Exposition of 1873.

William Bledsoe. 1826-1905. A Hoosier and pioneer Democrat. With a record of having killed sixteen deer on three consecutive mornings, he was the most famous hunter the county ever produced. It is said that he killed the last wild deer ever seen in the county.

George Boone. 1784-1841. A descendant of the great Daniel Boone. He was sheriff of the county in 1821; State Senator in 1834; Representative in 1838 and 1840. He was nearly seven feet tall and had very large feet. It is said of him that, while visiting, he undertook to wash his feet in an iron kettle, was unable to get his feet out, and, in order to release him it was necessary to break the kettle.

Murray Briggs. 1830-1896. The pioneer newspaper man of the county. He edited the Democrat from 1854 to 1896, a record in the State for continuous service on the same paper. He and his paper formed the backbone of Sullivan County Democracy during the trying times of the Civil War. During his busy career he was school examiner, county auditor and president of the board of trustees of the Indiana State Normal School of Terre Haute.

John W. Davis. 1799-1859. Sullivan County Democrats and citizens generally are proud to own such a renowned statesman as was this man. He was the equal of any of his time and the superior of many. Well he wrought for his State and Nation and they are pleased to honor his name.

He graduated from the University of Maryland as a physician in 1821, went West immediately, and, with three cents in his pocket and a young wife to support, arrived at Carlisle. He practiced his profession for some years and entered politics in 1828, becoming probate judge. He served in the State Legislature six terms, and was three times speaker; was sent to Congress four times and was Speaker of the twenty-ninth session of the National House of Representatives. In 1847 President Polk appointed him Commissioner to China. In June, 1852, he was chairman of the Democratic National Convention at Baltimore. Cass and Buchanan were the principal candidates for the nomination. A deadlock developed and Mr. Davis came within one vote of defeating Franklin Pierce of Virginia for the nomination for President. Later President Pierce appointed Dr. Davis Governor of Oregon. His last public appointment was by the Secretary of War as a member of the Board of Visitors to the West Point Military Academy, and he served as chairman of the board.

It is said of him that during a campaign an auditor inquired of him regarding the advocacy of certain Democratic measures, and he answered: "My friend, to save you trouble and me annoyance, I will say now that I endorse everything the Democratic party ever has done, and everything that it ever will do."

James DePauw. In 1883 he represented Sullivan county in the State Legislature. He was among the first legislators to favor an ad valorem tax rather than a specific tax. He was largely responsible for the passage of the first ad valorem tax in the State. It was his son, Washington DePauw, for whom DePauw University was named.

Alonzo F. Estabrook. 1814-1892. Born in Vermont. A physician and surveyor. He helped survey the Wabash and Erie canal.

William H. Griffin. 1816-1893. A saddle manufacturer. Was county commissioner during the Civil War. Was county treasurer in 1866 and was re-elected in 1868.

Maj. William C. Griffith. 1798-1892. He recruited a company of volunteers for the war of 1812 and was chosen major. He helped burn the brick for and lay stone in the court house in this county, and later served as clerk of the circuit court, 1867.

William Hosea Hawkins. Was county sheriff from 1888 to 1892. Under Cleveland he was appointed a United States Marshal. During the American Railway Union strike he led a posse of deputies, on a special train given him for the purpose, to Hammond, Indiana, read an order of the court to the angry mob and brought the leaders to Indianapolis. He later became prominent in State politics and served as Secretary of the State central committee for four years. He was widely and familiarly known for his ready wit and ability as a "story teller."

Thomas Holder. A pioneer Democrat. He is thought to have built the first cabin put up by a white man north of Knox County.

Thomas J. Mann. A prominent Democrat. He was twice county chairman and was clerk of the circuit court one term.

William W. Owens. 1809-1903. He was, in his later years, known as "Uncle Billy." It is said that, as a boy, he worked in a butcher shop patronized by Andrew Jackson. He was an ardent Democrat and held county office.

William McKendree Springer. 1836-1903. He was a native of the county and a life-long Democrat. He graduated from Indiana University in 1858 and shortly thereafter moved to Illinois. He was a member of the constitutional convention for Illinois; was in the State Legislature in 1872, and in 1874 was elected to Congress from the Springfield district and served in the Forty-fourth and Fifty-third Congresses. He is credited with leading the fight against the McKinley tariff which resulted in the election of Grover Cleveland a second time.

Henry K. Wilson. 1815-1882. A Tennessean. He came to this county in 1831. While a mere lad he served as deputy clerk under Benjamin Wolfe when the county seat was in Merom. In 1843, when the seat was changed to Sullivan, where it has since been, he was appointed clerk of the circuit court. Later he was twice auditor; was also county recorder and served in the State Senate in 1861 and 1875.

John Harvey Wilson. 1811-1904. He was also a Tennessean. On attaining his majority, before leaving for Indiana to make his home, his father, as was customary at a son's majority, presented him with a suit of clothes made by a poor tailor of Greenville, named Andrew Johnson, who was afterward President of the United States. Wilson was a useful citizen, an ardent Democrat and held many county offices.

Benjamin Wolfe. 1799-1868. A Virginian. He served many years as postmaster at Merom and at Bloomington; was clerk of the circuit court two terms; served four terms in the State Legislature and was a member of the constitutional convention—1851-1852.

The first newspaper in the county, a Democratic paper, the Jacksonian Democrat, was established in 1844. Jeremiah Young was the editor. It continued through only a few numbers.

James C. Allen and Thomas Marks used the same plant for the publication of the Carlisle Messenger. Later George W. Bee & Co. were editors and publishers. A copy, No. 41, of Volume 1, dated November 19, 1845, is preserved by the Helms family of Carlisle.

In 1854 J. J. Mayes of Vincennes came to Sullivan and proposed to start a paper. Five Democrats, Joseph W. Wolfe, John S. Davis, Isaac Stewart, Joseph Gray and William Wilson advanced $25.00 apiece to make payment on the press and material and endorsed notes for the remainder. Mayes proved unsatisfactory and left shortly. In September of the same year the Democratic leaders got out two more issues, Samuel R.

Hamill writing the editorials. When the election was over publication was again suspended.

In 1854 Murray Briggs, then a printer in Terre Haute, chanced to see an advertisement in the Democrat, over the signature of Joseph W. Wolfe, "An editor wanted." Mr. Briggs soon came to Sullivan, bought the office and from that time forward was proprietor and publisher of the Sullivan Democrat. Mr. Briggs continued as editor until his death, September 18, 1896. No other editor in the State had a record of so long continuous service on the same paper. For about a year Mr. Briggs' sons issued the Democrat and on July 20, 1897, S. Paul Poynter of Greencastle took over the paper and has since conducted the Democrat. On July 17, 1905, the Sullivan Daily Times came forth from the same plant and is now a thriving daily.

In February, 1878, George W. Basler, publisher, together with Colonel Taylor, editor, begun issuing the True Democracy. In 1881 Dr. J. C. Bartlett took over this paper and named it the Sullivan Times. D. O. Groff next had it and passed it on in 1885 to C. W. Welman, who continued as editor and manager until 1896. At that time John A. Curry took charge of the Times and continued it for a few months when it was sold. Publication was soon discontinued and the plant consolidated with the Sullivan Democrat.

In July, 1876, the Carlisle Register was established in Carlisle by William Herron. E. H. Bailey took over the paper and changed the name to the Carlisle Democrat, and his brother, W. W. Bailey, became editor. In 1879 they moved the plant to Vincennes and consolidated with the Reporter.

Sullivan County has given Democratic majorities to Presidents, as far back as can be ascertained, as follows:

| | |
|---------------------------------|-------|
| 1856. James Buchanan | 980 |
| 1860. Stephen A. Douglas | 1,002 |

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF SWITZERLAND COUNTY

THE county of Switzerland, with Vevay as the county seat, was organized by an act of the Legislature approved September 7, 1814. It was taken out of what was then Dearborn and Jefferson counties.

The political complexion of the county has been by no means entirely one way, although the Democrats have had more than an equal division, and in later years the majority has always been counted as safely Democratic.

Governor Thomas Posey appointed the several officers who first served the new county.

The first election under the constitution of the new State was held on the 3d day of February, 1817. There was no political division between the political parties, as such in this election.

William Cotton and James McClure were elected associate judges, John Francis Dufour clerk, John Francis Siebenthal sheriff, Frederick Waldo coroner, James Rous, Caleb Mounts and Isaac Stanley county commissioners.

The first term of the circuit court was held on the 17th of March, 1817, with John Test sitting as presiding judge. The county commissioners held their first meeting seven days after their election in Vevay. They ordered that an election be held in the several townships on Saturday, the 23d day of February, 1817, for the purpose of electing justices of the peace. There were various changes in the personnel of the board of county commissioners, brought about through resignation, appointments and new elections, until 1824, when the office of county commissioner was abolished and justices of the peace took over the duties which had previously been assigned to the commissioners. This board of justices elected a president and held regular stated meetings, in addition to attending to the regular duties which still attach to the office of justice of the peace. The law was very strict, requiring that the clerk report to the prosecuting attorney of the county any justices who did not attend these regular meetings, so it was seldom they met without having a quorum or a full attendance.

In the presidential election of 1824 wherein John Quincy Adams was elected sixth president of the United States, Switzerland county cast 250 votes for the Democratic ticket and 126 for the Republican national ticket. Again in 1828 and 1832 the county returned a safe Democratic majority.

In the first election in which William Henry Harrison became a candidate for the presidency, that of 1836, Switzerland county gave him a maajority over Martin Van Buren, the Democratic candidate.

In 1840, the memorable campaign in which the Whigs were so intensely interested in electing Indiana's favorite son, William Henry Harrison, Switzerland county joined in returning a majority of 400 for the Republican nominee.

In 1844 the majority returned to the Democrats and remained so until the campaign of 1860, when Lincoln had a small plurality over Douglas and Breckinridge.

In the 1844 campaign Polk, the Democratic nominee, received but 45 majority in the county over Clay, while in 1848 Cass led Taylor, the Republican nominee, by even less than this. Pierce added to the Democratic majority in 1852, and in 1856 it grew even larger with Buchanan as the Democratic nominee.

In 1860 Lincoln received 734 votes, while Douglas, representing the northern wing of the Democracy, received 476; Breckinridge, Southern Democrat, 499, and Bell of the Union party 510. Thus it will be seen that the vote was pretty evenly distributed among the four candidates.

In 1864, however, the county became strongly Republican, and it was twenty years later before the Democrats again carried the county in a presidential campaign.

In 1864 Lincoln's vote was 1,440 against 855 for McClellan. In 1868 General Grant received 1,466, against 1,209 for Pendleton. In 1872 there was no Democratic improvement, Grant receiving 1,444 to 1,116 for Greeley.

In 1876, when Hayes and Tilden appeared as the contending candidates, the Democrats received 1,396 votes and the Republicans 1,495, the Republicans' lead having been reduced to but 99.

In 1880 the Democratic vote for presidential electors, with W. S. Hancock as candidate, was 1,430, as against 1,549 for James A. Garfield, the Republican nominee.

In 1884 came the change, and for the first time in twenty years the Democrats had a majority in the county, although their lead was only 10 votes. The Democratic vote for Grover Cleveland was 1,576, against 1,566 for James G. Blaine.

In 1888 Benjamin Harrison of Indiana was chosen to head the Republican ticket, but Grover Cleveland increased his lead in Switzerland county over that of 1884, polling 1,637, to 1,560 for Benjamin Harrison. The Democratic lead has never been lost since that year, and in 1892, when Grover Cleveland and Benjamin Harrison were again the candidates, Harrison received 1,497, to 1,589 for Cleveland.

The presidential vote in the years following and to 1912 has been as follows:

- 1896—Bryan (D.), 1,742; McKinley (R.), 1,637.
- 1900—Bryan (D.), 1,713; McKinley, (R.), 1,631.
- 1904—Parker (D.), 1,554; Roosevelt (R.), 1,461.
- 1908—Bryan (D.), 1,537; Taft (R.), 1,444.
- 1912—Wilson and Marshall (D.), 1,342; Taft (R.), 882; Roosevelt (Progressive), 322.

This is one of the counties in which the Progressive party did not make a very large impression.

Switzerland county is in the fourth congressional district. Only occasionally since the county was organized has a Republican ever succeeded in representing the district, and less seldom has a Republican congressional candidate secured a majority of the votes in Switzerland county.

The Democrats who have represented the district of which Switzerland county is a part are as follows: Amos Lane, Thomas Smith, John L. Robinson, James H. Lane, Cyrus L. Dunham, James Hughes, Henry W. Harrington, William S. Holman, Jephtha D. New, Leonidas Sexon, William S. Holman, Francis Marion Griffith and Lincoln Dixon.

Lincoln Dixon was first elected in 1904, and each two years thereafter in his re-election his majority increased as the people recognized his special qualifications. Always during his term Washington recognized him as one of the biggest men in the Congress.

These Democrats have served in public office since the organization of Switzerland county:

Territorial officials named by Governor Thomas Posey in September, 1814.

Associate judges, William Cotton and James McClure.

- Sheriff, John Francis Siebenthal.
- Coroner, Ralph Cotton.
- Clerk, John Francis Dufour.
- Recorder, John Francis Dufour.
- Surveyor, Elisha Golay.

Prior to 1830 more thought was given to men than to politics, there being fewer from whom to choose. The government then was mixed politically. Since that date, so far as can be determined at time of publication, this list is intended to contain the names of none but Democrats who have served in office since the county was formed.

COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

- 1817—James Ross, 1 year; Isaac Stanley, 2 years; Caleb Mount, 3 years.
- 1818—Thomas Gilliland.
- 1818—George Craig (vice Stanley, resigned).
- 1818—Dr. John Mendenhal.

- 1819—William Campbell.
- 1820—William Ross.
- 1821—Henry Banta.
- 1822—Thomas Gilliland.
- 1823—William Gard.

1824—Commissioners were abolished and justices of the peace assumed the duties, organizing as a board with this membership:

1824—William C. Keen, president; John Smith, Samuel Jack, Caleb Mount, Joseph Pugh, Joseph McHenry, Thomas Wiles.

1825—Edward Patton, president; members in addition to those attending 1824 meeting were: Johnson Brown, John Elam, Samuel Beal, Edward Patton, William J. Stewart.

In 1826 the legislature substituted a board of supervisors in place of a board of justices, but nevertheless composed of justices of the peace. This board was composed as follows:

1826—Samuel Beal, Amos A. Brown, Joseph Pugh, John Elam, Johnson Brown.

During the years until 1831, while this law lasted, these citizens served as supervisors: Samuel Jack, John Gibbons, Aribert Gazley, Fruit Harvey, George E. Pleasants, Joseph McHenry.

The legislature of 1831 changed the law, returning to the board of three commissioners, this law remaining in force since. Switzerland county has since been served by these commissioners:

1831-34—Lyman W. Mix, William Scudder. Enos Littlefield.

- 1834-37—Eden Edwards.
- 1835-38—Philip Bettens, Jr.
- 1836-39—Colin McNutt.
- 1837-40—Eden Edwards.
- 1838-41—Philip Bettens, Jr.
- 1839-42—Andrew Stewart.
- 1840-43—David Henry.
- 1841-44—John J. P. Schenck.

1841—David Henry, chosen president of the board, and the duties of clerk placed upon John M. King, the county auditor, as provided under new law.

1842-45—Andrew Stewart.
1842-43—William Flynn, succeeding David Henry, resigned, and John J. P. Schenck was chosen president.

- 1843-46—David Shull.
- 1844-47—Lewis W. Beal.
- 1845-48—Arthur Humphrey.
- 1846-49—Harvey Littlefield.
- 1847-50—Daniel Ramseyer.
- 1848-51—William Howe.
- 1849-52—Jacob Shull.
- 1850-53—John Weaver.
- 1851-54—James S. Ferguson.
- 1852-55—Jacob Shull.
- 1853-56—John Weaver.

- 1854-57—Charles A. Gary.
 1856-71—William Anderson.
 1872-75—William M. Patton.
 1854-75—Philip Bettens, William Stewart.
 1857-75—Benjamin L. Simmons, Harvey Littlefield.
 1876-79—Philander Morrison.
 1878-84—William Stewart.
 1879-82—Dilliard R. Drake.
 1882-84—William Brindley and Luther C. Buck.
 1884—John F. Houze and David Armstrong.

SHERIFFS.

- 1814—John F. Siebenthal, appointed by Territorial Governor Posey.
 1816-20—John F. Siebenthal.
 1820-22—Israel R. Whitehead.
 1822-26—John F. Siebenthal.
 1829-33—Henry Banta.
 1837-41—Henry McMakin.
 1843-45—Henry McMakin.
 1845-47—John R. Morerod.
 1851-53—John W. Gray.
 1853-55—Samuel W. Howard.
 1859-63—William Mead.
 1878-80—John P. White.
 1888-92—Oscar Williamson.
 1892-96—David Dyer.
 1896-1900—Ira N. Banta.
 1900-04—Edward C. Shull.
 1904-08—Thomas Pickett.
 1912-16—John C. Heady.
 1916—Thomas Pickett.

CLERKS.

- 1814—John Francis Dufour, appointed by Territorial Governor Thomas Posey.
 1816-24—John Francis Dufour.
 1824-30—Israel R. Whitehead.
 1830-49—Edward Patton, serving until time of death and succeeded by William Patton, by appointment to fill temporary vacancy.
 1849-52—Charles T. Jones, elected to unexpired term.
 1871-79—Joseph H. Netherland.
 1879-87—Robert T. F. Abbott.
 1891-95—Walter C. Benedict.
 1903-11—Clarence R. Drake.
 1915-19—Jesse P. Curry.

TREASURERS.

From 1817 to 1841, when the office was made elective, the following men served the county as treasurer by appointment from the county commissioners:

- 1817-21—Samuel Fallis.
 1821-25—Joseph Malin.
 1825-30—Ira Mendenhall.
 1830-41—George G. Knox.

1841-43—Frederick L. Grisard, first treasurer elected, resigned; James S. Carter, appointed and declined; William Hall, named and accepted.

- 1843-49—William Hall.
 1849-53—John F. Doan.
 1853-55—George H. Kyle.
 1855-59—John R. Morerod.
 1859-61—Ira N. Malin.
 1871-73—Joshua D. Griffith.
 1875-77—Francis M. Griffith.
 1879-81—Americus Benedict.
 1889-93—William Tait.
 1893-97—Joseph D. Froman.
 1897-1901—James P. Orem.
 1901-05—Albert B. Douglass.
 1905-09—Napoleon Miller.
 1913-17—John L. Cunningham.
 1917-19—Charles Panghorn.

RECORDERS.

- 1814—John Francis Dufour, appointed by Territorial Governor Posey.
 1816-24—Thomas Armstrong.
 1824-31—Abraham B. Dumont.
 1831-45—Ira Mendenhall.
 1845-52—Ira N. Malin.
 1853-55—James H. Titus.
 1855-59—William H. H. Kelso.
 1867-71—John T. Schroder.
 1871-79—John P. White.
 1879-87—James P. Orem.
 1891-95—Daniel V. Seavers.
 1895-1901—John W. Barnes.
 1901-09—James D. Miller.
 1913-17—Oliver P. Courtney.

AUDITORS.

- 1841-45—John M. King.
 1875-83—John Gill.
 1883-87—Philip C. Holland.
 1891-99—Joseph E. Hart.
 1899-1901—John F. Houze.
 1901-09—Levin J. Woollen.
 1913-19—John W. Smith.
 1918—Joseph D. Froman, appointed to fill unexpired term of John W. Smith.

COLLECTORS.

Prior to 1841, collectors of taxes were appointed by the county boards, the collection since 1840 being part of the duties of the treasurers.

These men served as collectors:

- 1814-20—John F. Siebenthal.
 1820-22—Israel R. Whitehead.
 1823—Garrett Perkins.
 1824-27—John F. Siebenthal.
 1828—Henry Banta.
 1829—William McCullough.
 1830—Henry Banta.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF TIPPECANOE COUNTY

THE history of the county of Tippecanoe is so rich in historical association that it becomes almost a matter of impossibility to render any account of its various political phases without touching, though briefly, upon some of the main facts having to do with its existence as a county. That Tippecanoe county is a portion of that great northwestern tract of land opened up by the company of Captain Clark and his pioneers is a matter too generally known to permit the indulgence of repetition in this work. That the Battle of Tippecanoe, occurring on the 7th day of November, 1811, when the American forces, commanded by Gen. William H. Harrison, at a point adjoining the present town of Battle Ground, struck the final blow which forever quelled the power of the Indians in this territory, is also a fact that is, or should be, familiar to every school child as well as to the older people who have pride in the advancement of the State, and particularly that portion thereof which forms the subject of this sketch. On that date the precipitancy of "The Prophet," the brother of the great Indian chief, Tecumseh, permitted the waging of the battle that wrecked the plans of Tecumseh, laid low the hopes of the Indian tribes, and gave into the hands of the whites the undisputed ascendancy and control of the most fertile portion of this fertile State. It marked the last great contest on Indiana soil as between the white man and the red, and settlement and civilization continued their onward progress even to the present day.

The county of Tippecanoe embraces territory on both sides of the Wabash river and in area is composed of 504 square miles. To the north lie the counties of Carroll and White; to the south, Montgomery; on the west, Warren, Fountain and Benton, and to the east, Clinton and Carroll. It is one of the most productive agricultural counties of the ninety-two in the State, and at this writing in population approximates 40,000 souls. Its county seat is Lafayette, now embracing a population of 25,000.

As nearly as can be ascertained by research, the first settler in Tippecanoe county proper bore the name of Peter Weaver, and he at a period variously given as 1822 or 1823 established a home on what is now known as the Wea plains. Around him gathered the intrepid spirits—the real pioneers of the locality—forming the nucleus of the present population. The separation of the territory comprising Tippecanoe county from its early amalgamation with other lands occurred on the 26th of January, 1826, at which time, by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, there was passed "An act for the formation of a new county out of the county of Wabash, and for establishing the county seat thereof." This act also specified that the new county bear the name "Tippecanoe." Since that period there has been no alteration in county boundaries then established, the act going into formal effect in May of 1826, whilst in the following month of July what may be said to have been the first important act relative to county government occurred. William Bash, Levi Thornton, Stephen Kennedy and John Russell, provided with commissions from the Governor of the State, who, at that time, was J. Brown Ray, after subscribing to certain oaths, assumed their titles as members of a board of justices and chose William Bush as their president. Under the supervision of this board returns were received which chose Lafayette as the county seat, and tracts of lands given over by patriotic individuals were platted, and the beginning of a city as well as a county was made. In the year 1829 a court house was built, the two-story structure serving as the county seat of the government until 1845. A more commodious structure then placed upon the same site did duty until in 1881-84 the present pretentious structure took its place—a building which cost almost twice the amount of the original contract before completed.

From the beginning in a political way Tippecanoe seems to have assumed great interest in events. With the organization of the Republican party came the intense feeling that has characterized each separate campaign—in most of which, it may be said, the government of county affairs has remained largely in the hands of the Republicans, though on exceptional occasions the customary majority has been disposed of and given partial Democratic successes. As far back as 1836 the future of the county was indicated, though probably not then realized, by the vote for President, wherein William H. Harrison received 1,244 votes and Martin VanBuren 1,044 votes in Tippecanoe.

The list of Tippecanoe Democrats who have achieved distinction is not so large, perhaps, as those in localities more given to the returning of Democratic majorities, yet in its compilation one finds names that have made their impress upon the history of the land as well as upon local and state affairs. Of the notables in these lines John Pettit may be mentioned, he being chosen to Congress in 1843 from the district to which Tippecanoe then belonged, though it has since been altered as politicians dictated. Mr. Pettit was three times elected in the congressional capacity and later on advanced to the United States Senate, serving with distinction during 1853-55. President James Buchanan in 1859 chose this distinguished citizen to be chief justice for the district then known as the Territory of Kansas, he serving there for two years. The President's choice fell upon him by reason of the signal ability he had shown as district attorney in Indiana from 1839 to 1843. He was likewise a member of the Constitutional Convention in Indiana in 1852. Many local positions were his to command, his years of official life being unusually extended and varied in their nature.

Joseph E. McDonald, one of the most talented men in Indiana history, lived in Lafayette during his youth, mastering his trade as a saddler, and while his political honors came later in life, after he had left Tippecanoe, his legislative honors were ever admired by those who knew him long before he aspired to become a lawmaker, orator and diplomat.

Daniel Mace served in the Lower House of Congress during 1851-57. He also occupied the position of United States District Attorney for Indiana District in the years 1845-47 and occupied local positions, his career finally terminating by death, at his own hand, while postmaster at Lafayette.

Daniel Voorhees, "The Tall Sycamore of the Wabash," for some years a leading light in the Congress and Senate of the United States, was temporarily located in this county, his higher honors coming later in life, during the Civil war period, but he always retained a kindly feeling for Tippecanoe and her people.

Thomas B. Ward, a favorite of the people, who held many local positions, being an attorney of ability, was in Congress during 1882-86, he being the last one to occupy that position until 1911 of Democratic persuasion, when John B. Peterson, of Crown Point, was chosen from the district to which Tippecanoe at present belongs—the Tenth. Mr. Ward was somewhat prominent in Washington and at this writing, though some years deceased, still has numerous admirers.

John S. Williams, mayor of Lafayette at one time, banker and newspaper man, was Third Auditor of the Treasury under President Cleveland.

A unique figure in local politics is Furman E. D. McGinley, on seven different occasions chosen mayor of Lafayette, at times when the city was of Republican cast. Mr. McGinley celebrated his eighty-sixth birthday this year (1915). He never sought higher honors, but was never denied when before the people for their suffrage for the mayoralty.

Francis Johnson, a German-born citizen of more than ordinary ability, served as a Democrat in the State Senate from 1881 to 1885, and was by President Cleveland offered a foreign post in France (now occupied by J. B. Milner, of this county, it is the writer's belief), but refused the same. He held also various minor offices.

John F. McHugh, State Senator and Democratic leader, 1893-95. Conceded to be one of the talented men of the State. Held several local positions.

George R. Durgan, three times mayor of Lafayette, 1904-14. Frequently spoken of for State offices, but never up to this time an aspirant for other positions.

Charles H. Ball, present postmaster, appointed by President Wilson.

John B. Ruger, postmaster during Cleveland's first term.

Michael H. Kennedy, postmaster during Cleveland's second term.

David Turpie, circuit judge in 1855 and common pleas judge in 1854. Afterwards served with distinction in United States Senate. Highly respected and loved.

James Murdock, sheriff, warden prison north, banker, capitalist and member of Democratic National Central Committee. One of the most prominent men in the State during the Hearst-Parker campaign, and his advice sought by Democratic managers all over the country.

Owing to the political strength of Republicanism in Tippecanoe county the government has on all save two occasions rested in Republican hands, but this condition does not at present prevail. In 1912 Peter J. Wall and Thomas J. Gwin, both Democrats, were elected county commissioners. Mr. Wall is serving now the third year of his term and Mr. Gwin has one year to serve after January 1, 1916. In November, 1914, John C. F. Redinbo was elected—a Democrat, who will go into office when Mr. Wall retires, January 1, 1916—leaving the board still Democratic thereafter. The county also has a Democratic sheriff at the present time, Mel. Slayback, re-elected in 1914, and a Democratic surveyor, Henry Kessener, elected in 1914, and succeeding another Democrat, Clyde Richards. The joint representative in the Indiana House, Perry Davis (second election), is also a Democrat, representing this and Montgomery counties. There are also five Democrats in the thirteen trusteeships of the county. The present county road superintendent, D. M. Boyle, and present superintendent of the county farm, Steven Campbell, are Democrats. The rest of the county and township offices (with the exception of several township assessors) are Republicans. The city is normally Democratic, but change in sentiment from local causes led to the defeat of George R. Durgan at the time of his fourth race in 1913, and with his defeat the city for four years passed out of Democratic control. There seems no reason to doubt, however, Democratic city success in 1917, as with one exception every Democrat on the county ticket carried the city in the county election of 1914. An illustration of the vagaries of the Tippecanoe county vote, however, may be given in mentioning that in 1912 John B. Peterson, Democratic candidate for Congress in this district, carried the county by a plurality of 1,073. As a candidate for re-election in 1914 Mr. Peterson lost the county by 60 votes, while one Republican county candidate was elected by 1,510.

In the elections of 1917 the city of Lafayette again became Democratic, George R. Durgan being chosen as the chief executive by a stupendous majority. With the mayoralty Democratic so went every other city elective office—clerk, judge and all of the ten members of the common council. They found a bankrupt city in so far as the general fund was concerned, an inheritance from the previous administration, and are now (1918) striving to place the city of Lafayette once more in the solvent column.

The newspaper history of Tippecanoe county is an interesting one, and might be made the subject of an article of greater extent than permissible here. The oldest paper in Lafayette that survives is the Lafayette Morning Journal, and next is the Evening Courier. The Sunday Leader is next in point of age and is the oldest exclusive Sunday publication in the State. Briefly paraphrased, they may be mentioned thus:

Lafayette Free Press and Commercial Advertiser, established September 29, 1829, by Major John Seamans. The oldest paper in the State except one, The Potawatomie Times, begun in 1828, in Logansport, long since deceased. Major Seamans ran this paper until 1841, when he consolidated his plant with the Tippecanoe Journal, which was started because Seamans was not sufficiently pronounced a Whig. John D. Smith & Co. were publishers. In 1849 the Journal became a daily paper, printed by Bausman & West, and by them sold to James P. Luse & Bro. In 1853 it became the property of W. G. Terrell, and he took in as partners W. S. Lingle and C. M. Terrell, a brother. The Terrells conducted the paper until 1858, when James Luse and Alexander Wilson purchased the plant. Mr. Wilson sold his interest to W. H. Schuyler and J. C. Batchelder, who, with Mr. Luse, ran the paper for years. February 22, 1864, the plant, with all files, was destroyed by fire. Batchelder then sold his part to S. B. Woolworth.

In 1866 John Purdue, founder of Purdue University, bought two-thirds of the plant from Luse, under the impression that it would aid him in a race for Congress. Schuyler and Woolworth had gone out of the firm and C. D. Emmons and D. A. James were given one-third interest. Purdue was beaten, and put Emmons and James in charge of the plant, later on taking in Joseph Odell. Presently all of the others pulled out and left Purdue the white elephant again on hand. He sold to S. Vater and Benjamin Barron (both without money), the latter dying in a short time, leaving Vater in charge. In 1876 Mr. Vater and Albert E. White bought from Purdue's administrators and ran same for years, though Mr. White soon moved to Parkersburg, W. Va. In 1882 Harry L. Wilson, of Crawfordsville, bought the plant. He did not make a success of it, and sold to Florence, Bonnell & Gregory, but later dispossessed them and again took charge. In 1885 he sold to Walter Fraser. In 1887 James W. French and W. Bent Wilson bought the plant at sheriff's sale. It had been Republican until this time and the new firm made it Democratic. French withdrew in three years and was made warden of the prison north. He was killed in Texas in an automobile accident on the 15th of March, 1915. Wilson ran the paper alone until June of 1902, when Thomas Burt and Frank Terry combined their plant with his. Then the paper became Republican again, and is still so. Wilson sold to George P. Haywood. Mr. Terry sold out and Mr. Burt died. Mr. Haywood and his sons bought the plant and sold it eventually to Henry W. Marshall, present proprietor. It is the leading Republican paper in this part of the State.

In 1841 the Lafayette Advertiser was started by Mathias Peterson. In a few months he sold to Ellsworth & Co. and they in turn to James P. Jenks. Mr. Jenks changed the name to the Courier. Upon his death Wm. R. Ellis bought the plant in 1851, running it as a Democratic paper some years. W. S. Lingle bought the plant in 1857 and made the paper Republican with a large "R." On his death in 1884 the widow and M. M. Mayerstein bought in the plant. Mr. M. later on purchased the entire plant and ran it until his death in 1900. A. A. Mayerstein, his brother, conducts the paper at present. From the time of the Lingle ownership until the 1912 presidential fight the paper had been strongly Republican. In that campaign it joined the Progressive party. It is a very prosperous plant.

The Sunday Leader was begun March 1, 1872, John A. Carr being its progenitor. It was purchased in November of the same year by F. E. D. McGinley, and in 1883 was purchased by Charles F. Williams and Ross Gordon. Mr. Gordon bought his partner's interest and took in his son. Mr. Williams remained as editor of the paper and on the death of both the Gordons purchased the plant from the estate, and still conducts the same. Recently the paper removed to its own building on Ferry street. It is independent politically and prosperous. Of almost equal age is the Lafayette Leader, produced at the same plant and conducted as a Democratic paper, issued each Thursday by Charles F. Williams, Jr.

The Sunday Times was started by Fred S. Williams in April, 1879. Colonel John S. Williams, his father, once third auditor of the Treasury under Cleveland (first term), was associated with the plant. Mr. J. S. Williams died in 1900, his son preceding him to the grave. The widow continued the publication until March, 1914, her brother, Charles H. Ball, being in charge. When Mr. Ball was appointed postmaster by President Wilson, he conducted a sale of the Times to Henry Marshall. The latter shortly after became owner of the Daily Journal and began the issuing of a seven days a week paper. The result was not satisfactory, and with the last Sunday in January, 1915, the Sunday paper passed out of existence.

The Daily Dispatch was started in April, 1869, by John C. Dobelbower, who came here with ample means from Illinois, at the urgent request of local Democrats to produce a daily Democratic paper of force. He was an experienced newspaper man, but the business for a Democratic paper was not what it should have been, and when Cleveland was elected he was at about the end of his resources. It was conceded that the post office should go to Mr. Dobelbower, but through the non-understandable meanderings of politics he was deceived, the place upon which he was building to recuperate went to another, and Mr. D. died of grief. The paper stopped at this time, the subscription list being turned over to the Bulletin, which was short-lived, published by Parsons and Meek.

The Call, established in 1883 by Joseph L. Cox, was a morning paper. It was sold in 1885 to S. Vater, who made it an evening paper and was quite successful; sold to John George, Jr., in 1896; sold to James Walker and George Snyder and George Gray in 1899; sold in March, 1902, to Messrs. Letcher; sold in 1904 to A. E. Blunck; sold in 1905 to the Evening Courier to get it out of the way, and was discontinued.

The Tippicanoe County Democrat was established in April, 1908, by John F. Metzger; in a few months it fell into the hands of R. M. Isherwood, the present possessor and publisher.

Other papers that have joined the great majority are: Home Journal, 1874-1902; Morning News, 1887 (lasted five months); Deutsch-Amerikaner, 1874 to 1903; Daily Democrat, started in March, 1903, by Leroy Armstrong and James K. Risk, perished November, 1904; Daily Republican, 1875 (ran six months); Our Herald, 1881-1884, sold and moved to Chicago; Quohosh, later Herald, run by W. S. Haggard, later Lieutenant-Governor, 1890-1899; Spencer's Paper, 1874, seven months; The Comet, 1885, Orth Stein, editor, lasted twenty-six issues; Labor World, 1886-1888, discontinued.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF TIPTON COUNTY

By Wm. R. Dunham

TIPTON COUNTY lies in the north central portion of the State. By an act of the Legislature of 1843 and 1844 it was organized as a distinct county of its own. It is bounded on the north by Howard county, on the east by Grant and Madison counties, on the south by Hamilton and on the west by Clinton county. It is twenty miles long from east to west and thirteen miles from north to south and contains two hundred and sixty square miles. When organized it was considered a howling wilderness, infested with bear, wolves, panthers, wildcats, deer and many fur-bearing animals. Today it is considered the garden spot of Indiana and is first in the State and third in the United States in agriculture.

On March 27, 1844, William Harrington was commissioned sheriff by Governor Whitcomb and empowered to order an election of the necessary officers to organize the new county of Tipton. The 27th day of May, 1844, was selected as the day upon which the first election in the county should be held. Elections were advertised for three Commissioners, two Associate Judges, one Clerk of the Circuit Court and one Recorder for the county. The result was as follows: Clerk, N. J. Jackson, Democrat; Recorder, Sylvester Turpen, Democrat; Associate Judges, Silas Blound, Democrat, and Joseph Goar, Republican; County Commissioners, Thomas Jackson, Democrat, John D. Smith, Republican, and Robert E. Davidson, Democrat. On Monday, June 3, 1844, the three County Commissioners who had been elected met at the house of Jesse Brown to set the official machinery of the county in motion. N. J. Jackson was appointed temporary County Auditor and Jesse Brown, County Assessor. William H. Nelson was appointed County Agent and directed to lay out the new county seat after the design of a plat furnished by the Locating Commissioners. In December, 1844, Charles Thurman was appointed County Surveyor. He and his associates laid out the town of Canton (now Tipton) early in 1845. Jesse Brown was ordered to advertise for sealed bids for a court house 20 by 24 feet, two stories high, and to be completed by June 1, 1845. In February of that year the contract was awarded to George Tucker, who completed the building late in the fall of 1845 for the sum of $235.50. It had a hall running through from east to west and on each side of the lower story were two rooms for the accommodation of the county officials. The upper story was occu-piated by the court room. In September, 1846, James Cassler contracted to clear the court house square for $13.12. At the same time George Tucker under orders secured twelve chairs for the court house. In the autumn quite an extensive addition was built to the court house at a cost of several hundred dollars. This was rendered necessary owing to the crowded condition of the offices. In December, 1855, Samuel Deal and Harvey Goodykoontz were appointed to see after the construction of additional county offices on the public square, the building to be of frame, 14 by 28 feet, 9 feet high, with a partition in the center, the rooms to be ceiled and plastered. The building was completed in June, 1857, at a cost of $329.09. Soon after this the court house was unfortunately, or fortunately, destroyed by fire and the county courts were forced to meet in the Methodist church, which had been erected about three years previously.

In June, 1858, Nelson Daubenspeck of Noblesville, Ind., contracted to build a new court house for Tipton county within two years for $10,000. The first story was ten feet high and the second story seven feet high. A hall extended north and south through the first story, on the sides of which were the county offices. The upper story contained the court room. This structure served the public for many years, but as the county grew the demand was greater for better quarters for our county officers, so in February, 1888, the citizens of Tipton county prepared and presented a petition asking the County Commissioners to proceed toward the erection of a new court house and jail. The petition was signed by over one thousand taxpayers. The board considered the petition and immediately granted permission for the work, the plans to be made and other preparations to be executed at once. The contract for the erection of the building was entered into by the board with Messrs. Pearce and Morgan on the 5th day of November, 1892, at the contract price of $143,760 and for all other contracts, including furniture, heating, grading and numerous other small contracts, the sum of $39,651.30, making a grand total of $183,411.30. Work was begun on the 6th day of April, 1893, and completed on the 15th day of October, 1894, and the building was occupied by the officers on that date. The building is sixty-six feet to top of cornice and the tower is 206 feet to top of flagstaff. The building is of the best quality Berler stone, the foundation being of St. Paul, Ind., limestone. There are forty-five rooms in the building, all of which are heated by steam and the entire building is supplied with water by the county's own water works, located in the basement with the heating machinery. The first floor above the basement is occupied by the various county officers. The second floor is occupied by the judiciary; the two court rooms, the judge's private room, the library room, the grand jury rooms, the witness rooms, the consultation rooms, which are all elegantly furnished and supplied with modern conveniences. The third floor is occupied by large and commodious rooms and halls. The wainscoting from the entrance to the attic is of the finest Tennessee marble. Taken all in all, Tipton county has one of the most elaborate, commodious and best arranged court houses in central Indiana.

In 1855 Drs. A. M. Vickrey and Rooker of Tipton bought an old-fashioned Franklin press and a small quantity of type and began issuing a small six-column folio newspaper, called the Tipton County Democrat. The first printer was James Mahaffie, who was succeeded by Archibald Ramsey, who was one of the most valuable journalists in the history of the county. He was a man of incredible energy and his devoted labors to the county press were in a large measure responsible for its success. In 1857 the name of the paper was changed to the Western Dominion, with O. P. Baird as editor. Again, in 1858, the paper was sold to G. W. Fisher, who changed the name again to that of the Tipton County Times, and began issuing the sheet with John Chambers as principal editor and A. Clark as local editor. Ten of the foremost Democrats now owned the paper, among whom were John Chambers, William Stivers, A. J. Redmon, Hugh Dickey, James V. Cox, A. Clark, Barnabas Geltner and A. M. Vickrey. In 1860 interest in the enterprise became lax and the publication was suspended for six months. Early in 1861 the paper was again issued with James V. Cox in the role of editor-in-chief. Cox wrote the headlines, while the remainder of the composition, typesetting, printing, etc., was done by the faithful Archibald Ramsey, the printer.

Late in the year 1861 Judge Nathan R. Overman secured an interest in the paper and contributed a few short paragraphs. In 1862, for partisan reasons, the name of the paper was changed to the Democratic Union, the paper still being Democratic in "color." Early in 1864 the office was sold to William J. Turpin, who was at the time in the army and who contributed very interesting letters from the firing line. He was mustered out before the close of the war and returned to take personal charge and control of the paper. One of his first moves was the changing of the name to the Tipton County Times. He conducted the paper very successfully until 1869, when he sold out to J. C. Brady and removed to Nashville, Tenn. Brady was fairly successful with his new possession and he installed the first job press ever in the county. In 1874 he sold out to Judge N. R. Overman, who employed J. T. Cox to edit the paper. In the spring of 1875 Ensley A. Overman bought a half interest in the paper. At this time the first cylinder power press ever in the county was bought for $400 and placed in the office. E. A. Overman became editor and financial manager. In January, 1876, William Haw bought the office and issued the paper until January, 1877, when, being unable to pay for it, he relinquished it and the office went back to the Overmans. E. A. Overman conducted it until September, 1878, when he purchased the interest of Judge N. R. Overman and then became sole owner and proprietor. Early in 1880 the office was sold to Perry and John O. Behymer, but a year later reverted to E. A. Overman, who continued it until November, 1881, when it passed to A. Ray Williams, who, in January, 1882, took as a partner David A. Alexander. In September, 1882, Williams retired, leaving Alexander the sole owner, but on April 1, 1883, the latter was joined by Jeremiah Fish, who continued with the paper until May, 1883, when he retired. Shortly afterward the paper became the property of John O. Behymer, who for over a third of a century has conducted it in a business way so as to gain many friends from all parties. The circulation became so large that Mr. Behymer changed from a weekly to that of a daily. This change was consummated early in 1910. An evening paper is issued for the city and a morning edition is sent to the country. A large amount of job printing is done at present at the Times office.

The early newspaper was often a "one-man" affair; with a hatful of type, a hand press and radical ideas, the first journalist worked. The individuality of the editor of the early newspaper was more pronounced than it is today. The editor was known and his opinions were quoted as authority on questions of public importance. The editor was a mold of public sentiment, but since rapid transit, free city and rural mail delivery, the farm and the city are brought closer together, and the personality of the editor has not the commanding influence that it once had. The newspaper of today is almost exclusively given over to publicity of current events, rather than creating public sentiment. Efficiency is the keynote of modern journalism; no sooner does an event occur than it is the knowledge of the world.

The first educational work done in Tipton county was shortly after the completion of the old log court house. This occurred in the winter of 1846-47 and the first teacher was William F. Brady. The next was Joseph M. Askren. School was next held in the cabin of Jackson Reed. Until 1852 the school term covered a period of two or three months out of the year. Teachers were paid by subscription, and were very poorly paid, too, some of them "boarding around" at the homes of different pupils in an endeavor to make both ends meet. Among the men who took most prominent parts in education in these early days were George Kane, A. B. Goodrich, N. J. Jackson, Dr. Isaac Parker, Rev. John Dale, John E. Rumsey, M. P. Evans and Joseph Wilson.

In 1852 a new frame school house was built in Tipton, but was very poor in convenience and capacity. Joseph M. Askren was the first teacher to occupy the new school house, which was occasionally used for religious purposes. Then followed John E. Rumsey, who was there the greater part of the time from 1853 to 1869. The terms not taught by Mr. Rumsey were under the charge of Albert Barnett, M. V. B. Newcomer and a Mr. Lockwood. Rumsey was a teacher who did not favor the application of the "hickory" to induce study. Other teachers of the period would lambast a pupil with a floor puncheon and if this did not have the required effect, would follow it with a sound flogging. These teachers were missionaries, in a sense, working for the progress and uplift of humanity, and they did this on a salary of eight and ten dollars a month with a free will and whole-souled motives. Barnett was an eccentric teacher, little caring which way the wind blew. His English was not very choice, nor did he refrain from using any word that came to his mind. He cared less whether the pupils wore their hats in school or not. He was, nevertheless, a very successful teacher and was accounted one of the best mathematicians of the day.

As Tipton increased in population the need of larger school quarters became imperative. Accordingly, in 1867, the erection of a high school building was begun and finished in 1869. In 1890 another eight-room school building was erected on North Main street that is a model of completeness; the vocational department is fully equipped.

While Tipton has been alive to educational interests the county at large has caught up the spirit and we find high schools at Windfall, Sharpsville, Goldsmith, Hobbs and Curtisville. So, after a long and steady pull, Tipton county takes front rank in the educational interests with her sister counties in the State. Much credit is due our County Superintendents, i. e., B. M. Blount, J. M. Clark, Frank B. Crockett, A. H. Pence, George C. Wood, Jerry Fish and L. D. Summers for the able manner in which they have handled the educational affairs in Tipton county up to the present time.

The year 1844 was the first presidential year in the history of Tipton county. The Democrats cast 111 votes for Polk and Dallas, while the Whigs cast 100 votes for Clay and Frelinghuysen. The Democrats carried the county over the Whigs, and with one exception the Democrats of Tipton county have carried the county over the Republicans for President and Vice-President from its organization to January 1, 1917, covering a period of seventy-two years. It is very doubtful if there is another county in the State that can show such a record. While the Democrats have been true to their faith in national politics, they have not been unmindful of State, county and township affairs. Until recent years we have always been joined with Howard county for Circuit Court judges, but be that as it may, we have been able to elect James O'Brien, C. N. Pollard, N. R. Overman, Lex J. Kirkpatrick and James M. Purvis. While the county has not been able to have a Senator of her own, we have been able with our majorities to elect the Hon. George H. Gifford and the Hon. George C. Wood as Democratic Joint Senator, while in the lower branch of the Legislature the Democrats have been more successful, electing the following State Representatives: Carter T. Jackson, James O'Brien, William Stivers, George Ham, A. M. Vickrey, James I. Parker, Benjamin F. Legg, James M. Fippen, James A. Purvis, James A. Hedgcock and William R. Dunham.

Since the organization of the county in 1844 the Republicans have only been able to elect two auditors, two recorders, three clerks, six treasurers, five sheriffs and one surveyor. The present Democratic officials in the county are Hon. James M. Purvis, Judge; Clyde Porter, Clerk; Oscar Vanesse, Auditor; Christy Haskett, Treasurer; Solomon D. Adams, Recorder; Fred Recobs, Sheriff; Jesse Bowlin, Surveyor; L. D. Summers, County Superintendent, and Richard Rayles, Harvey Bess and John Lininger, County Commissioners.

There is a reason for the county being Democratic from its organization to the present time. Each township is well organized. Out of six trustees the Democrats have five, i. e., Madison township, Mr. Julius; Cicero township, Fletcher Orr; Jefferson township, Oliver D. Weed; Prairie township, Beecher Rayles, and Liberty township, James L. Romack.

We might mention some of our old reliable Democratic workers in the county, i. e., Hon. George C. Wood, John and Aaron Zehner, John Baker, Benjamin Legg, John McCreary, Dr. Long-

not mentioned here have done much to keep old Tipton county in the Democratic column.

In concluding the chapter of the history of the Democratic party in Tipton county, we wish to state that from the beginning of its organization to the present time the Democratic party has always taken the public into its confidence and no court houses, jails, public school buildings, gravel roads, ditches or any public improvements have ever been built but what all parties were considered before any improvements were consummated. With this kind of a spirit the party deserves to be continued in power, and the people see to it that they are kept in power.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF UNION COUNTY

By G. W. Robertson

UNION COUNTY, located in the southeastern part of Indiana, was first settled in 1804; organized as a county in 1821; county seat was at Brownsville until 1824, since then Liberty. Size, 12 by 14 miles; area, 168 square miles; population (1910), 6,260; number of votes cast for President in 1912, 1,789; number of registered voters October, 1914, 1,877.

The county was first settled by colonists from South Carolina under the leadership of Robert Hanna and Robert Templeton. The members of this Carolina colony must have been Democrats, as nearly all of their descendants have uniformly voted the Democratic ticket.

John Templeton, who married a daughter of Robert Hanna, was a member of the territorial legislature at the time of the formation of Wayne and Franklin counties and is said to have bestowed the name of Franklin upon the latter. Union county was said to have been formed from territory taken from Wayne, Franklin and Fayette counties. He was one of the first Justices of the Peace of Union county and served as president of the Board of Justices when the government of Union county was trusted to them. He was a staunch Jeffersonian Democrat and grandfather of Thomas Jefferson Templeton, the efficient clerk of the Circuit Court of Union county.

John Hanna, "Big John" as he was called, son of Robert Hanna, entered land and settled just east of Dunlapville, in Union county, in 1804. He was a prominent Democrat and took a leading part in the conventions of his party. That he was a prominent member of his party and an esteemed and worthy citizen is shown by the fact that he was elected as the first Treasurer of Union county and served in that capacity in 1823 and 1824.

James Livingston was a native of Charleston, S. C., where he was born on the 17th day of March, 1791. He was twice married. His last wife was Nancy Templeton, daughter of Hon. John Templeton. Although he possessed only a common school education, he was an excellent mathematician and by much reading he became a well-informed man. Mr. Livingston, upon the organization of Union county, was chosen its first Clerk in 1821 and served until 1828, and was succeeded by Edgehill Burnside, a Whig. In 1828 and 1829 he represented Union county in the State Legislature. He served as State Senator in the decade between 1850 and 1860. He surveyed and laid out the town of Brownsville in 1815. He was a modest and unassuming man and made no pretensions to public speaking. He was a forcible writer—his power was with his pen, which he wielded when occasion demanded in defense of the principles of the Democratic party, of which he was an honored and useful member.

WILLIAM WATT.

Mr. Watt came to Brownsville from Greensburg, Pa., in 1822. He was a strong and influential Jackson Democrat and took a very prominent part in public affairs, serving as County Commissioner of Union county three terms, a member of the lower house of the State Legislature from 1831 to 1844, and a member of the State Senate for two terms. He was also a delegate to the State constitutional convention held in Indianapolis in 1850 when the State constitution was revised. He served with the rank of major in the State militia. His public and private life alike were above reproach. Major Watt was the maternal grandfather of Lee J. Cully, the well known Brownsville politician and merchant who was State Representative from 1904 to 1908.

WELLINGTON W. DAWSON.

Mr. Dawson was born in Lynchburg, Va., February 19, 1820, and came with his parents to Union county in 1831. He taught school for many years before and after his marriage to Mary Crist in 1855. He was elected County Auditor in 1851 and re-elected in 1855, serving as Auditor for eight years and seven months. Some years later he was a merchant at Clifton and was elected Township Trustee of Brownsville township. In 1876 he moved back to Liberty, where he died very suddenly April 19, 1892. He was a Master Mason and a member of the Presbyterian church and a strong and influential Democrat, who wielded great influence for the best interests of the Democratic party of his county and State.

ADAM PIGMAN.

Adam Pigman, the founder of one of the oldest and most influential families in Union county, was born in Green county, Pennsylvania, in the year 1789. He helped to build Fort Meigs, in western Ohio. In 1814 he erected the first frame house ever put up in Union county, which dwelling is now owned and occupied by Edward Taylor. In 1817 Mr. Pigman married Mary Eli, a daughter of Adam Eli. He became a prosperous farmer, taking an interesting part in the development of the county and loyally aiding in the structure of the commonwealth of Indiana. He was a Jackson Democrat and served his party as delegate in many local and State conventions, aiding by his counsel and influence the Democrats to win many times by putting good, strong, clean candidates on the ticket. Eli Pigman, his son, was born, lived and died in Harmony township. He was a man of intense patriotism and public spirit, active in the councils and conventions of the Democratic party. It is difficult to estimate the influence for success that he, his father and their descendants have wielded for the Democratic party of the county and State.

Eli Pigman married Rebecca Wilson, a daughter of Garrett Wilson, who was a successful farmer and owned a farm about two miles west of Liberty. He was a popular and influential Democrat and served as County Commissioner of Union county from 1851 to 1861. His son, John T. Wilson, a prominent and useful member of the Democratic party, served fourteen years as Trustee of Liberty township, and Eli Pigman Wilson, his son, was the first Democrat ever elected County Superintendent of Union county, filling that office from June, 1907, until June, 1911.

Eli Pigman was the father of George W. Pigman, the eminent lawyer and Democratic politician of Liberty, who was Prosecuting Attorney of the Thirty-seventh Judicial Circuit from 1888 to 1892. Dr. Garrett Pigman, a prominent and successful physician of Liberty, who is named for Garrett Wilson, his maternal uncle, is also a son of Eli Pigman. The influence of Adam and Eli Pigman during their lives and through their descendants has been and shall ever be a great factor for the success of the Democratic party of Union county.

THE SNYDER FAMILY.

One of the prominent old pioneer Democratic families of Union county is that of the Snyders, well represented in Brownsville township since the year 1807, when Michael Snyder, the founder of this family, entered land and settled near Clifton.

They have ever borne their part in the upbuilding and development of this part of the State and have invariably been exponents of progress, believing that the best interests of county, State and nation depended upon the success of the Democratic party. They have used their influence for and uniformly voted the Democratic ticket. Isaac Snyder, a son of Michael Snyder, was one of the County Commissioners of Union county from 1848 to 1858. The voters of the Snyder family have served their party in many county, district and State conventions.

THE STEVENS FAMILY.

The Stevens family is one of the oldest and most worthy Democratic families of eastern Indiana. Spencer Stevens, the first pioneer of the family, settled in Abington township, Wayne county, Indiana, emigrating from North Carolina in 1814. His son, William Stevens, after his marriage to Mary Fouts, located in Brownsville township about one mile northeast of Brownsville. Of his nine sons and one daughter all but one reached mature years, married and raised families. William Stevens was an honorable and just man and an earnest believer in the superiority of the Democratic party and in 1833 served in the office of County Commissioner, acquitting himself with credit. His sons and grandsons have uniformly voted with and served their party as delegates to political conventions and as committeemen through victory and defeat. A great grandson, Jesse E. Stevens, is now chairman of the Democratic Central Committee of Union county, which shows that a man's influence lives long after his death.

THE RUDE FAMILY.

It is but putting truth on the pages of history when we record that among the families whose lives, business activities and sterling qualities have placed Union county in its present high position among the counties of the State, none occupies a more conspicuous place than the Rude family and their lives have been so intermingled and intertwined that the sketch of either is to a degree the sketch of the others.

The Rude brothers were descendants of David J. and Maria Rude, who came from Hamilton county, Ohio, and located on a farm near Liberty in 1842. Of the six brothers all are dead except Lafayette M. Rude, who lives on a farm near Clifton. They were all natural mechanics and established the Rude Manufacturing Company, which has been a most potent factor in the industrial development of Liberty and Union county. The Rude corn and wheat drills are known and used by farmers in all parts of the United States.

The father and each of his six sons were sterling Democrats and voted the Democratic ticket during the Civil War period when it was almost dangerous to vote that ticket, as party feeling ran so high in Union county.

One of the Rude brothers, Squire B. Rude, on account of his ability as a man of affairs, was solicited repeatedly to accept public office. He was elected and served two terms as Joint Representative to the State Legislature for Union and Franklin counties and was a member of the Indiana assembly of 1891, when Dan W. Voorhees was elected to the United States Senate. Squire B. Rude married Anna C. Perkins November 25, 1875, and died April 11, 1914. J. Frank Rude, his only son, is president and general manager of the Rude Manufacturing Company of Liberty, Ind.

THE MAZE FAMILY.

One of the most influential and esteemed Democratic families of Union county is the Maze family, who are descendants of David Maze, whose ancestor came from Pennsylvania and founded the city of Maysville, Ky. In 1811 David Maze emigrated to Union county, Indiana. He married Sarah Pigman and entered land in Section 8, Harmony township, living in the first frame house erected in the county, built by Adam Pigman, brother of Mrs. Maze, in 1814.

A son of David Maze, John W. Maze, after an active life of toil on the farm, now lives in Brownsville, Ind. He is a staunch Democrat, a good and useful citizen, and first of all an honest man. Although an octogenarian, he is still hale and strong. He is the father of eight stalwart sons, all of whom are Democrats, and have served their party faithfully as voters, delegates to local and State conventions, and in official capacities. His son George is now the efficient Township Trustee of Brownsville township, while another son, William, is Trustee-elect for his second term as Trustee of Waterloo township, in Fayette county, Indiana.

JOHN M. BELL.

John M. Bell was a son of William and Mary (Berry) Bell and was born in Juniata county, Pennsylvania, February 21, 1823. Both his maternal and paternal grandfathers served in the colonial army in the revolution. He was reared on a farm and received only such an education as the common schools of the day afforded. By the death of his father he came into possession of 160 acres of fertile land in Union township, Union county, Indiana, on which he and his wife, who was Mrs. Mary Luse of Milton, Ind., settled in 1848. To them were born six children, five sons and one daughter. James A. Bell resides at College Corner, Ohio; Albert F. on the home farm, and Joseph E. Bell was Mayor of Indianapolis. Mr. Bell was a staunch Democrat, as are his sons, who have served their party faithfully as committeemen and delegates to conventions, Mr. Bell serving as Joint Representative in our State Legislature for Union and Franklin counties.

Judging from the politics of the men who served as public officials, we conclude that the voters of Union county were almost equally divided into Whigs and Democrats from the first settlement of the county until the Civil War and that a big majority of the Whigs lived in the eastern part of the county, while the greater number of Democrats resided in the western part. Since the beginning of the Civil War the Democratic and Republican parties have been the leading parties.

In 1860 the Democratic party was split in Union county as elsewhere in the United States and slavery was the wedge that split it asunder. The Whigs changed to Republicans and many Democrats became Republicans, some from principle and some from lack of moral courage, some because others did and some from fear because partisan feeling was so fierce that a man's life was in danger if he openly advocated the principles of Democracy. The result was that the Republican party gained control and elected Republicans to office with few exceptions until 1910, when the Democrats elected the Sheriff, the Clerk, the Auditor and the Recorder.

A FEW EXCEPTIONS.

William M. Clark, a Democrat, was elected County Treasurer and filled that office from 1865 to 1867, which showed his popularity, for Union county then was Republican by several hundred majority. He served as a member of the school board, of which he was treasurer for several years, being elected by a Republican town council. He was a generous, honest, Christian gentleman and an ideal citizen, and while not offensive in politics he was a firm, consistent Democrat, who was very useful to his party during and just after the Civil War.

THE DRULEY FAMILY.

The Druley and Stanley families are so related that the history of one cannot be well related without that of the other. They are both descendants from parents who emigrated from North Carolina and settled in Harrison township, Union county, in 1811.

Few of the family have aspired to political office, being content to serve the Democratic party as voters and workers in the ranks. Zack Stanley, Jr., however, was nominated by his party for County Auditor in 1898 and was so popular with the voters that he was defeated by only eleven votes by an able and worthy Republican when the normal Republican majority was not less than 300 in the county.

Nicholas Druley, Jr., a descendant of Nicholas Druley and Sarah Stanley Druley, was a popular and influential Democrat, who was elected as State Representative to the Legislature in 1852, having defeated Hon. John Yaryan by twenty-eight votes. Mr. Druley served his party as a candidate several times, but was defeated many times owing to the large majority of the opposite party.

A DEMOCRATIC LANDSLIDE.

In 1889 the Republican County Commissioners undertook the building of a new court house in Liberty and when the structure was nearly ready for the roof the wall all tumbled down about 10 o'clock one night, owing to too much weight being placed over the window and door spaces, which was a defect in the plans and specifications of the architect and not of the contractor, who refused to be responsible for what might happen if the plans of the architect were carried out in building the court house. The commissioners insisted that the contractor build it accordingly and the consequence was that it fell down and it cost the taxpayers $19,000 to rebuild it, which, of course, raised the tax levy of the county. This touched the voters in the tender spot called the pocket-book and they voted for a change at the election of 1890.

With the help of the Republicans the Democrats elected Isaac E. Druley County Commissioner, Ase Braderick County Clerk and Joseph LaFuse County Treasurer, each of whom filled the office to which he was elected with credit to himself and to his party.

THE PRESS OF UNION COUNTY.

The press is a powerful factor in any county, as it is an exponent of the social, industrial, educational, religious and political conditions of its people and is an uplifting force to a higher state of enlightenment and civilization.

The first newspaper printed in the county was the Flying Roll and Union Advertiser, the first number of which was issued from the press in Brownsville in May, 1825. It was a four-column folio edited by Carson Buckhalter for John Swayze. It flew the motto, "The Unity of Government, which constitutes you one people, is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence." Like all pioneer papers, it devoted much space to foreign news and little space to local affairs.

The Sentinel and Star in the West was published at Philomath for several years—the first issue in 1832—each number containing eight quarto pages, published in the interest of the Universalist church, and had a circulation in ten States. It was edited and published by Samuel Fizzard and J. Kidwell. The Star and Covenant, published now in Cincinnati and Chicago, is a lineal descendant of the Sentinel and Star in the West.

For a time during the Civil War a Democratic paper, the Shield, was published at Liberty.

Jeff Higgs, brother of John Higgs, who owned and published the Connersville Examiner for many years, established the Union County Times, a paper which advocated the principles of the Democratic party in 1876. This paper was published but a short time until the office and equipment were destroyed by fire.

THE UNION COUNTY DEMOCRAT.

On Saturday, January 7, 1882, the first copy of the Union County Democrat was issued to the citizens of Union county from their office in Liberty by the Hill brothers, Charles B. and Hewitt A. Hill of Oxford, Ohio. The Democrat at first had but a limited circulation, but by prudent editing and careful management its circulation gradually increased to 1,000 copies. It was an eight-column folio, which strenuously advocated the principles of the Democratic party.

The Union County Democrat was succeeded by the Liberty Review, a Democratic paper owned by a joint stock company in which Squire B. Rude, Spencer L. Stevens, Wall Snyder, Lafe Rude and Denis Egan were the stockholders, with Squire B. Rude president and Denis Egan editor. Denis Egan was a staunch Democrat of Irish descent, who put pepper as well as great ability into his editorials, which were so much appreciated by his party that he was chosen postmaster of Liberty during the first administration of Grover Cleveland.

In 1888 Charles Drapier, who married a daughter of William Clark, bought the interest of each of the stockholders in the Review and became editor and proprietor, continuing to advocate the principles of the Democratic party, but not so fiercely as his predecessor.

In 1903 Mr. Drapier suspended the publication of the Liberty Review and P. L. Behymer and son started publication of the Liberty Express. In 1906 P. L. Behymer severed his connection with the paper and his son, F. L. Behymer, and C. C. Goodrich, both hustling young men of great ability, became editors and proprietors of the Liberty Express. They organized and put into operation the Express Printing Company, which publishes the Express and does a large amount of job work, printing many pamphlets, books, magazines, catalogues and much commercial printing. In 1908 C. C. Goodrich severed his connection with the Express Printing Company. In 1909 the firm put in additional equipment, including a linotype machine, and Herbert Hughes, a native of Liberty and a graduate of Miami University, was chosen business manager. He is honest, reliable and competent to fill his responsible position. The Express Printing Company now owns a printing establishment valued at $25,000, with a gross annual income of $50,000. They employ fifteen people and do by far the largest and most successful publishing business ever done in Union county and publishes one of the best Democratic weekly newspapers in the State. F. L. Behymer, the hustling editor, recently acquired a half interest in the Rushville Jacksonian on condition that he accept the position of business manager of that paper, but still continues his connection with the Express Printing Company of Liberty. In 1917 he sold the Liberty Express to A. Somers and moved to Connersville, and is now editor and chief owner of the Connersville Examiner, which he edits in connection with his printing establishment, the Express Publishing Company.

LONGEST LANES MUST HAVE A TURNING

With the few exceptions we have mentioned the county officials have been Republicans and many of them ex-union soldiers since the Civil War, but in the election of 1910 the Democrats elected the Clerk, the Auditor, the Sheriff and the Recorder, and re-elected the Sheriff, William O. Line, in 1912. In 1914 they also re-elected the recorder, the clerk, the auditor, and elected E. E. Post, a hustling Democrat, sheriff.

On May 25, 1914, the Democratic voters met in the coliseum in Liberty for the purpose of nominating candidates for the various county offices. Joseph Leach was chosen chairman. G. W. Robertson read and moved the adoption of rules governing the convention in nominating candidates. These rules were adopted and in accordance with these rules the chairman appointed L. J. Cully inspector and Glen Heard and Jesse E. Stevens tellers to receive and count the votes. The chief contest was in nominating a candidate for Sheriff, as there were three candidates for the nomination. On the second ballot Elmer E. Post having received a majority of the votes cast, was declared the nominee; Robert Quick was nominated by ballot for County Assessor. Each of the other candidates was nominated by acclamation. It is the consensus of opinion that this convention was the largest, most enthusiastic and the best managed political convention ever yet held in Union county.

At the election held November 3, 1914, Thomas J. Templeton was re-elected Clerk, George Wray was re-elected Auditor and Edmund Fogerty was re-elected Recorder. Elmer E. Post was elected to the office of Sheriff and Dr. Garrett Pigman Coroner, all of whom are Democrats. The above victory was won largely by the men in the trenches whose names and organization is as follows:

UNION COUNTY DEMOCRATIC CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

Chairman—Jesse E. Stevens, Liberty.
Secretary—G. W. Robertson, Liberty.
Treasurer—Jas. P. O'Toole, Liberty.

Precinct Committeemen—Center township, Precinct No. 1, James P. O'Toole, Liberty; Center township, Precinct No. 2, George Stevens, Liberty; Center township, Precinct No. 3, Ed. Shendler, Liberty, R. R. 7; Center township, Precinct No. 4, Albert John, Liberty, R. R. 2; Liberty township, Thomas Moore, Liberty, R. R. 5; Harmony township, Samuel Henry, Liberty, R. R. 4; Brownsville township, North precinct, Charles Stevens, Brownsville; Brownsville township, South precinct, John Maher, Brownsville; Union township, West precinct, Bert Bell, College Corner, Ohio; Union township, East precinct, J. C. Barkley, College Corner, Ohio; Harrison township, George Crosby, Kitchel, R. R. 9.

A. T. Sering, ex-county chairman, an earnest and efficient worker for the Democratic party, is now serving as postmaster, having been recommended for that position by Hon. Finley Gray, Congressman from the Sixth district.

THERE ARE OTHERS.

We are the heirs of all that has gone before and the condition of the Democratic party in nation, State and county is very largely the result of the efforts put forth by the voters, leaders and editors who have lived and worked for the party in the past. Besides the several individuals and families whose labors and lives we have briefly sketched there are many others who are worthy of mention had we the time and space.

CONCLUSION.

The word Democracy is from two Greek words, demos, people kratos, rule; therefore, the word Democracy means, literally, the power or rule of the people. If a man believes that the supreme power of government should be vested in the citizens, or that the people should rule by means of a free, fair expression of their wishes by means of the ballot, he is a Democrat, regardless of the party to which he may claim to belong. The mightiest force at work in the world in the minds of the people today is the principle of Democracy, or rule of the people. This force wrested the rule of the American colonies from England and placed the power in the hands of the people; it freed Mexico from the rule of Spain and Portugal; it freed Switzerland and the South American colonies, and made France a republic. As a result of the terrible war now raging in Europe doubtless more republics will be added to the list.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF VANDERBURG COUNTY

By Hon. John J. Nolan

THE Democracy of Vanderburg county presents a fine example of steadfast but rarely requited devotion to principle. The influx of negroes following the war and the war's prejudices on the border made Vanderburg a reliably Republican county. Always, however, a Spartan band of Democrats contested every inch of the field, winning an occasional notable battle until finally, in 1910, a complete and apparently permanent victory was won, for during the last eight years every county office has been held by a Democrat.

The city of Evansville, the county seat, is also governed by Democrats, with Benjamin Bosse mayor.

Among the pioneers of Democracy in the antebellum days was John Law, lawyer and scholar, who served in Congress from the First District with distinction just before the war.

His immediate successor was William E. Niblack of Knox county, which was then in the First District.

Among the notable Democratic leaders of the early days were Benoni Stinson, Morris Johnson, George W. McBride, C. R. Rudd, A. T. Whittles, James D. Saunders, Sr.; George L. Dixon, who was county chairman during the first successful campaign after the war, and the four Walkers, Dr. George B., Dr. John H., James T. and William H.

The Walker family is still a virile force in Vanderburg county and the name is one of the most honored among our citizens. William H. Walker was mayor of Evansville in the early days, while Dr. John H. Walker held a commission as surgeon in the Union army. His son, Jesse Walker, now deceased, was one of the first Democrats elected to office in Vanderburg county, being chosen clerk of the circuit court in 1876 and again in 1880. Dr. Edwin Walker, a surgeon of widely recognized ability and owner of the Walker Hospital, in Evansville, and his brother, James T. Walker, a leading member of the Evansville bar, are sons of James T. Walker.

The Civil war recruited not only a full quota of Democrats to the ranks of the Federal army, but drew many Democrats to the leadership of the Union forces. The first Indiana officer to fall in battle was Major John Smith Gavitt of the First Indiana Cavalry, who was shot from his horse while riding far in advance of his troops in a charge at Pilot Knob, Mo., in 1862. Major Gavitt was a picturesque figure in Evansville for many years prior to the war and his name was a household word and the synonym of courage and chivalry for a generation.

He was sheriff of the county while the Erie canal was under construction and when the steamboat "roustabouts" were recruited from the "bad men" of the cities up the river, and when it required courage to keep the peace. The State of Indiana should long since have erected a monument to this gallant officer. His son, William Gavitt, who still resides in Evansville, was governor of the Islands of St. George, in the Arctic, during Cleveland's second administration. Charles Denby was lieutenant-colonel of the 42d Indiana and was a leader at the Vanderburg bar and one of Democracy's ablest champions. President Cleveland appointed him minister to China in 1885, in which post he was retained by his personal friend, President Harrison. Later Colonel Denby served with Dewey as commissioner to the Philippine Islands, where he labored in establishing and stabilizing the first American government.

Other Democrats holding high rank in the Union army were Colonel James Shanklin of the 25th Indiana, and Colonel John Rheinlander of the 24th Regiment. Colonel Rheinlander, after the war, engaged in business in Evansville and was for many years and until his death president of the People's Savings Bank.

Colonel Shanklin, who died during the war, was a brother to John Gilbert Shanklin and George W. Shanklin, editors for many years of the Evansville Courier and stalwart leaders of Democracy, well known among the Democrats all over Indiana. These two brothers were men of remarkable intellectual power. Nature had been prodigal in building these two splendid specimens of manhood. They were giants in stature and their hearts and minds were typical of their bodies.

Both were writers of great power and they wielded a fearless pen. They were journalists of the old school. Uninfluenced by the counting-room, they stood for what they believed were the best interests of the people. George believed that he could best serve the people and fulfill his mission outside of public office and he refused to accept any kind of place.

John Gilbert Shanklin was a brilliant orator and in every campaign his services were in demand from the lake to the Ohio river. He was elected secretary of state in the historic campaign of 1876, when "Blue Jeans" Williams was elected governor and when Thomas A. Hendricks was on the ticket for Vice-President with Tilden.

Mr. Shanklin aspired to be governor of Indiana and his opportunity seemed to present itself in 1892, but his vigorous insistence that Grover Cleveland be given the support of the Indiana Democracy for the presidential nomination arrayed the leaders of the organization against him and he was defeated in convention by Claude Matthews. However, his bold stand for Cleveland succeeded and Indiana instructed her delegates for him at a crisis in the campaign which his supporters were making for him and probably had more influence in nominating him than any other circumstance of that memorable fight.

President Cleveland offered Mr. Shanklin a high place in the diplomatic field, but because of ill health and a desire to enjoy the comforts of home he declined it. He was an ardent champion and friend of William Jennings Bryan and the cause of the free coinage of silver in the great campaign of 1896.

These men are dead, but the example of their unselfish devotion to their city, their party and their friends will long endure.

Thomas B. Byrne, a friend and contemporary of the Shanklins, was another Democrat worthy of note. He was twice nominated in the early "eighties" for treasurer of state, but was defeated with the ticket. He died in 1891.

The Vanderburg Democracy is proud of its dead and proud of those who still remain at the helm. Ten years ago John W. Boehne, a manufacturer, who had come to Evansville from the country a poor boy, and who had made himself into a man of affairs, was called by his party to lead a fight for cleaner government and purer politics. On a platform of fearless challenge to vice and lawlessness and a promise of better things he was elected mayor of Evansville. He carried out his pledges and before he completed his term the Democracy of the district, seeing in him a hope for the recovery of the district from the Republicans, who had held it for 16 years, nominated him for Congress. He was elected in 1908 and again in 1910, but declined to go further in a career which held no attraction for him. He was appointed and now holds the office of director of the Federal Reserve Bank of the district of St. Louis.

Another of Vanderburg's favorite, though adopted, sons is John W. Spencer, now a judge of the Supreme Court of Indiana. Judge Spencer, who was born in Posey county, was elected prosecutor of the First Judicial Circuit, then consisting of Vanderburg and Posey counties, in 1890, and came to Evansville to administer that office in 1891. His fearless conduct of this office and the striking ability which he brought to it at once impressed the people of southern Indiana. His uncompromising attitude toward the lawbreaker regardless of his strength and influence, struck terror to a class that had long held sway in the county and made young Spencer a leader from the start.

Judge Spencer upon retiring from the prosecutor's office engaged with his erstwhile deputy, John R. Brill, in the practice of law. This was a virile, fighting pair and they were rarely "beaten" in the court room or elsewhere during the 16 years of their partnership.

Governor Marshall appointed Spencer to fill a vacancy on the circuit bench of Vanderburg, where his practicality and his contempt for beaten paths at once aroused the admiration of the bar and the public.

While thus serving the Democratic state convention nominated him for judge of the Supreme Court, to which post he was elected in 1912, but before the election a vacancy occurred on the supreme bench and Governor Marshall appointed Spencer to the place. Judge Spencer therefore enjoys the unique distinction of having been twice appointed to a judgeship by Governor Marshall. Judge Spencer, unlike the generality of men who reach the bench, has never lost interest in the welfare of his party, thus proving that the dignity of the bench may be maintained by one who refuses to give up his party interest for the toga.

Other jurists who were Democrats were Judge William F. Parrett, who served for 30 years on the circuit bench and closed his career by serving two terms in Congress, from 1888 to 1892; Judge Robert D. Richardson, deceased, was appointed by Governor Gray to a vacancy on the circuit bench in 1888 and was afterward elected and served with marked ability.

Hon. Azro Dyer was thrice elected judge of the superior court, in 1878, 1882 and 1886, and served with distinction. Judge Dyer maintains an office downtown, where he gives attention to his personal affairs, and while he is not active at the bar, maintains a lively interest in the profession. He has traveled the world over, is widely read and splendidly typifies the retired jurist. He is cultured, a fine raconteur and would distinguish himself in any company.

The present occupants of the bench are: F. M. Hostetter, judge of the superior court, and Duncan C. Givens, judge of the circuit court, both of whom are able jurists. The other Democratic incumbents in the county are: Charles P. Beard, auditor; Newton W. Thrall, treasurer; William E. Wilson, clerk; William Habbe, sheriff; Fred T.

Stritter, recorder; Paul DeKress, assessor; Charles Erskine, senator, and Eugene Eisterholdt and Louis Waltz, representatives. The county commissioners are: John Wimberg, Henry Heltrich and Fred W. Buente.

Lane B. Osborn is the prosecuting attorney, having been twice elected to that office. No man in Vanderburg county holds in a higher degree the confidence and respect of the people than Albert J. Venemann, present county attorney. He has always given active and loyal support to the Democratic ticket and while making no demand for office, has been called to some important places. He was city attorney in the administration of John W. Boehne and was chosen speaker of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana during the session of 1911. Mr. Venemann, anticipating a constitutional convention in Indiana, has made an exhaustive investigation of the subject of constitutional law. Had the convention been held Mr. Venemann would certainly have gone as a delegate from Vanderburg county by practically a unanimous vote.

The success of Democracy during the past few years is in a large measure due to the leadership of Benjamin Bosse, the present mayor of Evansville and chairman of the First Congressional District. Mr. Bosse is a fine example of the self-made man. Coming to Evansville from an outlying township twenty years ago, without money or influence, he has steadily risen until he is recognized to be the leading spirit and most potent factor in the commercial life of Evansville. His dynamic energy is ceaseless. Every public enterprise demands his leadership, and no man in Evansville has given so generously of his time and his money for the public welfare.

While mayor Mr. Bosse has made many splendid public improvements. To his energy we owe the beautiful Coliseum, the Stadium, a modern market house, Garvin Park and the nucleus for a park and boulevard system.

Our congressman is George K. Denton, who was elected to his first term in 1916. Mr. Denton is a native of Kentucky and came to Evansville twenty-five years ago. He is a lawyer of ability, a student of political economy of the progressive school and a man who believes in the people. Mr. Denton has given loyal support in Congress to the policies of Woodrow Wilson.

The Democracy of this section believe the Evansville Courier to be the leading Democratic newspaper of Indiana. In 1897 three young men, Henry C. Murphy, Percy P. Carroll and Howard Roosa, came to Evansville and bought the Courier at sheriff's sale. They put brains, energy and money into it and have today as fine a newspaper property as can be found in any city of 100,000 in the country.

Mr. Murphy is president, Mr. Carroll business manager and Howard Roosa the editor of the Courier. It is the only morning paper published in Evansville and circulates widely in Indiana, Illinois and Kentucky, where it exerts a powerful influence upon the political, social and commercial life of the people. The Courier under the present management has been clean and wholesome and the people believe in it.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF VERMILION COUNTY

VERMILION COUNTY is situated in the middle western part of the State, being a very narrow strip of territory between the state line of Illinois on the west and the Wabash river along the east side. It is in congressional townships fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, seventeen, eighteen and nineteen north and principally in range nine west, being about forty miles long north and south and averaging about six miles wide east and west. The county was formerly a part of Vigo county, but in 1821 Vigo was divided and Parke county was organized therefrom, and what is now Vermilion became a part of Parke county. Parke county was divided by an act of the Legislature January 2, 1824, when Vermilion county was formed and commissioners were appointed by the Legislature to locate a county seat. They chose what is now the town of Newport, where the same has remained ever since.

Being geographically located and shaped as it is, the people have very greatly diversified interests and gathering places and hence there has never been as close a bond between the different localities as there should have been for close organization.

Being such a long, narrow county, the north part of the same is situated close to the large city of Danville, Illinois, and the south part close to the city of Terre Haute. The very south part of the county has the city of Clinton, which is a city of 10,000 inhabitants. The county seat, which is situated about the center of the county, has only 700. Hence there is not that commingling of the population into one common center which would induce a close acquaintance of the general populace and make co-operation and organization easy.

So, writing the history of the Democratic party before the last twenty-five years or so is a great deal like the old farmer said upon seeing a giraffe for the first time. To him it was a very curious sight, and after looking at the creature for some time he walked away and said, "Gosh, there ain't no sich durned animal."

Up to the present decade the county was considered a perfectly safe Republican county; consequently the organization of the Democratic party was loose and disconnected, by reason of the fact that the population was small and the Democratic vote was light and by the further reason that we have been connected in a district with Vigo county, which has a large city. Vermilion county has never been able to cut much figure in district or state politics; but, thanks to the untiring efforts of the unterrified few who have worked night and day to overcome the long-standing conditions, the county court house was practically filled with Democrats at the election of 1912.

Owing to the fact that the Democrats did not have a look-in and the consequent loose organization of the party in the county, and because of which facts no Democratic newspapers were able to stem the tide, very little can be found out about the party affairs in the early history of the county. We find that even up to the eighties the Democrats had very little organization; generally a handful of the faithful would meet on campaign years at some law office in Newport and select a county committee and probably chairman and also "select" a county ticket. We find from the files of an old newspaper that the Democrats of the county met at the law office of James C. Sawyer in Newport in 1876 and selected a committee and county ticket. This is the first appearance of Mr. Sawyer in county politics. He was at that time a struggling young lawyer, afterward was elected trustee of Vermilion township, and of late years, until his death in 1910, was associated with the Hon. John E. Lamb in the practice of the law in Terre Haute. Even in 1882 and 1884 we find that the county conventions were held in law offices and selected committees to draft a county ticket.

While all the above is true and nomination upon the Republican county ticket was considered equivalent to an election, yet there have been a very few Democrats elected to county office, owing to the unusual popularity of some candidate or unpopularity of the Republican candidate, or to a split in the Republican ranks, mostly about the time of the Greenback movement. This movement, by the way, worked to the great permanent advantage of the Democratic party in the county, as many who went from the Republican party into the Greenback afterward voted the Democratic ticket. By reason of the movement William Gibson, Democrat, was elected circuit clerk in 1870 by a majority of 42, and W. F. Bales was elected the same year as commissioner by 96. Mr. Gibson, being a very popular man and official, was re-elected clerk in 1874.

H. O. Peters, of Eugene township, who was a dyed-in-the-wool type of Democrat of the old school, a great "mixer," popular and a good campaigner, was elected county treasurer in 1880 by the small plurality of 20, and was re-elected in 1882. Mr. Peters was a most genial business man and banker of Cayuga and was afterward elected township trustee of Eugene township.

In 1890, John B. Groves, of Newport, was elected county recorder by the remarkably small plurality of two votes and the same year Michael Maher, of Clinton, was elected sheriff. Mr. Groves made a popular and accommodating official and was elected trustee of Vermilion township. So far as the writer has been able to determine the above is the entire extent of the Democratic success in the county up to 1910. Notwithstanding the fact that it was safely Republican, the county, through being at different times placed with Democratic counties in representative districts, has had a few representatives to the Legislature.

Hon. Claude Matthews, later Governor of Indiana, was elected in 1876, and served one term; Hon. E. A. Lacey, of Highland township, was elected in 1888; John Redman, of Dana, was elected in 1892; Hon. G. D. Sunkel, of Dana, was elected in 1908, and served two terms, being re-elected in 1910; Hon. Mark W. Lyday, of Clinton, was elected in 1912, and re-elected in the fall of 1914. And for the same reason we have been able to elect one joint senator. Dr. J. F. Adams of Clinton was elected to the senate in 1912, and is the present holder of the office.

The first Democratic prosecuting attorney of this judicial circuit, composed of this and Parke county, was W. A. Satterlee, of Clinton, who was elected in 1910. He was defeated by George D. Sunkel for the re-nomination in 1912. Mr. Sunkel was elected in the fall election, served one term, and was defeated in the election of 1914.

Owing to the fact that the county was so solidly Republican and consequently there being no Democratic patronage, there has been a dearth of Democratic newspapers in the county. The Perrysville Banner started out as the Democratic organ in 1838, printed on an old press said to have been brought to Vincennes in 1804 and then brought to Perrysville, but under the existing conditions could not live and died in a very short time. In 1872 Harrison Jump, brother of Joshua Jump, who was at one time judge of the Vermilion circuit court and now of Terre Haute and Trustee of the Indiana State Normal school, started a Democratic newspaper in the county seat which went under the name of the Vermilion Transcript; lived only one short year, in which the publisher lost considerable money in the venture. In the early nineties D. B. Gibbons began the publication of the Cayuga Tribune, but the paper was of short duration and soon ceased publication. About 1901 Bob Osborne, known as "Fighting Bob" and "Old Blue Pencil," began the publication of a Democratic sheet under the name of the Blue Pencil, published at Cayuga in pamphlet form. He was of the radical say-as-he-pleased sort and after a short publication moved the plant to Perrysville, where his attitude and sayings got him into several difficulties, causing fights, drawn revolvers and, later, some one shot through his window at him. He soon left Perrysville, going to Clinton, where he continued the publication for a short time, and then went "West". At present, there are four Democratic papers in the county. The Saturday Argus, printed and published at Clinton, was established by the present editor, L. O. Bishop, who has published the same since about 1881. The Vermilion Democrat, edited and published at Clinton by Mont Casey, was established in 1914. The Dana News, printed and published Dana by J. H. Jordan, was established October 1, 1885, by M. L. Griffith, by him sold to J. L. Smith, and by him sold to Miss Beatrice Taylor, by her sold to G. W. Sturm, and from him transferred to the present owner, who has successfully operated the same for several years. The Cayuga Herald was established in 1889 and was published by numerous persons for several years as an independent paper until the acquisition by the present editor, A. Carter Hutchinson, who purchased the same and came out on the side of Democracy, and has continued to operate the same successfully as a Democratic paper ever since.

As said before, the early organization was loose, but we find that in the seventies one John Stakley was at times the county chairman. In the latter part of the seventies and eighties Joshua Jump, an attorney of Newport, headed the party and acted as county chairman, and upon the formation of the present circuit was appointed judge and served till the next election. From 1890 till 1896 Chas. W. Ward was county chairman; John Redman from 1896 till 1900; M. J. Tucker 1900 to 1902; Dr. W. P. Darroch in 1902; J. D. Smith 1904 and 1906; H. M. Booe 1908; W. A. Satterlee 1910; F. W. Kaufman was elected county chairman in 1912 and Charles N. Fultz was elected in 1916.

The county is divided into five townships, all in a string north and south, being from north to south, respectively, Highland, Eugene, Vermilion, Helt and Clinton. While the county has been strongly Republican, there has been a majority of Democratic trustees elected in the county at times which gave us the county superintendent of schools. A. J. Johnson was elected to fill an unexpired term, 1882, and was re-elected in 1883, and again in 1885. John A. Wiltermood, of Clinton, was elected in 1891, and re-elected in 1893. Prof. John R. Stahl was elected in 1895, and served one term. John B. Butler was elected in 1907 for a four-year term, and was re-elected in 1911, although the Republicans had a majority of the trustees.

During the last decade the Republicans, having everything their own way, carried everything in a high-handed manner, and the organization bosses ran things to suit themselves rather than the people, till they became dissatisfied and began to pull away; so in the campaign of 1908 the Democrats made great gains and in 1910 elected almost the entire county ticket: Steve McCown, sheriff; Frank R. Johnson, county recorder; A. J. Huxford, treasurer; J. A. Booe, surveyor; J. H. Cole, county assessor; Frank Shew and James Cossey, county commissioners, making the board of commissioners Democratic for the first time in the history of the county. In 1912 A. J. Huxford was re-elected treasurer; J. A. Booe, surveyor, Steve McCown, sheriff; Frank Shew, commissioner; Roy Slater was elected county auditor and Thomas Catlin was elected a new commissioner, thus making a complete Democratic board of commissioners. Thus the year 1912 completely filled the court house with Democrats, with the exception of county clerk, who held over and was not elected that year.

The city of Clinton was so strongly Republican that the Democrats did not always put out a ticket, but at the city convention of 1909 the Republican machine carried things in such a high-handed way to put over the machine candidate for mayor that the Democrats put out an excellent ticket and elected H. M. Ferguson, a coal operator of Clinton, mayor, by a large majority, giving Clinton its first Democratic administration, which was liked so well that M. J. Tucker, an old-time Democrat, was elected mayor in 1913 and is the incumbent.

Vermilion county has many Democrats of whom she is proud, but standing out from the rest is one whose name is cherished and memory revered—the late Hon. Claude Matthews. Claude Matthews lived on a farm in the west part of Clinton township a few miles west of the city of Clinton. He was always identified with the Democratic activities of the county, being one of the few who stayed with the party under adverse circumstances, but lived to reap the harvest for his labors. As has been said, he was once elected to the Legislature from this county, was nominated by the Democratic state convention in 1890 for secretary of state, and in 1892 was elected governor of Indiana upon the Democratic ticket. Mr. Matthews died several years ago, leaving his wife to mourn him. Mrs. Martha A. R. Matthews, the widow, had the honor and distinction of having been the daughter and also the wife of an Indiana governor, having been the wife of Governor Matthews and the daughter of Governor Whitcomb.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF VIGO COUNTY

ALTHOUGH the first Democratic convention in the United States was held in 1832, it was not until about the close of the Civil War that there was much of note doing in political circles in Vigo county. During the war and immediately thereafter the Republicans had held sway in Terre Haute. In 1865, when Albert Lange, Republican, and Colonel Cookerly, Democrat, were candidates for the mayoralty of the city, there was but one Democratic ward, the Third. There were but five wards in the city at that time. Colonel Cookerly was unterrified by his defeat in this campaign and again became a candidate in 1867. Although two of Terre Haute's papers at that time—the Express and the Journal—opposed him, one of them announcing on the eve of election that D. A. Conover would be elected, Cookerly comfortably won the office with a majority of 252. It was under Mayor Cookerly's administration that the cornerstone for the Normal Institute was laid.

At the Democratic convention of Vigo county in 1867 Chambers Y. Patterson was nominated for judge; G. B. Hanna for prosecutor; John B. Meyer, recorder; D. Hollingsworth and Benjamin Mewhinney, county commissioners. Patterson was elected by less than 300 votes.

It was in 1868 that Daniel W. Voorhees entered the political arena, coming out at that time for Congress. He was nominated at the Democratic convention, receiving the votes of all present except seven, who cast their ballots for Hon. B. W. Hanna. George H. Pendleton was the choice of Vigo Democracy for President at that time.

Perhaps those of later days think there were dull sessions of political meetings back in the sixties and early seventies. Not so. There were stirring times. Feeling ran high among the men who were Democrats because they just naturally couldn't be anything else and the men who were Republicans because they were born that way. During a campaign of this period, in 1868, the Democrats held a rally at Early's Grove. One of the speakers was their candidate for Vice-President, Gen. Frank P. Blair. In his speech he denied that he had ever said he would "rather sleep with a nigger than a Democrat." Voorhees was elected to Congress that year.

The campaign of 1870 found Voorhees seeking renomination without opposition. The Democratic convention of this year adopted a resolution opposing the taking back of the Wabash & Erie canal, at that time a very prominent political question. The election in 1870 was generally favorable to the Democrats in Vigo county, that party electing its entire ticket save one member. Samuel Royse beat William Paddock for auditor; W. H. Stewart won over Gordon Lee for sheriff; J. M. Sankey was elected over M. C. Rankin for treasurer; John B. Meyer over Theodore Marxen for recorder; Dr. Gerstmeyer over David L. Christy for coroner; S. C. Davis over I. N. Pierce for prosecutor. That year the Democrats carried the State by about 2,000. The year following, however, brought losses to this party.

An important question accompanied the year 1872, when the problem of whether or not Indiana should endorse Horace Greeley for the Presidency, came up. In Vigo county the voters were divided. Mr. Voorhees, then in Congress, telegraphed to his friends in Terre Haute the following:

"The Democratic party will meet as usual in national convention and through its authorized delegates nominate its candidates and declare its policy. Until then no man has the right to commit the party as to its future action. Its organization and principles should be maintained at all hazards."

This was interpreted as an act of hostility towards Greeley, and on May 13, 1872, Voorhees made his celebrated speech in Congress against Greeley.

The Democratic national convention at Baltimore on July 9, 1872, endorsed Greeley and Brown, the Liberal-Republican nominees. A part of the Democracy in Vigo county openly rebelled. The Terre Haute Journal refused to be absorbed in the liberal movement and attacked Greeley bitterly. The Gazette with equal warmth espoused the Greeley cause.

At the congressional convention in Spencer, Ind., that year Voorhees was unanimously renominated and there followed the hottest campaign that had ever been waged in Vigo county. The Democrats erected a wigwam on the northeast corner of Eighth and Ohio streets on Dr. Reed's vacant lot. On August 7 the Greeley wigwam was opened by a big meeting. Hendricks, Voorhees and Hanna spoke. In this campaign, for the first time, appeared the name of John E. Lamb, who became second lieutenant for the Greeley escort.

After Voorhees' nomination the third time he would not retract nor qualify a word he had said about Greeley, but stated that he fully recognized that the Baltimore convention at which Greeley was nominated had "legitimate authority and ultimate control." So when Horace Greeley came to Indianapolis to address a big meeting Voorhees presided at the meeting. A train of eleven coaches carried the Vigo county followers to hear Greeley. Voorhees was defeated in this campaign, however, by Hunter, whose majority was 700.

H. C. Bradsby's History of Vigo County says: "The Democracy of Vigo county was badly demoralized after the Greeley campaign and probably partly from this cause just after that time Terre Haute had quite a craze on the subject of female suffrage. The Gazette said, 'It sported the liveliest kind of woman suffrage club, of which O. J. Smith was the recognized head and front.'"

In 1873 the Democrats of Terre Haute nominated John T. Scott for mayor and later elected him. In October of that same year, in the election for the prosecuting attorney in Vigo and Sullivan counties, Samuel R. Hamill was elected over George W. Buff by six votes.

It was in 1874 that a mighty temperance crusade came on, and through it the Vigo county Republican ticket was crushed from top to bottom. The Republicans were denounced in a mass-meeting for their fanatical tendencies and resolutions endorsing the Democratic party were adopted at that time. The Democratic majority on the state ticket in the county was 840.

Voorhees' name appeared again as a candidate for Congress in 1875, but he withdrew before the election. Joseph E. McDonald was elected in his stead.

In 1876 the Democrats nominated Col. W. E. McLean for Congress, endorsed A. B. Carlton for judge of the supreme court, and John E. Lamb for county prosecutor. The Vigo county Democrats made nearly a clean sweep for their ticket at this election, although Hunter beat McLean in the county by 67 votes. Lamb was elected prosecutor.

Spring elections of 1877 resulted in a substantial Democratic success. James B. Edmunds, editor, was elected mayor a second time. Tom Harper was elected city attorney. Edmunds died about two months after his election. Henry Fairbanks was chosen to succeed him and after nine months in office he, too, died.

The never-to-be-forgotten judicial contest in Vigo and Sullivan counties occurred in 1878. Sullivan had no candidate and Vigo had two—C. Y. Patterson and Sidney B. Davis. Judge Carlton was chairman of the convention which was to decide the nomination question. Followers of both candidates were present in large numbers. Confusion reigned after the session had been called.

Davis' men saw they were outwitted and, accompanied by their leaders, went to another hall and nominated their man. Both conventions declared the other irregular. In the election which settled the question, however, Patterson was chosen by a small majority.

It was along in the 70's that confusion over the settlement of certain legal cases became most evident in this section and through an appeal to the Legislature a criminal court was established. Judge Thomas B. Long, a Democrat, was judge of this court for many years until the superior court was established. There are still many of the older residents who will remember that Judge William Mack was for many years Circuit Judge in Vigo county.

One of the figures that stand out prominently in Judge Davis' memory is Bayless W. Hanna, who ran for Congress but was defeated, but who later became Attorney-General and still later was sent as a minister to Argentine Republic.

Judge Cyrus McNutt was judge of the superior court for many years, but he, according to Judge Davis, belonged to the later-day Democrats. The judge is strong in his praise of those early founders of the Democratic party, believing firmly in the principles which they represented.

Only once did Vigo fail to support the elected President. In 1908 William Jennings Bryan carried the county by a small majority, but was defeated for the Presidency. With the exception of that one time since 1860 every time the Democratic party carried the county a Democratic President was elected. It was the same with the Republican party.

From 1860 until 1894 the Democratic party elected one or more city or county officials every year. In 1886 the Democrats carried both the county and city. In 1888 the Republicans carried the county, but several Democratic officials were elected to office.

The Democrats carried the county and city in 1890 and in 1892 a Republican mayor and a Democratic city council was elected. The Democrats carried the county.

The Republicans carried the county and city in 1894. In 1896 the Republicans again carried the county and city, but a Democratic sheriff and treasurer were elected. In 1898 the Democrats elected the mayor, sheriff and treasurer.

In 1900 the Democrats carried the county and re-elected Henry C. Stegg mayor of the city. In 1902 the Republicans again carried the county.

In 1904 the Democrats carried the county and city and in 1906 a Democratic mayor and half of the city officials were Democrats. In 1908 and 1910 the Democrats carried the county and in 1912 the city. In 1914 they again carried the city and in 1916 Democrats elected all officers with the exception of county prosecutor.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF WABASH COUNTY

By Arthur N. McCracken

WABASH COUNTY is composed of seven political townships, each of which is much larger than the civil township created by the ordinance of 1787 of six miles square and lies about eighty-four miles north of Indianapolis, and a little east of the center line of the State, and its lands are drained by the famous Wabash river, with its various tributaries, being bi-sected by the Wabash river, which runs in a southwesterly direction through the central portion of this county, while the tributaries known as the Eel river and the Mississinewa river again cross it from northeast to southwest, while the Salamonie river is a tributary of the Mississinewa river and enters its border between the Wabash river and Eel river, forming a junction with the Wabash river at LaGro.

The land of this county is very fertile, mostly of black loam, except in the northwestern and extreme eastern portion and the portions traversed by the various rivers that cross it, which is hilly and rolling.

This county was organized at the beginning of the State's history and at one time included the territory of what is now the county of Miami, and both counties at that time were in a judicial circuit, but the legislature has seen fit to create in each a judicial circuit and now each maintains its own separate government, the county seat of Wabash being located at the city of Wabash, which is located on the Wabash river about the central portion of the county, and is a city of approximately 10,000 people.

The resources of Wabash county have been varied. About 1890 natural gas was found in abundance and this was piped into the city of Wabash and used in its factories as fuel, as well as for domestic purposes, and after about fifteen years' usage, the flow of natural gas ceased, and since that time there has been little or no gas found other than in the vicinity of LaFontaine. Oil was also struck in somewhat paying quantities along the banks of the Wabash river, but this, too, has not held out in recent years. However, there are a few wells left at this time which are being pumped.

The farmers of Wabash county are prosperous. There are many fine farms and fine homes. The land in general is very productive, particularly adapted to the raising of corn, oats and wheat, and many a farmer has become wealthy in the pursuit of raising these cereals, and now one can see, as he rides about this county, many beautiful homes and residences as a result of the productiveness of the soil and the industry of its people.

The early history of Wabash county was more or less of a struggle. It was occupied by the Miami tribe of Indians, and at this late date there are many evidences of this race still found within its borders. The city of Wabash is entirely laid out upon a section of land donated by the Federal government to Chief Char'cy and John B. Richardville, chiefs of the Miami tribe of Indians, and they have ever since retained their identity in honor of the men to whom the government granted this land.

The location of the county seat of Wabash county in the early history was an intense struggle between the then town of LaGro and what is now the city of Wabash, it being decided in favor of the town of Wabash by popular vote and the city winning by one vote over the town of LaGro. This momentous struggle resulted in all the county buildings being located in the town of Wabash, and this undoubtedly gave impetus to the fact that the city of Wabash is the principal city within the county. However, North Manchester, located in a beautiful farming district on the banks of the Eel river, is a town of about twenty-five hundred inhabitants, with beautiful paved streets, many churches and a fine college, and with its various attractions makes it a very desirable place to live, it being situated almost due north of the city of Wabash and connected therewith by the Dixie highway, which also passes through Wabash county, north and south, striking the southwestern border at LaFontaine, and leaving it six miles northwest of North Manchester.

LaFontaine takes its name from a Miami Indian and is an incorporated town of about one thousand people, having its electric lights and paved streets, school system and many churches. LaGro also takes its name from a Miami Indian known as LaGros, and is a town northeast of the city of Wabash on the Wabash railroad and Ft. Wayne and Northern Indiana traction line and has a population of about seven hundred and is in the center of one of the largest townships of the State. In the western end of this township is another prosperous town known as Urbana, having two banks and many churches and is a town of some three hundred inhabitants situated in the center of a very fertile farming district, while Roann is at the west extremity of Paw Paw township and near the west line of Wabash county on the banks of the Eel river. Roann is a town of approximately eight hundred people and has an electric light and water system. Somerset and Liberty Mills are each old towns situated respectively in the southern and northern extremities of the county, are each situated in a fertile farming district and surrounded by many fine farms of great fertility.

The unincorporated town of Laketon is situated about four miles southwest of North Manchester and is surrounded by many fertile farms, and Pleasant township, the northwest township of the county, is dotted with many fine lakes, affording fishing and pleasure to those who seek recreation along their shores.

Wabash county has four hundred and fifty miles of pike, much of which has been built under the three-mile road law, and has bridges crossing its various streams and rivers which have been erected at great expense to the public, the city of Wabash having three, one of which is just now being completed at a cost of approximately forty-five thousand dollars. The city of Wabash has various industries and is a manufacturing town of considerable extent. There are about two thousand people employed in its various factories, which have afforded a great deal of employment to laborers in times past, as well as at present.

The political history of Wabash county began, of course, with its creation, and has always been steadfastly Republican except within the past ten years. The first Democrat elected to office was Ora Whiteneck, who had the distinction of being elected county surveyor. However, he was subsequently defeated, and in 1912 the Democrats elected their entire county ticket, including a representative in the legislature, and a joint senator from this county and Fulton. In 1914 the Democrats again elected their entire county ticket, save and except the offices of county coroner and county assessor.

The early history of the Democratic party in Wabash county up until recent years has been a history of struggle, lack of organization and a spirit of being licked before the campaign opened, but in later years this spirit has been replaced by better organizations, more interest and a firmer determination to win. In 1912 A. N. McCracken was chairman of the county central committee, and perfected an organization that won every office in the county and who was followed two years later by Dr. James Wilson who also maintained the organization to a high degree of standard, electing the Honorable Nelson G. Hunter Judge of the Wabash Circuit Court, A.

N. McCracken as Prosecuting Attorney for the twenty-seventh Judicial Circuit, Norva P. Laven-good as Treasurer, Frank P. Kircher as Auditor, Earl E. Roby as Clerk, Merrit Bannister as Commissioner of the Southern district, William H. Custer as Commissioner of the Northern district and Jesse P. Bell as Surveyor. This was done without the aid of any newspaper and the first two officers were elected without any opposition other than the Republican candidates, while George Rauch, who has ably represented the Eleventh congressional district in Congress for ten years, carried the county by a safe margin, while the vote for President Wilson and Theodore Roosevelt, in 1912, was a tie.

The city of Wabash has had three Democratic mayors in its history, Dr. Crabill being the first, who was elected many years ago, and later Horace D. Bannister received the honor of an election while Dr. James Wilson was elected in 1911, and four years later re-elected, and is now the candidate of his party for re-election the third time. The history of politics in this county, as far as Democracy is concerned, points back with pride to some pioneers who were steadfast in their faith and the principles of Jefferson, and never faltered in their duty to their party, notwithstanding the Democratic party was a party of the minority and election after election came and went and not a Democrat was elected to an office. Meredith H. Kidd was one who always carried the banner, while William A. Elward, Charles Freshour, Frank Ramsey, Frank Ireland, John Isenbarger, Charles Wright, Nelson G. Hunter, John Hipskind, V. A. Mattern and James A. Earley were always found at their post under the Democratic ticket and doing everything in their power for the furtherance of Democratic success. In 1898 Gilford M. Naber and A. N. McCracken were their party's choice for Representative and Prosecuting Attorney, respectively, and each made a vigorous campaign through Wabash county, assisted by Judge Hunter, Milo Meredith, Edward E. Eikenbary and many others and reduced the Republican majority that then existed of over twenty-five hundred to less than a thousand.

The Wabash Times-Star is a Democratic newspaper putting out daily copies upholding the hands of Democracy in a very able manner under the management of James E. Almond, the editor and manager, a young man of sterling ability and of the highest integrity. The Democracy of this county is in every way a success. It never presented a better organization and more consistent unity of purpose than at the present time, and the leaders believe that in the future Wabash county will return frequent majorities for the Democratic party.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF WARREN COUNTY

ONCE in a while a legislative body will pass a law with the direct purpose of setting off to themselves a bunch of citizens who insist upon voting unanimously for this party or that political organization. Whether any such purpose was intended in the creation of Warren county by the legislature, the boundaries of that county were certainly made to include an aggregation of Republicans that no circumstances or conditions have ever been able to change. A history of the Democracy of Warren county is a history of one defeat following another.

In the earlier days, the county having been organized by election of its first set of officers on the 23rd day of June, 1827, there appeared to be a disposition on the part of the majority to be not too severe with the Democratic minority. So in those days the majorities against Democracy were kept within moderate limits. In later years, however, and reaching down to the present time, anything less than two to one in favor of Republicans has been rather unusual.

In 1832, in which campaign Jackson and Van Buren were the Democratic nominees and Clay and Sargent were the Whig nominees, the first decided political division was represented in the voting in Warren county. In this election the Whig ticket received 301 votes, and the Democrats 267. That was not so bad but that the Democrats might some time in the future hope to turn the majority to the other side.

In 1834 and 1836 all parties became pretty well united under the two banners, that of Democracy and that of the Whigs. Local candidates stood fairly on party platforms and divisions. In the presidential contest of that year, Harrison and Granger heading the Whig ticket, and Van Buren and Johnson the Democratic ticket, Warren cast its vote 541 for Harrison, and 329 for Van Buren.

The campaign four years later was the one, however, in which the most intense partisan spirit was demonstrated. This was the famous campaign in which Harrison and Tyler headed the Whig forces, and Van Buren and Johnson again contended as the Democratic nominees. Harrison received more than two votes to Van Buren's one, the relative strength being 740 to 348.

The question of extending the slavery territory was a decided issue in 1844, when Texas was seeking admission to the Union. The Whigs nominated Henry Clay and the Democrats selected James K. Polk as their standard-bearer. While the country went strongly to Polk and the Democratic ticket, Warren county remained firmly and decidedly Republican, giving 779 votes to Clay, and 470 to Polk.

The campaign of 1848, while still bitterly contested, did not show the interest in Warren county that had prevailed in previous elections. While the population of the county was increasing materially, the vote was considerably less than in 1844, Taylor and Fillmore, the Whig candidates, receiving 708, to 460 for the Democratic candidates.

Advancing still nearer to the time when the question of slavery must be decided one way or the other, interest in the subject among the people of Warren county waxed warmer all the time, so in 1852 there was a fair increase in the vote when Scott and Graham, the Whig candidates, received 850 votes, against 552 for Pierce and King of the Democracy.

Republican majorities continued to grow, and in 1856 Fremont and Dayton were given 1,167, to 767 for Buchanan and Breckinridge.

However, Warren county was not always with the winning side, for many presidential candidates repudiated by the voters of Warren county spent comfortable years in the White House.

In 1860 and 1864 the Republican majorities still continued to grow, and in the election of 1864 Lincoln and Johnson were given 1,373, against 761 for McClellan and Pendleton.

All the new voters who appeared in the next four years appear to have been Republicans, for while the Democratic vote failed to increase, the Republican total and majority grew apace.

Grant and Wilson received 1,504 votes, against 775 for Greeley and Brown.

In 1876, had Hayes and Wheeler done as well in the rest of the country as they did in Warren county, there would have been none of the unpleasantness growing out of the settlement of the election. In this county Hayes and Wheeler received 1,590, against 880 for Tilden and Hendricks. Garfield and Arthur drew still further strength, adding materially to the proportionate majority in 1880, the Republican ticket receiving 1,850, against 901 for Hancock and English.

In 1888 Benjamin Harrison was given a majority of 829 votes, and in 1896 William McKinley added to this, making the majority 945.

Coming down to the later elections, in the campaign of 1908 when Bryan and Kern were the Democratic nominees, another favorite son was being placed before the voters of Indiana. Taft received in Warren county 2,092 votes, while Bryan and Kern were given but 1,017.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF WARRICK COUNTY

By Philip Lutz, Jr.

THE history of the Democracy of Warrick County centers itself largely about the activities of certain prominent Democratic families, the members of which have been as true to the principles of the party and as loyal to its welfare as the needle of the compass has been in pointing the direction to the North Pole. Now and then, some differences would arise between members of the party resulting from ambitions for party honor or public office, but it can hardly be said that the party harmony or party success has ever been endangered by any factional differences. The Democracy has no factions such as have ruined the organization in many counties of the State. Warrick county Democrats have been bitter partisans in past years and today they stand loyal to the cause of the party, which they revere and love. Warrick county's democracy has never been questioned and she can always be counted on for a good round Democratic majority for the State and district ticket in every election.

The management of the party has been good. For many years past, nominations have been made for the county offices by means of the township unit, the old Democratic doctrine of home rule, and by this system which has always been fair to the candidates, nominations have always been made according to the dictates of party will. No machine rules the party. The party has no machine rules the party. The party has no machine. The men who have led the party to battle have been the chosen leaders of the party, and the cry of "boss" and "bossism" and "machine" and "ring rule" is not known in the county. So much cannot be said for the Republican party.

By a poll of the county, Democracy has the best of it by a narrow margin. But the margin is so small that for many years past, excepting the years of the Bull Moose divergency, every campaign has been a hot contest. One of the main reasons for this is easily apparent when mention is made of Boonville as the home of James A. Hemenway, former United States Senator, and a Republican leader in the nation. Senator Hemenway belongs to the old school of politicians, who hobnobbed with Mark Hanna, and who knows, therefore, how to do things and does them. In Boonville he is regarded as a good citizen, cares a great deal for his home town, loves the people, and has built up a host of friends. Not only this, but he remembered his friends and his friends remembered him, especially on election day, and this fact always cut deep when the influence of Hemenway was against Democracy. He began his career as a prosecutor, then was honored by election to Congress for six terms, and was then elevated to the United States Senate for four years. Some believe Senator Hemenway has even bigger things in waiting, but the Senator says he is done for public office, and devotes the greater part of his time to his private affairs, which are now extensive.

The Democrats are fortunate in having as their party organ The Boonville Enquirer, a weekly, edited by that staunch and fearless democratic war horse, Senator G. H. Hazen. The motto, "Democratic at All Times," stands at the masthead of the Enquirer, and indicates the true and pronounced party organ that Senator Hazen is editing. In his life as editor, Senator Hazen has seen the party meet many obstacles tending to hinder party progress, but the Enquirer has faithfully upheld the party with honor and fidelity. In the days when the shrewd Republican politicians brought the latest political methods of Washington and the East to work them upon the innocents of this section, none were better able to cope with the party problems than the fearless editor of the Enquirer.

The Enquirer began its existence in Newburg, Warrick county, where it was known as the Tribune, but it was moved to Boonville in 1857. At first it was owned by a stock company. Edward White was its editor for a while, but he was soon succeeded in that capacity by Charles Dalrymple, who, after a short time, sold the Tribune to John Fleming, a printer, and Judge J. W. B. Moore. The name of the paper was then changed to the Boonville Enquirer, and Judge Moore assumed editorial control. The paper advocated the principles of the Democratic party thereafter and accordingly prospered. In December, 1865, John Fleming was succeeded by E. L. Crawford, the paper being then conducted by the firm of Moore & Crawford. In January, 1868, Judge Moore being in feeble health, he retired from the editorial management of the Enquirer and sold his interest in it to Thomas H. Martin. Crawford and Martin continued its publication, with Martin as editor. In March, 1870, William Swint purchased the Enquirer from them and assumed full control as editor and publisher. Mr. Swint owned, operated and edited the paper for several years, when G. H. Hazen, then a young lawyer, purchased the stock and has been its owner and manager ever since. The paper is fearless and prosperous and influential and no one has ever dared to begin or even suggest a competitor. It is the only democratic paper in the county, and the counsel of its editorials has assisted in shaping the destinies of the Democracy in Warrick county for the last forty years.

Not only has the Democracy of Warrick county had an able party organ to pilot it through the gloomy as well as the bright days of campaign strife, but the party was fortunate in having wise leaders to direct the party activities. Such old families as the Moores, the Harts, the Roths, the Taylors, the Fullers, the Scales's, the Wilsons, and many others, were pronounced in their belief in the principles of the party of Jefferson and they fought year in and year out for the success of their beloved party.

Some biography of prominent Democrats of the early days is essential in a work of this kind, and one of the early leaders of the party was Judge J. W. B. Moore. Judge Moore was born near Waterloo, Seneca county, New York, on November 5, 1801, but moved to Rockport, Spencer county, in 1827, later moving to Warrick county, where in the course of years he was elected Probate Judge of the county, which he held until elected Clerk of the Warrick Circuit Court. In 1844 he was re-elected Clerk and Recorder for seven years, and it was universally conceded that he was the best Clerk in Southern Indiana. In 1856 he was elected Judge of the Common Pleas District, composed of Warrick and Vanderburgh counties, and served a term of four years. In 1861, when President Lincoln issued his first proclamation for 75,000 men, it created intense excitement in Warrick county. The President was pronounced a tyrant and a usurper, and the call was characterized as unconstitutional and an outrage upon the South. Judge Moore took the side of his country, procured posters to be struck and put up, calling meetings all over the county, at which he appeared, justified the action of the President and urged young men to enlist to maintain the integrity of the Union. In 1862, notwithstanding his age, he enlisted as a private in Captain Pace's Company, First Indiana Cavalry, Governor Baker commanding, and went with his regiment to the Southwest and participated in the battle of Fredericktown. He remained with his regiment nearly two years, but a soldier's life proved too much for his constitution, and he was compelled to accept a discharge, much against his wishes. He was a man of great firmness of will and energy of purpose and strong intellect, and was one of the types that gave courage and strength to the Democracy of the county. He left two sons, Isaac S. and R. D. O. Moore, both prominent in later politics, as will appear in this history, and the latter being the father of Robert S. Moore, a prominent attorney of Boonville, who died following a sudden illness in July, 1915, in the prime of life before he had a full opportunity to give to his community the fruits of his education, training and experience. R. D. O. Moore, the youngest son of Judge J. W. B. Moore, was born in Boonville, February 25, 1848, and his personality in Democratic politics in the county, though less active, is as forceful in counsel today as it was strong in energy ten and thirty years ago. His education was limited to such advantages as were afforded by the local schools of that time, which were comparatively poor, owing, in part, to the unsettled condition caused by the war. However, he spent one year at Asbury University, now DePauw University. In 1869, he commenced the study of law in the office of his brother, Hon. Isaac Moore, one of the ablest lawyers in the State, and in 1872 was admitted to a partnership. In 1878 he was nominated by the democratic primary election for Clerk of Warrick county and was elected. In 1904 he was elected Auditor of Warrick county, winning in the face of pronounced opposition, and he made an obliging and careful officer. Among the minor offices he held was that of Clerk of Boonville in 1869; Town Treasurer from 1871 to 1875, and Town Attorney two or three years. He wielded great influence in the councils of his party.

There is no better democratic blood in the county than that found in the well known Scales family. Hansel M. Scales, Treasurer of Warrick county from 1880 to 1884, deserves special mention as a prominent democratic leader. He was a self-made man. He was born in Lane township, Warrick county, on November 30, 1841. His father, John Scales, was a son of William Scales. William Scales was a very prominent man in his day. He was twice Assessor of Warrick county. In 1843 he was elected Sheriff of the county and held the office two years. He was elected Treasurer in 1847 and was holding that office at the time of his death. He reared a family of sixteen children. Hansel M. Scales was elected Township Assessor two or three times, and later elected Trustee. He is the father of Luther M. Scales, Clerk of the Warrick Circuit Court at this time, and one of the staunchest Democrats of the county. Raymond Scales, a close relative, served as Sheriff of the county from 1906 to 1910, and it has been said that never was there a more popular or obliging man in office. The Scales family also includes another prominent man in the State in the person of Dr. T. D. Scales, of Boonville, State Tax Commissioner. Dr. Scales began his political career as one of the best county chairmen the county ever had and was elevated to the district chairmanship. As an evidence of his wonderful power as an organizer it may be stated that when he assumed work as district chairman, nearly every county and city officer, the Congressman and all legislative officers, were Republicans, and when he laid down his work as District Chairman, every county and city officer, including the Congressman and every legislative officer, was a Democrat. Dr. Scales has long been worthy of a seat in Congress and his friends say that he shall go, as the county is in need of a lawmaker of the caliber of Dr. Scales, whose ability and integrity is of the highest grade.

As a producer of high-grade lawyers, Warrick county has taken a front rank among the counties of the State. Some have gone to Indianapolis, others to Evansville, while still others have gone to faraway States. "Abe" Martin, of the Indianapolis News, in commenting on this fact, once said, "Lots o' good men come from Boonville. None o' them ever stay there." But among the leading lawyers and jurists who felt that Boonville was good enough should be mentioned John Brackenridge Handy, as able a jurist as could be found anywhere in his day. He began the practice of law with George W. Brackenridge, in 1862, but the partnership lasted only a year, Mr. Brackenridge removing to San Antonio, Tex., where he has amassed an immense fortune as a banker and ranchman. In October, 1872, Mr. Handy was nominated by the Democratic party and elected Judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the district comprising the counties of Warrick, Vanderburgh, Gibson and Posey. In 1876 he was nominated by the Democratic party and elected Judge of the Second Judicial District, composed then of Warrick, Spencer, Perry and Crawford counties. He wielded great power as a Democratic leader in his day.

A character who stood out prominently in his day as one of force and influence was John L. Taylor, a lawyer, of Boonville, and a member of a very influential democratic family. He was born August 30, 1850, in Anderson township, Warrick county, and was the eldest son of Peter and Jane Taylor. Following a course at Indiana University he returned home and during the winter of 1875-76 taught the graded school at Lynnville, this county. During the intervals of school hours he read law, and at the close of his school in the spring of 1876 he entered the office of Judge John B. Handy and pursued the study of law with avidity.

It was during this year that he first took an active interest in politics, canvassing the county in company with Hon. Benoni S. Fuller, then a candidate for re-election to Congress, and speaking in the interest of Tilden and the Democratic party. Following this, he was admitted to the bar and formed a partnership with John T. Thompson, with whom he studied law in Judge Handy's office. After practicing about a year the partnership was dissolved, and in October, 1877, Mr. Taylor entered the Cincinnati Law School, which he attended regularly until his graduation on the 20th of May, 1878. He returned home and two weeks afterward was nominated by the Democratic party for representative of Warrick county. He was elected by an overwhelming majority. Returning home, he formed a partnership with W. H. Patterson. He held the office of Clerk of Boonville for two terms. In 1876 he was appointed deputy prosecutor for Warrick County by G. L. Rheinart, but on entering law school in 1877, resigned. On his return home from the legislature in 1879 he was reappointed to the position. In 1880 he was appointed contingent president elector for the First Congressional District by the Democratic State Convention. He served the party as county chairman and gave a good part of his life to the democratic cause. Later in life he fell into habits which led away from the field of active work. His party nominated him Prosecutor, but he was defeated. He died in 1915 at Newburgh, after living several years of retired life.

The Taylor family, as previously mentioned, always has been and is today, one of the main spokes in the wheel of the Warrick county Democracy. The Taylors of today are the same set of brilliant and influential men that the old ones were, such as Robert Taylor and Gurley Taylor, each of whom were honored by their party with county offices and enjoyed a wide range of influence.

Today we have such prominent members as Isham Taylor, who represented the county in the lower house of the State legislature, with credit and honor; Lewis Taylor, his brother; Simon W. Taylor, a member of the State Board of Agriculture; Charles H. Taylor and William Taylor.

The county democracy has furnished one Congressman to the district in the person of the Hon. Benoni S. Fuller. He was born in 1825 in Warrick county. His father was elected Representative from Warrick county in 1842 and held the office for six consecutive years. Benoni S. Fuller began his public life when he was about thirty years old. At this time he was elected Sheriff of the county and served two terms from 1857 to 1861. In 1862 during the beginning of the troubles in the South he was sent to the State Senate. After this he was twice elected to the Lower House, once in 1866 and again in 1868.

The last time he went he was unanimously chosen Democratic Caucus Chairman. In 1872 he was again elected to the State Senate. In 1874 he was chosen Congressman, and again elected two years later. In 1878 he declined renomination. Only one other man before him from Warrick county had ever represented the district in Congress and he was Ratliff Boon. Therefore, the election of Fuller was a remarkable victory for the Democracy, and it had great influence in cementing the party members into a compact organization for future political conquests.

Most of the old Democratic leaders of forty, thirty, yes, twenty years ago, are either gone to the great beyond, or else are retired to private life, and have left the political work for younger minds. There is one exception in the person of Senator G. H. Hazen, the veteran editor of the Boonville Enquirer, who takes great pride in saying that he is a better man and a better Democrat today than he ever has been before. Senator Hazen was born on October 26, 1847. He began reading law with Galen Spencer in Newburg in 1868. He entered the law office of Warren and Mattison, of Evansville, in 1869, and remained with them one year. He entered the law school of the State University in October, 1870, and graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Laws in the class of 1871. In 1880 Mr. Hazen began the practice of law in Boonville, forming a partnership with the Hon. S. B. Hatfield. In 1885 Hatfield withdrew from the firm. Hazen continued the practice until 1893 when he bought the Boonville Enquirer which he has been editing ever since. He held the following positions of trust: Prosecuting Attorney, twelve years; he was Probate Commissioner one term under G. L. Rheinhardt; served seven years as County Attorney for Warrick county and one year as attorney for the town of Boonville. He was the nominee of his party for Prosecuting Attorney of the Second Judicial District in 1888 on the Democratic ticket, but went down in defeat with his party. In 1914 he was nominated for Joint Senator from Warrick, Spencer and Vanderburg counties, and was elected, leading his ticket in every county. Senator Hazen is prominent in State politics.

Another such character and companion is Sidney B. Hatfield, of Boonville, who is still actively engaged in the practice of law. Mr. Hatfield lived in Perry county before removing to Warrick, but when he came he brought all his energy and personality with him. He preferred the free lance work in politics seldom seeking political office, and being defeated when he was honored by his party in making the race for Judge of the Second Judicial District by a narrow margin of six votes. Mr. Hatfield feels the burden of declining years, but his wise counsel and weighty influence still continues in the personalities of his two sons, Frank H., of Evansville, and William S., of Boonville, two of the most prominent lawyers of Southern Indiana.

The history of politics of a generation ago and of today are different in many ways. The leaders of the old days are gone and sons, grandsons and great-grandsons are now carrying on the gospel of Democracy which was begun back in the days of Jefferson more than a hundred years ago. Warrick county had her share of spellbinders, a worthy press, and able leaders, and has left a heritage of great worth to the generation of today. The work is in good hands and includes such persons as the following: Frank Phillips, Sheriff and County Chairman; Ivor Robinson, Ray Cherry, Ex-Auditor; Dr. J. T. Samples, William Samples, Frank Koegel, ex-Deputy Treasurer; Jacob Eifer, Postmaster; Melborn Gebtry, Sheriff; Henry Fulling, Caleb Lindsey, Ora Davis, James R. Wilson, Thomp Owens, Rufus Cherry, Dr. N. Spradley, Gaines Bass, County Auditor; Charles H. Bone, County Assessor; William H. Putler, County Treasurer; Raleigh Perigo, County Recorder; Andrew J. Hopkins, County Superintendent; John W. Wilson, Dr. P. E. Wilson, Henry Whittinghill, Dr. N. M. Spradley, Dr. Walter P. Robinson, Louis Meyer, and many others. In short, the Democracy of Warrick county is on the firing line and let the enemy come, she is prepared.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF WASHINGTON COUNTY

AN act of the Legislature, approved December 21, 1813, permitted the organization of Washington county, and pursuant to that act, on the 17th day of January, 1814, Washington county was created from the territories of Harrison and Clark counties. At the time of its creation it was composed of much of the territory which is now contained in the counties of Jackson, Orange and Scott.

In 1850 and 1851 the chairman of the Democratic Central Committee was Jehu Hungate and the other members composing such committee were D. C. Shanks, O. Thomas, John Hardin, Jr., C. Prow, David Mull, T. D. Weir and Evans Wright.

Other chairmen of the Democratic Central Committee were W. J. Brown, J. A. Cravens, John L. Menaugh, Hamilton S. McRae, Christian L. Paynter, Lewis N. Smith, Samuel B. Voyles, Virgil Hobbs, Andrew B. Davis, Eli W. Menaugh, Samuel H. Mitchell, John R. Sutherland, George M. Morris, William H. Paynter, Warder W. Stevens, Charles T. Schlagal, Charles R. Morris, Lewis C. Smith; present chairman, Harry C. Barnett.

The county, shortly after it became active as a part of the State, began to send to the Legislature representatives the greater part of whom were Democrats. The following list are Democrats who were members of the lower branch of the Legislature: Samuel Milroy, Alexander Little, Marston G. Clark, Noah Wright, Robert McIntire, Abraham Sargent, John DePauw, John Kingsbury, Ezekial D. Logan, Rodolphus Scoonover, Henry C. Monroe, Woodbridge Parker, Gustavus Clark, Levi P. Lockhart, Valentine Baker, John L. Morrison, William Shanks, George May, John Kelly, Cyrus L. Dunham, Thomas Green, James A. Cravens, William Thompson, John L. Menaugh, James T. Campbell, Henry Paynter, John Hartley, John A. Bowman, William Hancock, Christian Prow, Horace Heffron, Jamison Lee, Aaron L. Hardin, John Lemon, Erasmus W. Shanks, Frederic W. Matthis, John C. Lawler, John H. Oatley, James Rudder, Alfred B. Collins, Samuel H. Mitchell, William E. Patton, Aaron A. Cravens, Asa Elliott, Zach M. Scifres, Robert C. Brown, Emmet C. Mitchell, and the present representative is John Ryan.

In the Senate the county has been represented by the following resident Senators: John DePauw, Marston G. Clark, Samuel Milroy, Ezekial D. Logan, Henry W. Hackett, William Shanks, John I. Morrison, James A. Cravens, Horace Heffron, John A. Bowman, Samuel B. Voyles, Erasmus Shanks, Jephth H. Garriott, John C. Lawler and William E. Patton; Wm. A. Arnold, Senator-elect.

James A. Cravens was sent from this county as a representative in Congress for two terms, during which time he was an associate of Vories and Hendricks.

On two different occasions Washington county has furnished the candidate for Lieutenant-Governor for the State of Indiana, being John C. Lawler and Warder W. Stevens. At the present time one of the State offices is filled by a resident of Washington county, being Hon. Milton B. Hotel of the Appellate bench.

Among the prominent Democrats of the earlier period we find Isaac Blackford and John I. Morrison. Blackford was a Judge of the Supreme Court for thirty-five years. John I. Morrison was Treasurer of State and was one of the foremost educators of the time. He was the founder of Morrison academy at Salem, Ind., which bore a national reputation and where many noted scholars sought an education. He was the tutor of such scholars as John Hay, Secretary of the Interior; Newton Booth, who was elected Senator from California to the United States Senate, and later made Governor of the State of California.

The first Democratic newspaper published in the county began about January 1, 1827, and was known as the Annotator. It was edited by John Allen until 1829, when William Tannehill became the owner and it was changed to the Salem Literary Register, a literary paper. In November, 1847, Morrison and Taylor founded the Washington Democrat and sold it in 1849 to Williams and Owens. T. W. Jordan was editor for a few issues, then Williams became the sole owner. In 1852 Horace Heffron became associated with Williams as joint editor and remained so until after the presidential election. Z. S. Garriott then became joint editor and in 1857 he became the proprietor and editor and sold the paper to Levi D. Maxwell, who later disposed of it to Horace Heffron, and Thomas Telle became publisher. In 1861 G. Y. Johnson took charge of the paper because of army service of the owners and issued the paper under the name of Democratic Banner of Liberty.

The title of Washington Democrat was resumed in 1862, when O. T. Kennedy associated himself with Heffron as editor and publisher. In 1863 George Fultz and William P. Green became the proprietors and in 1872 Stevens and Cravens became the owners, and in 1874 Cravens disposed of his interest to Warder W. Stevens, who then became the sole owner, and after which time the paper has been known as the Salem Democrat. In 1883 Stevens sold the paper to Dr. R. J. Wilson, who for eight years was the sole owner and editor of the Salem Democrat, known as the Democratic organ of the county. After successfully running the paper during that period he disposed of the same to David A. Jennings, who ran it for six years. The paper was then bought by Menough brothers, who were the publishers and editors for more than ten years, during which time the circulation continued to increase until it carried the principles of Democracy into nearly every household of the county.

On December 21, 1898, Henry E. Smith and Charles R. Morris, two of the hustling young Democrats of the county, purchased the paper with Morris as editor and Smith as business manager. The paper is still in the hands of Smith and Morris, being the Democratic organ of Washington county and is recognized as one of the leading Democratic newspapers of southern Indiana.

Washington county has always given a Democratic majority for the presidential electors, and since 1844, with but one or two exceptions, has filled the county offices with Democrats. Close organization was a rule back in the forties and fifties, with each township having a Democratic chairman and committee, who had frequent meetings to further Democracy, hence the Democratic majorities in the county.

In 1844 Polk and Dallas received a majority of 511.

In 1848 Cass and Butler received a majority of 495.

In 1852 Pierce and King received a majority of 509.

In 1856 Buchanan and Breckinridge received a majority of 656.

In 1860 Douglas and Johnson received a majority of 531.

In 1864 McClellan and Pendleton received a majority of 557.

In 1868 Seymour and Blair received a majority of 388.

In 1876 Tilden and Hendricks received a majority of 716.

In 1880 Hancock and English received a majority of 811.

In 1888 Cleveland and Thurman received a majority of 539.

In 1892 Cleveland and Stevenson received a majority of 206.

In 1896 Bryan and Sewall received a majority of 232.

In 1900 Bryan and Stevenson received a majority of 515.

In 1904 Parker and Davis received a majority of 113.

In 1908 Bryan and Kern received a majority of 505.

In 1912 Wilson and Marshall received a majority of 284.

In 1916 Wilson and Marshall received a majority of 543.

At the present time the county offices are all filled with Democrats. William H. Paynter is Judge of the Forty-second Judicial Circuit and Thomas P. Masterson is Prosecuting Attorney for the same district. William A. Arnold is Clerk of the Circuit Court; Eli E. Batt, Auditor; Otto C. Zink, Treasurer; Thomas J. Walker, Recorder; Harry C. Barnett, Sheriff; Dr. James F. Kelley, Coroner; John C. Prow, Surveyor; William B. Wright, James S. Hall and James B. Brown, County Commissioners.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF WAYNE COUNTY

By Joshua H. Allen

WAYNE COUNTY lies on the eastern boundary line of Indiana, directly east of Indianapolis, the State capital.

Wayne county was born in the early dawn of the last century and was settled by a people whose love of peace and the principles of arbitration was equaled only by their aversion to war and human slavery, i. e., by so-called Quakers—members of the religious Society of Friends. The name of the county, however, was chosen in honor of that fearless and desperate Indian fighter known in history as General Wayne, but then famous as "Mad Anthony," who had so recently succeeded General St. Clair in command of the United States forces and precipitated the decisive battles which resulted in the Greenville Treaty.

The articles of peace were signed by General Wayne and the Indians of the Northwest Territory, August 3, 1795. Indiana Territory was created pursuant to the act of Congress of May 7, 1800, dividing the Northwest Territory, and Wayne county was formed in 1810 from part of Dearborn, the county seat of which was at Lawrenceburg. It, with Clark and Knox, then constituted the single trio of counties in the Territory.

The discovery of the White Water valley, that runs north and south through the eastern part of the county, has been credited to Judge Peter Fleming and Joseph Wasson, a revolutionary soldier, who accompanied the former from Kentucky in 1804, and the first settlement in the valley was made in 1805 by George Holman, Richard Rue and Thomas McCoy.

Wayne county has had three county seats. The first was at a place called Salsbury, which was located about midway between the now city of Richmond and the town of Centerville. The town of Salsbury was once the largest town in the county, but it is now extinct and the land on which it was located is under cultivation. In 1817 the county seat was removed to Centerville. There it remained until 1873, when the county seat was removed to Richmond, where the county government is located in one of the most beautiful, commodious and well-built court houses of any in the State of Indiana.

With the removal of the court house from Salsbury to Centerville began the decadence of Salsbury, which latter now has only a place in memory, where it may be worthy of note to relate that at just this time, August 4, 1823, there was born there the most distinguished personage in the history of the State. This was the Hon. Oliver P. Morton, whose name will be associated with the leaders of the United States Senate, but whose chief distinction was attained as Indiana's war governor. Oliver Hazard Perry Throck Morton (for thus the name stands in the family register) was the fourth child of James Throckmorton and Sarah.

Throckmorton is an old English name. In the ship with Roger Williams came John Throckmorton, who settled and lived in Providence, in the house next to Roger Williams, but his sons, John Throckmorton, Jr., and Job, went to New Jersey, where they are recorded among its earliest settlers. It is not known why the family name was changed, but a sufficient reason is found in the fact that Morton is more convenient.

During the first ten years of Mr. Morton's adult life he was a Democrat. On the day of the presidential election a young man of large frame with high forehead, dark eyes and with clothes that fitted him none too well, rode into Centerville upon a gray horse bespattered with mud. It was "Ob" Morton, then a student at Miami University, who had come home from Oxford, twenty-eight miles away, to cast his first vote for James K. Polk, the candidate of the Democratic party. For ten years after that he continued to act with the Democracy, but he was among those who feared the dangerous tendencies toward slavery. And he left the Democracy, but did not then join another party. The supporters of the Free Soil movement, who in most of the Northern States now bore the name of Republicans, had as yet no national organization. Oliver P. Morton was elected a delegate from Wayne county to the preliminary convention held in Pittsburgh, so that he was present at the birth of the Republican party.

The fact that Richmond was one of the earliest settled communities in Indiana, was on the National road and on the only railroad that connected Indianapolis with the east, together with the character of her citizens, made her the center of many stirring political events in the early days. Politics in this locality were always, as they are now, very exciting. The county in its early history was strongly Whig. The most exciting incident of the ante-bellum days in this vicinity occurred in the fall of 1844. It was on the first Saturday in October, 1844, that Henry Clay, the candidate for President on the Whig ticket, arrived in Richmond on his way from Dayton, Ohio, to Indianapolis, he then being on a speech-making tour in his own behalf. His appearance here was known ahead of time and the town was the scene of a wonderful multitude of people, greater than ever before in its history. The Abolitionists had determined to petition him for an interview relative to the freeing of his slaves. A petition with over 2,000 names had been prepared and had been signed by the committee having it in charge.

Excitement ran high and threats of violence were made against any man who would insult Henry Clay by offering him such a petition, for so the Whigs called the action. The privilege to privately present their petition was denied the Abolitionists, it not being supposed they would have the courage to do it openly. The speaking occurred on North Eighth street, between A and B streets, from a temporary stand on the west side of the street. Upon the meeting being called to order the chairman asked that anyone having petitions to present to Mr. Clay would please bring them forward. This was done to force the Abolitionists either to back down or else incur the anger of the hostile crowd of bitter partisans. It was also made known that any petition would be replied to by Mr. Clay at that time. When this announcement was made the Abolitionists, through Hiram Mendenhall, a fearless and stalwart farmer, sent their petition to the stand. When he started with it cries of "Mob him," "Stab him," "Kill him," arose from the crowd, the vast majority of whom were Clay partisans. Seeing the seriousness of the occasion, Clay stepped to the edge of the platform and imperturbed the crowd not to resort to violence. It is said that only his plea saved Mendenhall's life. The petition was handed to the chairman (Clay refusing to touch it) and was read by him. Then Clay made answer. For over an hour he poured down upon the heads of the Abolitionists in general and the petitioners in particular a storm of eloquent sarcasm, ridicule and argument such as was probably never heard in Richmond before or since, because it was only such as Henry Clay could give. He even became abusive and finished by telling the petitioners to "Go home; go home and mind your own business." Of course the speech was a strong one in the eyes of the crowd, but it is said that this very same Richmond speech defeated Clay and elected Polk.

The Democracy of Wayne county had been dependent upon outside newspapers for many years for the source of their political information. Possibly one of the strongest Democratic newspapers the county has ever had was the Jeffersonian, a newspaper established in Richmond in 1836 by a Democratic association called the "Hickory Club." Samuel E. Perkins, afterwards a judge of the Supreme Court of Indiana, and a Mr. Talcott, a young lawyer, were its editors. It was bought in 1837 by Lynde Elliott. It ceased to appear in 1839, but Mr. Perkins revived the paper in 1840. The same year James Elder took charge and it was continued until 1864.

In 1880 The Democrat was published by William Thistlewaite as a campaign paper, but was suspended after the election. In January, 1881, it was revived by Mr. Elder, who published it as The Richmond Democrat for ten years. Milton C. Benham was editor and proprietor of it for a time. He afterwards sold it in 1891 to Benjamin F. Wissler and George W. Mickel. Mr. Mickel afterwards retired and it was operated in the campaign of 1896 as the Daily Sun. Mr. Wissler sold out in 1907 to the Palladium and retired from newspaper work. Since that time the Democracy of Wayne county has not had a local newspaper.

In passing it might be said for Milton C. Benham and Benjamin F. Wissler that they are both residents of Wayne county and stand high in the councils of the Democratic party. In all local conventions where Milton C. Benham is able to attend the privilege is always accorded to him with the greatest of acclaim to make the formal motion that the rooster in the attitude of crowing shall be the emblem of the party on the ticket at the election.

Wayne county has never been a fertile field for the Democrat seeking to hold county office. The exceptions to the rule have been few, Andrew F. Scott, who was clerk of the county in 1845, being one of the first to break into public office. He was followed by an unbroken line of Republican clerks until in 1914 the genial and affable son of the Emerald Isle, Michael W. Kelly, was elected to the office. Charles Marlatt was elected as a Democrat in 1890 to the sheriff's office and at the same time John M. Lontz was elected auditor of Wayne county. This county was represented in Congress for one term by W. S. Holman, the "watch-dog of the treasury," for two years. He and Finley H. Gray have been the only Democrats to represent this county in Congress.

Henry U. Johnson, who was congressman from the Sixth District from 1891 to 1899, was elected as a Republican, but disagreed with the Republican party and the McKinley administration with reference to their foreign policy. He retired from office at the end of his term and has identified himself with the Democratic party since that time. At the Democratic convention in Richmond in 1910 for the nomination of congressman he was sought after by many Democrats to receive the nomination and would no doubt have received the nomination if he had not discouraged his friends by giving them to understand that even though he might be nominated he would refuse to accept it.

Finley H. Gray was nominated and was elected for three successive terms. He was defeated in 1916 by Judge Comstock by a small majority, and at the death of Judge Comstock soon after the beginning of his term Mr. Gray was again a candidate. Henry U. Johnson was chairman of the convention and in his keynote speech, in taking up the questions of the war which had so recently been thrust upon us, he made an appeal to the patriotism of our citizenship that swept the convention with a wave that made them feel the great debt we owe to our forefathers for the great government we now enjoy and to appreciate the burdens we now must carry in order that free government may endure, and that the military despotism of old world dominion must now once for all be ended and wiped from the face of the earth. At the end of his address the convention stood ready to nominate him for Congress, but his refusal to accept even if nominated again discouraged his friends and the nomination afterward fell to Finley H. Gray, who was defeated at the special election.

No story of the Democracy of Wayne county would be complete without a reference to the life of the Hon. Thomas J. Study, who died in the summer of 1914. At the time he was the Democratic nominee for judge of the Wayne circuit court and he was engaged in an active campaign for the election when he was stricken by an illness that proved fatal. In his youth he was a Republican, but changed early to be a Democrat. He was judge of the Wayne circuit court by appointment in 1896 for a short time. He was one of Wayne county's best lawyers, he was honest and courageous and was always willing to stand up and be counted in defense of any position that he might assume. The history of Wayne county Democracy, as far as holding local offices is concerned, is one that is not pleasant to think about. The officeholders have been few and far between. Successive defeats have not in any sense broken the spirit of the party in the county. They always have another fight in them. They might be likened to the Kentucky patriot in the Spanish-American war, who was about to be shot at a court-martial. He was commanded to turn his back to the firing squad and kneel, to which he replied that a Kentuckian never turns his back upon an enemy and kneels only to his God. Just so the Democracy of Wayne county may be defeated, but its spirit never was and never will be broken so long as the Democratic party remains the potent tool for good that the present day and the past decade have proven it to be.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF WELLS COUNTY

AN EARLY history of Wells county tells us that Colonel John Vawter, of Jennings county, chairman of the committee on new counties in the House of Representatives of the State, introduced a bill, which passed and was approved February 7, 1835, which provided for the laying out of the counties of Wells, Jay, Dekalb, Steuben, Whitley, Kosciusko, Fulton, Marshall, Starke, Pulaski, Jasper, Newton and Porter.

Wells county was named in honor of Captain William H. Wells, who was killed by the Indians at Chicago. An act was passed and approved February 2, 1837, to organize the county. David Bennett was appointed sheriff by the Legislature to notify the electors to meet at the house of Robert C. Bennett to elect three commissioners. The first election for commissioners was held in June, 1837, and Solomon Johnson, James Scott and R. C. Bennett were elected. The board met at the home of R. C. Bennett on July 21, 1837, in accordance with the above recited act and produced their certificates to the sheriff, showing they had been duly elected. David Bennett produced his commission as sheriff, signed by Governor Noble. Bowen Hale also produced a similar document appointing him clerk of Wells county. Both were certified to and the board organized by electing Solomon Johnson president.

The first order of the first board of commissioners of Wells county was "That W. H. Parmelee be appointed agent of the 3 per cent. fund donated to the county by the State for roads and bridges." Second, "Adnah Hall be appointed treasurer of Wells county; bond $300." Third, "David Whitman be appointed assessor and collector of revenue."

While the county is now "dry as a bone" and has been since 1906, John Casebeer was the first surveyor for the county.

The first court was organized in 1837 with Hon. C. W. Ewing as judge; Bowen Hale, clerk; Isaac Covert, sheriff; Thomas Johnson, prosecuting attorney. There was no business, and the court adjourned.

Wells county contains about 372 sections of land, the Wabash river traversing the county from east to west. The Salamonie runs through the southwest part of the county.

The first paper published in the county was the Republican Bugle, a democratic paper, regardless of its name, the Republican party not having been born at that date, 1847. In 1849 the Banner was launched and still remains in the newspaper field, publishing both daily and weekly. The Banner was started by S. G. Upton and L. S. Grove, and has since been edited by T. J. McDowell, George McDowell, James G. Smith, D. J. Callen, T. B. Gutelius, J. H. Smith, Theo. Horton & Co., J. G. Smith, Wm. J. Craig, E. A. K. Hackett, E. Y. Sturgis, P. A. Allen, John H. Ormsby, Geo. L. Saunders, Cecil E. Elliott, and at present by Geo. L. Saunders, he having returned to Bluffton in 1913. The Bluffton Chronicle, the other remaining paper in Bluffton, was established in 1855, and was known as the People's Press. D. H. Swaim is the present publisher and also issues the Evening News, a daily paper, neutral in politics.

Wells county has been Democratic since organization, and only in a very few instances have the Republicans succeeded in getting a man in office. Their greatest success was in 1898, when they made a determined campaign on an "open-the-books" platform. They succeeded in electing two commissioners, the treasurer and clerk. They opened the books and found them correct almost to a cent—simply some little irregularities. Since that campaign just one man on the Republican ticket has succeeded in being elected to office, Mr. O. D. Garrett being elected county auditor in 1908. The city of Bluffton is also safely Democratic.

The city and county have furnished some notable men to the party in the State's existence, and at this date feels proud of the record made and being made by Frank C. Dailey, who as District Attorney, so successfully conducted the cases against the Terre Haute election fraudists, thus gaining fame as a lawyer throughout the United States. His father, Joseph C. Dailey, served the State on the supreme bench. In the 1917 session of the Legislature we have the Hon. Abram Simmons, who has been considered one of the leaders in that body; especially has he been active in state-wide prohibition, woman suffrage and constitutional convention. The present county judge, the Hon. W. H. Eichhorn, has established a reputation throughout the State as a jurist, lawyer and orator that does his county proud. W. A. Kunkel, our present district chairman, has been in the same office for three terms, his work has been of the best, and his counsel for the state committee is valuable. Mr. Kunkel has long been in the Democratic politics of the county.

The present Democratic chairman is the Hon. A. M. Hamilton, while the present county officials are: Abram Simmons, joint state senator for the counties of Adams, Blackford and Wells; John A. Bonjam, joint representative for the counties of Blackford and Wells; W. H. Eichhorn, judge for the counties of Blackford and Wells; Orville A. Pursley, prosecutor for the counties of Blackford and Wells; Herman F. Lesh, clerk of the court; O. E. Lesh, treasurer; C. T. Kain, auditor; D. T.

Brinneman, recorder; J. A. Johnston, sheriff; T. C. Guldin, surveyor; A. R. Huyette, county superintendent of schools; H. Thoma, coroner; John A. Prough, William A. Redding and Henry Swaim, commissioners, and Harry Grant, county agent, all Democrats. B. A. Batson, an ex-chairman, and a Democrat, is the present postmaster.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF WHITE COUNTY

By James P. Simons

WHITE COUNTY was organized in 1834 in pursuance of an Act of the Legislature of 1834, it having been a part of Carroll county prior to that date. As the Tippecanoe river flows through the county and also forms part of the east boundary line, it was given the name of White county, in honor of Major Isaac White, who was killed at the battle of Tippecanoe in 1811. The county occupies a unique position in that the Tippecanoe river here forms the boundary line between what was formerly the great timber region of the country, reaching eastward to the Allegheny mountains, and the Grand Prairie region, stretching westward to the Rockies. Most of the county lies in the Prairie region, being a part of the following tract ceded to the government by the Pottawatomies in a treaty concluded at St. Mary's, October 2, 1818:

"Beginning at the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and running up the same to a point twenty-five miles in a direct line from the Wabash river, thence on a line as nearly parallel to the general course of the Wabash river as practicable to a point on the Vermilion river twenty-five miles from the Wabash river, thence down the Vermilion river to its mouth and thence up the Wabash river to the place of beginning."

The earliest record of a division on political lines was in the November election, 1832, when that portion of White county west of the Tippecanoe river still formed a part of Carroll county. In this election twenty-three votes were cast, eighteen votes for the Whig electors and five for the Democratic. It was several years after the organization of the county before political party organizations cut much figure, men being selected to local offices without regard to politics. As one old settler puts it, "The settlers would meet at a house or barn raising, a husking bee or a log rolling and discuss possible candidates in a casual way, the matter being taken up at the next gathering of the kind until finally a ticket was made up; and frequently no opposition ticket was named."

However, in presidential years party lines were more closely drawn. The vote of the county in all these years was as follows:

| Years. | Democrat. | Whig. | Free Soil. |
|------------|-----------|-------|------------|
| 1836..... | 106 | 109 | |
| 1840..... | No. Rec. | | |

*American, 42. †Breckinridge Dem., 67. ‡Progressive, 822.

From this table it is seen that White county has always been very close politically, with the Democrats seeming to have a little the better of the votes down to 1860. In the six presidential elections between 1856 and 1884 the Republicans carried the county by small pluralities. Then the Democrats were in the majority in four elections and the Republicans again in three. In the campaign of 1912 it appears that both parties lost votes to the Progressives, but the Democrats carried the county by a plurality of 446. However, by 1914 many of the Progressives had returned to the Republican fold and that party had a plurality of five on Secretary of State; but United States Senator Benjamin F. Shively, who headed the State Democratic ticket, carried the county by a plurality of 84. In this election the Democrats also elected the County Treasurer, Surveyor, Coroner and two Commissioners.

In the fifty-four years since 1860 Democrats have occupied the various county offices as follows:

Clerk—Daniel D. Dale, 1867 to 1875; Samuel P. Cowger, 1879 to 1887; Jones Brearley, 1887 to 1895; Samuel L. Callaway, 1899 to 1907, and Wallace Atkins, 1907 to 1911.

Auditor—David M. Carson, 1885 to 1893; Morris J. Holtzman, 1893 to 1901, and Albert G. Fisher, 1909 to date.

Treasurer—Joseph Rothrock, 1862 to 1866; same again, 1868 to 1872; Madison T. Didlake, 1880 to 1884; Robert R. Breckenridge, 1884 to 1888; Hiram A. B. Moorhous, 1888 to 1892; Julius W. Paul, 1892 to 1894; James C. Stockton, 1898 to 1902; William F. Brucker, 1902 to 1904, and Otto C. Middlestadt, 1912 to date.

Recorder—John S. Hurtt, 1862 to 1866; James

P. Simons, 1883 to 1891; Bernard A. Vogel, 1891 to 1895; Charles H. Kleist, 1903 to 1911.

Sheriff—Matthew Henderson, 1860 to 1864; same again, 1866 to 1870; William E. Saunderson, 1870 to 1874; Joseph W. Stewart, 1882 to 1886; James P. Gwin, 1888 to 1892; Robert F. Dobbins, 1892 to 1894; John W. Warner, 1898 to 1902; George W. Stephens, 1902 to 1906; James H. McCully, 1906 to 1908; Thomas F. Downey, 1913 to 1915.

Judge of White Circuit Court—Alfred W. Reynolds, 1888 to 1894.

Prior to 1860 a number of Democrats prominent in the early history of the county had filled various local offices, among these being Hon. David Turpie, Judge of the Common Pleas Court, who resigned his office in 1854 after holding court but one term; Thomas M. Thompson, Ransom McConahay, Joseph D. Cowden, Hugh B. Logan, Jonathan Harbolt, who was known as "The Honest Squire;" James C. Reynolds, Michael A. Berkey, Elisha Warden, James K. Wilson, George Cullen, Andrew Hanna, Sothy K. Timmons and Thomas Downey, Sr.

The present Democratic county officers are: Albert G. Fisher, Auditor; Otto C. Middlestadt, Treasurer; Paul Ward, Surveyor; Dr. Homer B. Gable, Coroner; Andrew F. Nagle and Marshall Personett, Commissioners, and Henry J. Reid, County Superintendent of Schools.

The following White county Democrats have been elected to legislative offices: Rowland Hughes, David Turpie, Thomas Davis, Robert Davis, John Green Timmons, Charles J. Murphy and Patrick Hays to the Legislature; Emory B. Sellers and Thomas W. O'Connor to the State Senate; Dr. William S. Haymond to Congress, and Hon. David Turpie to the United States Senate. Of these Messrs. Murphy, Hays, Sellers and O'Connor are still residents of the county. Mr. Murphy has become prominent in State politics, has been the Tenth district representative on the State Central Committee for some years, and is at present (1915) a member of the Public Service Commission. Mr. Sellers, after the expiration of his senatorial term, was appointed United States District Attorney by President Cleveland and after that returned to the practice of law in Monticello. Mr. O'Connor is president of the Monticello National Bank and in 1914 was a prominent candidate before the Democratic State convention for Treasurer.

By far the most prominent Democrat ever residing in White county was Hon. David Turpie, late United States Senator from Indiana. Mr. Turpie came to Monticello in 1849 and in his autobiography, "Sketches of My Own Times," published in 1903, he has added very materially to the published history of White and adjoining counties. He early engaged actively in politics, being elected to the Legislature in 1852. He was not a candidate in 1854, when the high tide of Know-Nothingism swept Indiana Democracy from power, but engaged actively in the campaign of 1856, which resulted in the overthrow of this un-American cult and the triumphant election of Ashbel P. Willard as Governor. In 1858 Mr. Turpie was again elected to the Legislature, and in 1860 was nominated for Lieutenant-Governor on the ticket headed by Thomas A. Hendricks. In this campaign he made an extended joint canvass with Oliver P. Morton, Republican candidate for the same office. In 1862 Mr. Turpie was nominated for Congress in his district and held a series of joint debates with his Republican opponent, Hon. Schuyler Colfax. In 1863 he was elected to the United States Senate to fill out the unexpired term of Senator Bright. In 1864 Mr. Turpie, still a resident of Monticello, enjoyed the unique distinction of being nominated for two important offices. He was again nominated for Lieutenant-Governor on the ticket headed by Hon. Joseph E. McDonald, and while making his canvass for that office was again nominated for Congress by the Democrats of his district. He decided to again try conclusions with Mr. Colfax and resigned from the State ticket, his place being filled by General Mahlon D. Manson. Mr. Colfax was re-elected. Still again, in 1866, was Mr. Turpie nominated, and made a third joint canvass of the district with Mr. Colfax, then Speaker of the House of Representatives, only to again go down in defeat. These three successive nominations as the candidate of the minority party and against the same successful competitor, not only illustrates the high esteem in which Mr. Turpie was held by the Democrats of his district, but it is probably unique in the political history of the State. Some time after this Mr. Turpie removed to Indianapolis, where, in 1874, he was again elected to the Legislature; and later, in 1887, he was again elected to the United States Senate, serving two full terms; but this later career belongs more properly to the history of the Democracy of the State. White county and Monticello Democrats have always been proud of the fact that for nearly a quarter of a century they were privileged to claim this distinguished Democrat as one of their number.

The history of White county Democracy cannot be written without a brief reference to a few Democrats of the Jacksonian type who figured in its early history. Among these were P. M. Kent of Brookston, George W. Chamberlain and Benjamin Reynolds of Chalmers, Theodore J. Davis and Harrison S. Stine of Jackson, Isaac and James C. Reynolds, Rowland Hughes and Daniel D. Dale of Monticello. Of these Mr. Dale was probably the best organizer and the most tireless political worker the county ever had. He died in 1885. All these and many others served the county in the capacity of county chairman in the earlier years. Those serving as chairman since 1880, so far as their names could be ascertained, were as follows: William E. Uhl, Dr. M. T. Didlake, R. R. Breckenridge, A. S. Bordner, D. M. Carson, J. P. Simons, M. J. Holtzman, A. D. Gow, L. T. Kent, G. F. Marvin, Samuel L. Calloway, A. A. Anheier and W. F. Brucker. During the presidential campaigns of 1876, 1880, 1884 and 1888 much stress was laid on large "rallies," pole raisings, marching clubs and torchlight processions, and many large and enthusiastic gatherings of these various kinds were held. Since 1892, however, more attention has been given to thorough organization, getting an accurate poll and getting out the vote on election day.

The first newspaper in White county was called the Prairie Chieftain, founded in 1849 by John K. Lovejoy and Abram V. Reed. The Chieftain died in 1854 for lack of sustenance. It was followed shortly by the Register, Benjamin F. Tilden editor, and the Political Frame, R. W. Sill editor, but both these soon joined the Chieftain in the happy hunting grounds, to be succeeded by the White County Jacksonian in 1857. The editor, Mr. John H. Scott, was a practical newspaper man and the Jacksonian grew rapidly in circulation and influence. In 1858 Mr. Scott died and the plant was sold to Mr. James W. McEwen, who changed the name to the White County Democrat. Some years later the name was changed to The Constitutionalist and its publication was continued under the editorship of Mr. McEwen, A. J. Kitt, W. B. Hoover and Jasper Keys until the plant was destroyed by fire in 1880, when it suspended for a short time, to be succeeded by the Monticello Times, Cleveland J. Reynolds editor. This paper ceased publication in January, 1882, and for a few months the party was without a paper. In June, 1882, Harry P. Owens and W. E. Uhl, two young Monticello lawyers, resurrected the paper and again named it the White County Democrat, and under this name the paper still continues. Those having editorial charge since that time are W. S. Hartman, 1883-4; A. D. Hartman, 1884-6; John A. Rothrock, 1886 to 1894; James P. Simons, 1894 to 1914, when he sold his interest to Mr. C. F. Foster, who is the present editor (1915). Ever since its final resurrection in 1882 the Democrat has been under able and aggressive editorial management, enjoying the confidence of a large list of readers and taking rank as one of the cleanest and best party papers in northern Indiana, and the publishers have always had reason to take a pardonable pride in the belief that to the aggressiveness and fairness of the Democrat could be attributed much of the local success of the party, sometimes under very adverse circumstances.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF WHITLEY COUNTY

BESIDES being distinguished among the counties of Indiana for its consistently good Democratic behavior, Whitley county has the honor of having furnished a candidate for governor who wrested the state from the control of Republicans, where it had remained for a number of years. This in the person of Thomas Riley Marshall, who also has the distinction of being twice elected vice-president of the United States, and serving as presiding officer of the senate through the troublous times of the war with Germany.

Whitley was organized as a county in 1839, and it has very rarely returned anything but Democratic majorities, although these majorities have been usually nothing large enough to brag about, and frequently have been so small as to cause a great anxiety pending the completion of official counts and tabulations.

Although William Henry Harrison carried the county against Van Buren in 1840, when all Indiana was exerting herself in behalf of her distinguished citizen, the Harrison majority was only 7, the vote being 98 to 91. That was the only Whig majority ever given by the party in a presidential election, and up to now (1918) the only Republican majority ever given in a presidential election was to Roosevelt, in 1904, when he carried the county by 78.

At least one historian has figured that the average majority of the Republican successes was 42. Only twice in the first ninety years in the history of Whitley county did the Republicans elect their entire county ticket, but on several occasions in purely local elections where no national candidates were being voted for, and the office of governor was not being filled, some scattering Republicans were placed in office. When this happened it was always the result of extreme personal popularity or vastly superior ability over the opposing candidate.

This notwithstanding the fact that Democratic majorities have been exceedingly small, excepting in one instance which all writers of county history have seen fit to mention as standing out especially prominent. That was in 1870, when Col. I. B. McDonald, Democratic candidate for representative, was elected over Ambrose M. Trumble, Republican. McDonald carried every precinct in the county, a thing which the records show was never done before or since, and his majority was 831. The small Republican majority of 1840 of only 7 which was given to William Henry Harrison, was reversed into a majority of 3 for James K. Polk over Henry Clay in 1844, Polk receiving 219 votes and Clay 216. The vote of the county had increased as shown by the returns from 189 to 435 in the four years. Where the majority was so very small it would not be unreasonable to see the general results changed from year to year, but the Democrats held their lead.

In 1848 Cass, the Democratic presidential nominee, received 355 votes, to 318 for Taylor, the Democratic majority having increased to 37. Considering the newness of the territory, the increase in population and voting strength was fairly rapid, and in 1852 Pierce was given 568 votes, against 497 for Scott, another Democratic majority of 71.

The bitterness and intense interest attending the election of 1856, because of the slavery issue, had little, or, in fact, no effect on the voting in Whitley county, party lines being drawn as on ordinary occasions. Buchanan, the Democratic nominee, received 851 and Fremont 797, the Democratic lead being reduced to 54, or a loss of 17 in four years.

Whitley did not divide her vote on any side issues in the campaign of 1860 and only cast 3 votes for Breckinridge, who represented what was known as the southern wing of the Democratic party. Douglas was recognized as the regular Democratic nominee and received 1,133 votes, against 1,067 for Lincoln. In that year there were 2,203 votes cast in the county, a considerable increase over four years before and raising the Democratic majority from 54 to 66. From that time on the Democratic majorities continued to grow and were large enough to remain absolutely safe until 1900, when they again dropped to less than 100.

In his second election in 1864 Lincoln received in Whitley county 1,074 votes, to 1,337 cast for McClellan, the Democratic majority being 263. And from that time until 1916 the presidential elections show results as follows:

- 1868—Seymour, Democrat, 1,628; Grant, Republican, 1,372; Democratic majority, 256.
- 1872—Greeley, Democrat, 1,650; Grant, Republican, 1,401; Democratic majority, 249.
- 1876—Tilden, Democrat, 2,052; Hayes, Republican, 1,660; Democratic majority, 392.
- 1880—Hancock, Democrat, 2,229; Garfield, Republican, 1,941; Democratic majority, 288.
- 1884—Cleveland, Democrat, 2,365; Blaine, Republican, 2,007; Democratic majority, 358.

- 1888—Cleveland, Democrat, 2,325; Harrison, Republican, 2,133; Democratic majority, 192.
 1892—Cleveland, Democrat, 2,222; Harrison, Republican, 1,951; Democratic majority, 271.
 1896—Bryan, Democrat, 2,494; McKinley, Republican, 2,242; Democratic majority, 252.
 1900—Bryan, Democrat, 2,361; McKinley, Republican, 2,271; Democratic majority, 90.
 1904—Parker, Democrat, 2,281; Roosevelt, Republican, 2,359; Republican majority, 78.
 1908—Bryan, Democrat, 2,493; Taft, Republican, 2,302; Democratic majority, 191.
 1912—Wilson, Democrat, 2,206; Taft, Republican, 1,082; Roosevelt, Progressive, 990; Democratic plurality, 1,124; Democratic majority, 134.
 1916—Wilson, Democrat, 2,510; Hughes, Republican, 2,191; Democratic majority, 319.

The election in 1904 was the first time any change had come since 1840. The Democrats had carried fifteen straight presidential elections, the lowest majority in any one being 3 and the highest majority being 392, in 1876.

In 1878 the Democrats elected a county treasurer by only four majority and a county commissioner by 3. In 1848 candidates for county treasurer tied. In 1890 the Republicans elected a clerk by two votes, and in 1900 one Democratic candidate for county commissioner was defeated by four votes, while the candidate for county assessor was elected by only one majority.

In the landslide of 1904, when Roosevelt defeated Parker, the Republicans had a much smaller majority for their state ticket than that given to Roosevelt. Whitley county elected a Republican candidate for sheriff at that time by 97, while the Democrats had a majority of 65 for Robinson for congress and a good safe majority for all the other local Democratic candidates.

In Whitley county both parties have been thoroughly organized. Party machinery has been most efficient on both sides, which accounts more than anything else for the consistency with which the relative voting strength has been recorded.

With the slender majority recorded by the Democrats in 1844 and continued down to 1874, the Republicans were not allowed to hold a single county office.

In 1874 the citizens decided, being an off year, to nominate a non-partisan ticket, and both Democrats and Republicans were placed upon this ticket under the name of the "People's Party." It lasted only through three campaigns with dwindling support, and in 1878 disappeared entirely, the old parties going back into their original positions with the Democrats in the lead.

In 1882, being an off year, the Republicans decided to make a real campaign in an attempt to overthrow the Democratic majority. The Democrats were too well organized, however, and the largest Democratic majority for any candidate was 222, and the lowest 45.

In 1888 the Republicans succeeded in electing their candidate for sheriff, W. W. Hollipeter, by a majority of 67, as they did until 1894.

In 1892 William F. McNagny, the Democratic candidate for congress, was elected by a majority of 337. The lowest Democratic majority on the ticket that year was 191. Only two years later, 1894, the entire Republican county ticket was elected by majorities of over 100, while the state ticket had a majority of 64.

In 1896 the entire Democratic ticket was again elected by safe majorities, excepting for one candidate, and in 1898 the Democratic majorities were very large.

In the three elections following this the tickets were divided, partly Democrats and partly Republicans, the honors being about even. In 1906 the Republicans elected everything excepting coroner and surveyor.

These Democrats have held public office through the votes of the electors of Whitley county from the first election to the present time; as nearly as can be established by public records and newspaper files:

Brief Biographies of Prominent Democrats in the Several Counties of Indiana

PHILIP D. ABELL

Mr. Abell has served as recorder of Pike county and has for many years been a prominent factor in the educational affairs of this district and is known throughout the county as a man of sterling qualities.

Mr. Abell is a native Hoosier, born in Dubois county on the 4th day of February, 1877. He attended the public schools of his district, and, after completing the high school course, entered Oakland City College for work in the higher branches. A complete teachers' course was also taken at Indiana State Normal School of Terre Haute, from which he graduated in 1901. Prior to taking this latter course of study, however, he had been engaged in educational work, teaching in the common schools of Pike county, in all ten years. So successful was he in this field of work that he later became an instructor in the high schools of Coe and Velpen, and here for seven years he taught, continuing a successful career.

In the year 1912 he was elected to the position of county recorder for a term of four years, and at present his energies are devoted to this work. He is, however, also engaged in the pursuit of agriculture, finding time to superintend the cultivation of his farm.

Fraternally he is allied with Velpen Lodge, No. 275, I. O. O. F., and numbers among its members many loyal friends.

On the 16th day of April, 1903, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Anna Riggle, and she has since been the presiding genius of his home and a worthy second in his various undertakings, as well as a charming hostess to their many friends.

HERMAN F. ADAM

Herman F. Adam, one of the most active workers in the Marion county Democratic organization and former chief inspector of scales, weights and measures for the city of Indianapolis, is a native of Germany, his birth having occurred in Bueckeburg on the 24th day of January, 1866, the son of William and Dorothea Adam. At the age of nine months, however, he was brought to this country by his parents, who settled in Indianapolis. There he received his education in the public schools and at an early age became engaged as a commercial traveler, a work in which he was engaged for twenty years.

In the fall of 1912 Mr. Adam was elected representative from Marion county to the legislature, and took an active part in the deliberations of the Assembly of 1913. The following year he was appointed inspector of weights and measures, which position he filled with credit. He is a member of the Indiana Democratic Club, the Indianapolis Academy of Music, the United Commercial Travelers, the Indiana Commercial Travelers' Insurance Company, and is vice-president of the American Travelers' Association.

CHARLES A. AITKEN

Charles A. Aitken has served as clerk of the Elkhart circuit court and Elkhart superior court, has for many years been well known to the leaders of the Democratic party of Goshen, working zealously during the various campaigns, sparing neither his time nor strength in promoting the best interests of the party.

He was born in Indiana on the 14th day of October, 1875, and in this State his childhood and youth were passed. He attended the common schools of his district and graduated from the high school at Bristol, later going to Chicago, where a course of study was pursued in the Metropolitan College of that city.

On the first day of June, 1897, his marriage to Miss Orleeta Stoutenour was solemnized and their home was established in the city of Goshen, where they have since dwelt, gathering about them a wide circle of friends and acquaintances.

Mr. Aitken in the fall of 1910 was elected clerk of the Elkhart circuit and superior courts, assuming the duties of his office on the first day of the following January, his tenure of office to expire on the 31st of December, 1914. In assuming the duties of this position he applied himself with conscientious zeal to the administration of the affairs in his charge, using advanced methods wherever possible, and in every way striving for increased efficiency in his department.

Throughout his career he has been a consistent Democrat, voting the ticket and engaging in the various movements for the promotion of the principles promulgated by Jefferson.

Having held various positions of responsibility in the service of the commonwealth, and for many years having been closely identified with both commercial and religious affairs of the county, the Rev. Cornelius L. Airhart is well known to the citizens of Greencastle and vicinity.

Mr. Airhart was born in Boone county, Indiana, September 10, 1860; in the schools of that locality received his education and at twenty-five years of age entered the university. At an early age he engaged in the pursuit of agriculture and as a successful tiller of the soil he continued until 1912, at which time he retired from the farm.

On the 10th day of June, 1883, Mr. Airhart was united in marriage to Miss Adda May Canine of Montgomery county, and their home was established in Boone county, which remained their abiding place until 1901, in which year they located in Putnam county.

In the year 1885 Mr. Airhart was ordained to the ministry in the old-school Baptist church, and in this field he has labored constantly throughout the succeeding years. While a resident of Boone county he was engaged in the mercantile business for three years, and later at Roachdale, Putnam county, he was proprietor of a store.

In November, 1900, Mr. Airhart was elected to represent Boone county in the Indiana state legislature and served in the following assembly. Four years previously he had entered the race for joint senator, but withdrew before the election. In the year 1912 he was elected auditor of Putnam county for a term of four years, and in that position served the public with zeal and loyalty.

On September 20, 1911, Mr. Airhart married, secondly, Miss Evelyn Van Cleave of New Market, Montgomery county.

CHARLES T. AKIN

The name of Akin is highly esteemed in Sullivan county, being that of honored public officials for many years and comprising several generations. The present representative of the family, Charles T. Akin, was born in Carlisle, Indiana, on the 27th day of October, 1848. His grandfather, a native of Virginia, was one of the pioneers of this state, and his father, an ardent worker in the early Democracy of the state, was the first native-born Hoosier to occupy a seat in the state legislature—serving in the twenty-fifth session of this body and later being returned for the twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth and thirtieth general assemblies.

Charles T. Akin was educated in the public schools of his home district and later continued his studies at Merom College. In the year 1880 he represented Sullivan county in the state legislature. He was returned for the following session and in 1890 was elected state senator from his district, having been nominated by acclamation, and in the deliberations of the assembly which followed he was an active participant. Again, in 1910, he was elected to this position, and served with characteristic zeal.

Since the days of his youth Mr. Akin has been an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party, and during the campaigns from 1882 to 1890 was a member of the county committee. In municipal affairs, also, he has been vitally interested, having served on the school board and as a member of various organizations for the betterment of the community. He is a member of the Commercial Club of Carlisle—and has taken an active part in the work of the Masonic order since the year 1872.

Mr. Akin is known as a successful agriculturist and breeder of live stock, and is also largely interested in general merchandising. On December 18, 1890, he was united in marriage to Miss M. C. Brace.

JOSHUA H. ALLEN

Among the younger workers in the ranks of Wayne county Democracy, few are more enthusiastic or more loyal to the interests of the party than Joshua H. Allen, a leading attorney of Richmond.

Mr. Allen was born in Wayne county, Indiana, on the 31st day of January, 1882. He attended the common schools of his district and continued his studies in the high school of Hagerstown, from which he graduated with the class of 1900. A course in law was pursued at the University of Indiana Law School in Indianapolis, his graduation from this institution occurring in 1905. In the same year he was admitted to the bar of Wayne county and entered into the active practice of his profession at Hagerstown. Here he remained until the year 1912, at which time he located in Richmond, his present home. From the 22nd day of August, 1912, to January 1, 1913, he served as prosecuting attorney of Wayne county, by appointment of the governor, and to this work his abilities and energies were conscientiously applied.

He is affiliated with the order of Knights of Pythias and is an active and enthusiastic worker in this organization.

Mr. Allen has been a staunch adherent to Democratic principles, and during the various campaigns through which he has passed his time and energies have been devoted without stint to the service of the party.

GEORGE ARTHUR ALLISON

Our present subject is a native of the state of Indiana, his birth having occurred on the 24th day of March, 1876, in Nashville, Brown county, where he still resides. His education was obtained in the common schools of Nashville. His father, Alonzo Allison, has for more than twenty years been the editor of the Brown County Democrat, and from him the son imbibed the principles of Democracy. His father taught him the printer's trade, and he has since proved an able assistant in the office of the Democrat.

When but thirteen years of age George Arthur Allison was page in the Indiana state senate. On the 4th day of January, 1907, he was married to Miss Helen Adams, and to them has been born one child.

Mr. Allison is a member of the Methodist church and is descended from a long line of Democratic ancestors.

GEORGE RUST ALSOP, M. D.

Dr. George Rust Alsop, a well-known banker of Vincennes, is a native of the state of Virginia, born on the 19th day of December, 1851. He attended private schools in Rappahannock and Spotsylvania counties, Virginia, and in 1873 entered the Indiana Medical College of Indianapolis. His studies in medical science were continued in 1874 and 1875 in the University of Louisville, and after his graduation from this institution he located in Knox county, where his interests have since centered. In April, 1878, he assumed the duties of township trustee and in this capacity served until 1882. Two years later he became clerk of the circuit court of Knox county, and in this position remained four years.

In the year 1888 he was instrumental in organizing the German National Bank of Vincennes, and since that date has been cashier and president of this institution.

Mrs. Alsop, to whom he was married April 20, 1875, was formerly Miss Nancy Jane McClelland.

T. WAYNE ANGLIN

The name of T. Wayne Anglin is familiar to the citizens of Kosciusko county as that of a leading attorney of the city of Warsaw.

Mr. Anglin was born in Kosciusko county on the 14th day of January, 1874, and received his schooling in the public schools of the county. Later, however, his studies were continued at North Manchester College and at Valparaiso Normal Institute. He taught in the public schools of the county four years, and finally took a course in law at the Indiana University Law School at Indianapolis, his graduation from this institution occurring in the year 1899. The same year he was admitted to the bar of Kosciusko county and entered into the active practice of his profession. His qualifications for success in his chosen work were marked, and in the year 1906 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the 54th judicial circuit for a term of two years; and again in 1912 he was re-elected to the same position (being the only Democrat elected on the county ticket that year), serving with great credit to himself and his constituents.

On the 25th day of December, 1902, his marriage to Miss Pearl V. Lehman was solemnized, and her companionship has since been of great worth to him in his career.

EDWARD AUGUST AUBRY

Edward August Aubry has served as city comptroller of Hammond, has been identified with Lake county in various capacities for a number of years, and always has enjoyed a reputation for integrity and good service in whatever relation he has sustained, either to private business or public affairs. He was born at Canton, Ohio, December 24, 1871, a son of August and Mary Aubry. His parents were substantial farming people. In 1890 the family moved to White county, Indiana. After a public school education, which was finished while he lived in Ohio, Mr. Aubry followed various lines of work until August, 1895. He then entered Valparaiso University, where he spent one year in the department of pharmacy, and graduated in 1897. His home has been in Lake county since 1902. After coming to Indiana he worked for two years in the drug business, taught school from 1892 to 1896 and again from 1898 until 1902, and in the latter year once more entered the drug business as a pharmacist. In 1903 he became a clerk for the railway company at Chicago Junction, and in 1905 went with the Indiana Harbor R. R. at Calumet Park, remaining until March 9, 1911. On the latter date Mayor Smalley appointed Mr. Aubry city comptroller, and in 1914 he was again confirmed in this position. During 1913 Mr. Aubry, as a side-line, built the Aubry theatre at 253 Hohman street. This is one of the small but handsome and well-equipped places of amusement of the city, seating 300 persons.

Mr. Aubry married Miss Mary Paschall of Rochester, Ind., a daughter of Rachel and Henry Paschall, a farmer. Mr. and Mrs. Aubry are members of All Saints church. Since 1898 he has been affiliated with the Knights of Maccabee, belongs to the Knights of Columbus and is an active member of the Hammond Chamber of Commerce.

JUDGE H. CLARENCE AUSTILL

Holding a position in the front rank of the legal profession of Madison county and having spent many years in the service of the commonwealth, Judge H. Clarence Austill has fairly won the high reputation which he holds throughout the county of Madison and in the legal profession of the state.

Judge Austill is a native of this state, born in 1876. He attended the public schools of Elwood and continued his studies in the legal department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. Following his graduation from that institution in the year 1898, he was admitted to the bar of Madison county and entered into the active practice of his profession. In the following year his marriage to Miss Gloy L. Anderson was solemnized, and the home then established by them has extended hospitality to many friends throughout the county.

In the year 1898, soon after his admission to the bar, Judge Austill was appointed deputy prosecuting attorney, a position he occupied for two years. Four years later he was elected city attorney of Elwood. He has also served as judge of the superior court and in all these positions of trust he established a reputation for conscientious service.

LEONARD MORGAN BANE

Leonard Morgan Bane is a prominent young attorney of Ft. Wayne, who, though he has practiced but six years in this city, has won for himself a place in the front rank of the legal profession of the community and is permitted to practice in the various state courts and the United States circuit court for his district.

He is a native of the State of Pennsylvania, his birth having occurred on the 8th day of November, 1880. There his childhood was spent, and he attended the common schools of his locality, later graduating from Madison Academy at Uniontown, Pa. The ensuing six years were spent as a teacher in the common schools of that State, and at the close of his period he entered the university at Valparaiso, Ind., for the purpose of studying law. After his graduation from this institution he located in the city of Fort Wayne, and here his practice has been built up and his interests centered.

He has proved an active citizen, zealous in his support of the various movements which have risen for the betterment of the community, physically and morally, and at all times a loyal worker for the best interests of the Democratic party. In the year 1914 he was candidate for the nomination for state senator from Allen county.

Mr. Bane is an attendant of the Christian church and an active member of the Ft. Wayne Commercial Club, and is affiliated with the Order of Moose, the Knights of Pythias and the Buffalos.

Mr. Bane is unmarried, but is well known socially in the city and has among his many acquaintances a large circle of friends.

ELMORE BARCE

Elmore Barce was born in Will county, Illinois, on the 5th day of December, 1872, and his parents, Lyman M. Barce and Rebecca F. Barce, were of the old Puritan stock of Massachusetts. The grandfather came west in the year 1857 and settled on the prairies of Illinois, having lost four sons who were followers of the sea. Two of his remaining boys entered the Union army in the 100th Illinois Volunteer Infantry at the outbreak of the Civil war.

The father of the subject of this sketch came to Benton county in the spring of 1875, settling on the prairies north of the present town of Fowler. He was a tiller of the soil, an honored and respected man in his community and became trustee of Union township.

Elmore Barce received a common school education and later graduated from the high school in Goodland. After some apprenticeship served in a law office, and after teaching in the public schools of Newton and Benton counties for six years and being editor of the Fowler Republican for three years, he entered the practice of law, in the fall of 1903, at Fowler, where he has resided ever since.

About eight years ago he entered the Democratic ranks and was later selected as chairman of the Democratic party of Benton county.

Mr. Barce is a Mason, a Knight of Pythias, a member of the Indiana Historical Society and the American Historical Association, and is a contributor at times to the Indiana Magazine of History. He is married and resides at Fowler. His only son, Joseph Edward Barce, is now in Culver Military Academy.

JOSEPH K. BARCLAY

Descended from a long line of Democratic ancestors and being the nephew of nine illustrious Democratic uncles, Joseph K. Barclay has maintained the traditions of the family and is recognized as a leader in the Democracy of the state. He was born in Vernon, Indiana, on the 18th day of September, 1883, and received his schooling in the city of Bloomington. Following his graduation from the high school he entered Indiana University for continued study, taking a four years' course and graduating in 1905. The following year he entered the University of Minnesota, but in 1908 returned to Indiana University for a course in law and was admitted to the bar in the year following. Immediately thereafter he engaged in active practice in Bloomington, and at once evinced marked ability and zeal in his work. In the year 1912 he was elected prosecuting attorney for Monroe county, running six hundred votes ahead of his ticket and carrying the county by nearly thirteen hundred votes.

Mr. Barclay has ever been active in the service of the party, and was secretary of the county committee in 1908 and 1910, and chairman of that body in 1912. During his college days he was a noted athlete and champion mile runner for the Chicago and Philadelphia clubs.

On September 17, 1913, Mr. Barclay was united in marriage to Miss Eleanor Bowles.

FRED BARNETT

Mr. Barnett has served with credit as city judge of Hammond. He is one of the most active workers, not only in the ranks of the Democratic party, but in municipal affairs as well. He was born in Hallsville, Dewitt county, Illinois, March 19, 1881. His legal education was received at the Illinois College of Law of Chicago, from which he graduated in the year 1907. On the 29th day of October, of the same year, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Edna McKinney, and their home was established in Hammond. In 1909 he was elected city judge of Hammond for a four-year term, and at the expiration of this period was re-elected, his present term to expire with the close of 1917. He is an active member of the chamber of commerce and is affiliated with the Modern Woodmen of America, Free and Accepted Masons, Chapter, Knights Templar and the Mystic Shrine. Is a member of the Christian church.

COLONEL JOHN T. BARNETT

Col. John T. Barnett, while born in Hendricks county, is really claimed by Marion county on account of his residence and various business interests in Indianapolis. The colonel was the first man in Hendricks county to graduate from the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y.; the second to command a regiment in a war, and the only Democratic colonel in the Spanish-American war from the State of Indiana. He has had a long and varied career in the service of his country, and since his retirement, on account of physical disability, he has been no less active in civil life.

The colonel was born three miles west of Danville, September 2, 1851, on the farm which his father, William Barnett, entered from the Government. His parents were William and Nancy (Buchanan) Barnett, his father a native of Virginia and his mother a direct descendant of George Buchanan, the eminent Scottish scholar, historian and poet. His father lived to the age of 71 and his mother 79.

Colonel Barnett received his early education in the district schools of his township and the old Danville Academy. After teaching school a year he entered Asbury (now DePauw) University in 1871, completing the freshman year with the class of 1875. Receiving an appointment to the U. S. Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., upon the recommendation of Gen. John Coburn, then Congressman, he entered the academy June, 1873, graduating in June, 1878, number fourteen in his class, standing especially high in mathematics and allied subjects. Colonel Barnett was obliged to remain out of the academy for one year on account of severe illness from typhoid fever. He was assigned to 5th U. S. Cavalry as 2nd lieutenant.

After the customary graduating leave of absence he joined the 5th U. S. Cavalry, October 1st, 1878, at Fort D. A. Russell, near Cheyenne, Wyo. He was in active service during the next eight years and served at various posts and on detached duty in Wyoming and Texas.

In 1886 he was compelled to retire from active service on account of disability incurred in the line of duty, and is now on the retired list of the U. S. Army.

After his retirement he settled in Danville, and in 1893 removed to Indianapolis. His health having somewhat improved, he moved to Piqua, Ohio, in the spring of 1894; and, engaging in the hardware business, became the principal owner, president and manager of the Barnett Hardware Co. at Piqua, remaining as such until 1899, when he disposed of this business and returned to Indianapolis, where he has since resided. Upon his return to Indianapolis he engaged in the pharmaceutical business until a return of his old disease caused him to give it up. Improving again in health, he engaged in his present real estate, loan and insurance business at 50 North Delaware street, Indianapolis.

In 1893 he was appointed by Governor Matthews assistant inspector-general of the Indiana National Guard, with the rank of major, which position he held until 1894, resigning on account of absence from the state.

At the beginning of the Spanish-American War, Colonel Barnett offered his services to the Secretary of War and the Governors of Indiana and Ohio. The Governor of Indiana gladly availed himself of his valuable services, appointing him colonel and commander of the 159th Indiana Volunteer Infantry in May, 1898, and he at once took his regiment to Camp Alger, Va. The regiment was stationed at Camp Alger, Va., Thoroughfare Gap, Va., Camp Meade, Pa., and was mustered out of service at Camp Mount, Indianapolis, about the middle of November, 1898. While at Camp Alger, Colonel Barnett commanded the 2nd Division of the Second Army Corps for a short time and his brigade for about half of the time he was in the service.

On December 18, 1879, Colonel Barnett married Emma Charlotte Piersol, the only daughter of Isaac and Elizabeth Piersol, a prominent family of Hendricks county, Isaac Piersol being a successful merchant and banker of Danville, Indiana. To Colonel and Emma C. Barnett two children were born, Wm. P., who died at birth, and Chester P., born January 14, 1887. Emma C. Barnett died in May, 1892, and the following year Colonel Barnett married Cora B. Campbell, daughter of L. M. Campbell, a prominent lawyer of Danville, Indiana.

Chester P. Barnett, son and only child of the colonel, is following in the footsteps of his father, having graduated at the U. S. Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., and is now a 2nd lieutenant in the 15th U. S. Cavalry, stationed at Fort Bliss, El Paso, Texas. Chester commanded a battalion, with the rank of major, in the 1st Indiana National Guard in the border warfare with Mexico. He has an estate of some sixty thousand dollars in Hendricks county. He was married in 1911 to Katherine Davis Brown, granddaughter of ex-Senator Henry Gassaway Davis of West Virginia. To their union a son, Davis Piersol Barnett, was born in February, 1913.

Colonel Barnett was a member of the Sigma Chi Greek letter fraternity while in DePauw University, and was president of the Alumni Chapter at Indianapolis, for one year. He is a member of the Sons of Revolution and served as its president and has been on the board of managers since 1899; has belonged to the Masonic fraternity since he was 21 years of age. As a member of the chamber of commerce he is chairman of its military committee. He is a member of the Military Order of Foreign Wars, Spanish War Veterans and Spanish War Camp, of all of which he has been the commander. In politics the colonel has always been identified with the Democratic party and is a member of the Democratic club. He is a member of the Central Christian church. Colonel Barnett leads a very busy life and useful career and has made a name for himself in his profession.

HENRY A. BARNHART

Henry A. Barnhart, Democrat, of Rochester, was born at Twelve Mile, Ind., September 11, 1858, the son of a German Baptist minister, and his family consists of two sons, Deal L. Barnhart, editor and publisher of the Rochester Sentinel; Lieut. Hugh A. Barnhart, of the Regular Army; and a foster daughter, the wife of Attorney Henry Stewart Bailey, of Peru, Mrs. Barnhart having died in 1916. After finishing his education he taught school several years, was then elected surveyor of Fulton county, and a year later, in 1886, purchased the Rochester Sentinel, of which he is still owner. He has been president of the Rochester Telephone Company since its organization in 1895; president of the National Independent Telephone Association; director of the Indiana Bank and Trust Company; director of the Indiana State Prison; trustee of the Northern Hospital for the Insane; president of both the Democratic and the Northern Indiana Editorial Associations; and was long a member of the Democratic State Central Committee and executive committee thereof. He was elected in 1908 to fill a vacancy in the Sixtieth Congress, caused by the death of Hon. A. L. Brick, and was re-elected to the Sixty-first, Sixty-second, Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Congresses, and for six years of this service was chairman of the Committee on Printing and always active in progressive legislative endeavor. He never had opposition for any of his seven nominations for Congress and was defeated in his party disaster in 1918, although he ran considerably ahead of his party ticket in the district which has always been largely Republican. In addition to his newspaper, telephone and political activities, Mr. Barnhart has always been interested in farming and is the owner of a farm near Rochester to which he gives a good deal of his time and attention. He is a member of the Baptist church and of the orders of Knights of Pythias and Knights of the Maccabees, for the latter of which he was long a member of the state board of auditors. He has always been active in public affairs and constantly an advocate for better conditions in the public service and better possibilities for the people generally.

H. S. K. BARTHOLOMEW

H. S. K. Bartholomew was born in Elkhart county, October 8, 1862. He attended the district schools until he was sixteen. He also attended Middlebury high school two winters and three terms of ten weeks each at Valparaiso normal school, after which he taught school several terms.

From 1887 to 1899 he engaged in farming and from August, 1899, to March, 1901, was a member of the editorial staff of the South Bend Times. From March, 1901, to June, 1904, he was the owner and editor of the Warsaw Union, Warsaw, Ind. From September, 1905, he served about six years on the staff of the Goshen Democrat. At the present time he is engaged in farming.

For twelve years Mr. Bartholomew has been president of the Elkhart Historical Society.

JUDGE PLINY WEBSTER BARTHOLOMEW

For more than a score of years the name of Pliny W. Bartholomew has been a familiar one to the citizens of Indianapolis, and his reputation as a jurist and judge is so firmly established that no introduction is needed.

He is a native of the State of Massachusetts, his birth having occurred in that State on the 4th day of August, 1840. In 1864 he lived in Saratoga county, New York. His education was received in the schools of the East, and he attended Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., where he graduated, receiving the degrees of A. B. and A. M.

In the year 1866 he came to Indianapolis, and on the 30th day of January, 1873, he was united in marriage to Miss Sarah Belle Smith of Crawfordsville, Ind. Since 1866 he has engaged in the practice of law, and so successful has he been that in the year 1890 he was elected judge of the superior court, a position which he held until October 26, 1896. In November, 1908, he was again elected judge of the superior court, and served in this capacity until December, 1914. He is an elder in Memorial Presbyterian church, past grand representative and past chancellor of Marion Lodge No. 1, Knights of Pythias; on the committee of education in the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce; a member of the American and Indiana State Bar associations, Indiana Democratic Club; past grand dictator and grand treasurer of the Knights of Honor.

FRED E. BARRETT

It was not until Fred E. Barrett of Indianapolis began his work of obtaining state-wide recognition for the Indiana Democratic Club that he became known in the circles of Democracy, but it was only a short time thereafter until he had fought his way to the position of Democratic county chairman. And the future holds much in store for Mr. Barrett and for Democracy in Indiana, for Mr. Barrett is one of the aggressive young Democrats of the state.

Fred Barrett got his first peep at the world in Greenfield, Ind., on January 12, 1882. His life was that of the average boy of the small city, but he had determined to become an attorney, and it was with this determination that he fought his way through school. As is the result of such ambition and endeavor in most instances, Mr. Barrett was successful, and success has continued to shine upon him in his private law practice in Indianapolis.

Probably the most distinctive work for which Mr. Barrett has become known is his work with the Indiana Democratic Club. Until his election to the presidency the club had not obtained general recognition as a state-wide organization and Indiana Democracy suffered to this extent in its fight with the opponents of the great cause. But Mr. Barrett went to work, gave his time, his study and his effort to the club and concluded an administration as president which started the club forward.

Mr. Barrett makes his home in Indianapolis at the present time. He served his party as city attorney for the city of Indianapolis until his private practice compelled him to give his attention to this work. His effort will be known to future Democrats, as his period of service extends a long distance into the future.

HOWARD E. BARRETT

A leading attorney of Rush county and an active worker in the ranks of the Democracy of this locality is Howard E. Barrett of Rushville.

Mr. Barrett was born in Hancock county, Indiana, on the 23d day of March, 1862. He attended the common schools of his district, the Spiceland Academy and later entered Valparaiso University, where both the commercial and law courses were taken. Following his graduation from this institution on the 27th day of May, 1885, he was admitted to the bar of Rush county and entered into the active practice of the law.

On the 14th day of April, 1887, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Catherine Veatch of Oaklandon, and their home, then established in Rushville, has extended hospitality to many friends.

In the year 1910 he assumed the duties of city attorney for a term of four years, and in this capacity he has demonstrated his abilities as a jurist and his loyalty to the community which he serves. The administration of the affairs of this office has been conducted with the same conscientious zeal which has characterized his work in private practice, and he has fairly won the high esteem rendered him by his constituents and the community at large. At the primary election in 1916 he was nominated by the Democrats for the position of senator of the district composed of Rush, Hancock and Decatur counties, receiving a majority of the votes in these counties. He was, however, defeated at the November election.

In some things Mr. Barrett is known as a conservative man, but in movements affecting the progress and development of Rush county and its moral uplift he is in the front rank of the workers.

Politically he has consistently adhered to the tenets of Thomas Jefferson and sought to promulgate these principles by precept and by example.

OTTO C. BASTIAN

Otto C. Bastian was born in New York state June 8, 1864, and received a public school and normal school education in that state. He then took up the drug business at Danville, N. Y., and in 1887 opened his store in South Bend, Indiana.

He has been very active in both party and civic affairs during the past fifteen years, and is regarded as one of the most public-spirited men in the city. He was president of the board of public works from 1910 to 1914, and during that time great projects that had been in contemplation were carried out. A new water station was built, two trunk sewers constructed, and new streets opened. The Washington street elevation was constructed and a vast saving was made through using gravel instead of concrete for street foundations.

Mr. Bastian was president of the old South Bend Business Men's Association, and it was directly through his efforts, seconded by other enterprising men, that the chamber of commerce was established; and he served in the board of directors for four years. No man has the welfare of South Bend more at heart.

Mr. Bastian is always an active Democrat. He was a delegate to the notable state convention of 1888, and has attended nearly all state and congressional conventions since, as well as judicial conventions. He is always active in campaigns and a loyal supporter of his party.

He is a member of the order of Elks, the Indiana Club and several German organizations. He is married, his wife's maiden name being Una Bierhart.

JUDGE CHARLES S. BATT

Throughout the state of Indiana, Judge Charles S. Batt is known as a brilliant light in the legal profession and the author of improved methods of procedure in the courts of Terre Haute and Vigo county.

Judge Batt was born in Salem, Washington county, Indiana, on the second day of February, 1872. He attended the public schools of New Albany, graduating from the high school of that city. In the year 1901 he entered the law department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, graduating three years later, having taken post-graduate work. In the same year he was admitted to the bar of Vigo county and engaged in the active practice of his profession at Terre Haute.

In the fall of 1909 he was elected city judge of this place with a majority of over twelve hundred votes in a normally Republican community, and his ability in the discharge of the duties pertaining to this office is well known. In the year 1914 he was appointed city attorney, and in this capacity is demonstrating anew his zeal in the public service.

Since he attained his majority, he has been a consistent adherent to Democratic principles, and has taken an active part in the various campaigns through which he has passed, being much in demand as a political speaker throughout his congressional district. In the year 1912 he was elected alternate to the Baltimore convention and served in the place of the regular delegate to this notable gathering. He is also an extensive farmer, being one of the largest land owners in the county, specializing in feed cattle.

He is affiliated with the Indianapolis Consistory, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, 32d degree; Zorah Temple Nobles of the Mystic Shrine of Terre Haute, and is past eminent commander of the Terre Haute Commandery No. 16, Knights Templar.

Mrs. Batt, to whom he was married July 10, 1907, was formerly Miss Florence M. Wyeth. By her gracious manner and charm in dispensing the hospitality of their home, she has been a large factor in drawing about them a wide circle of friends.

FRED W. BEAL

Fred W. Beal, Democratic candidate for the nomination of judge of the superior court of Vigo county, was reared in Vigo county. He is the son of Mark and Margaret A. Beal, and the grandson of Uncle Jerry Beal, a pioneer settler of Vigo county. Mr. Beal received his early education in the country and city schools of Vigo county and graduated from the Terre Haute high school in 1889, winning the scholarship to Wabash College. He attended the Indiana State Normal School and afterwards taught school in this county. He was a resident of Otter Creek township when admitted to the bar. He attended the University of Michigan Law School and graduated therefrom in 1893. Mr. Beal was admitted to the bar in 1892, a year before his graduation. He began the practice of law in the office of Davis, Reynolds & Davis, and continued with them until he formed a partnership with Sant C. Davis, who was a brother of Judge S. B. Davis, and this partnership continued until the death of Mr. Davis in 1897.

In 1898 Mr. Beal was elected prosecuting attorney of Vigo county and held the office from 1899 to 1903. In 1908 Mr. Beal was nominated by his party as a candidate for state senator when it was found that Louis P. Seeburger was not eligible to make the race, and was elected.

While in the Legislature Mr. Beal was assigned to some of the most important committees in the senate. He was a member of the finance, judiciary, mines and mining and labor committees. On the latter committee he served as chairman. Some of the most important labor legislation came up during the sessions while he was there. Mr. Beal introduced for organized labor a bill known as the employers' liability act and he succeeded in having it passed in 1911. This law eliminates the fellow-servant rule and is one of the greatest laws for the protection of life and limb of the laboring people of this State. Mr. Beal supported all measures in favor of labor, and on the mining committee gave his support to the weekly wage law, the ventilation bill and other measures directed towards the safety and welfare of the miners of the State. He supported measures also for the protection of the railroad men, introducing the switchmen's bill and being instrumental in having it pass. He supported all measures for the benefit of public health and for the benefit and development of the agricultural interests of the State. As a member of the finance committee he succeeded in getting necessary appropriations for the proper maintenance of the Indiana State Normal School. He was instrumental in having a bill passed changing the method of electing school trustees of Terre Haute, procuring the enactment of a law whereby school trustees for Terre Haute are elected by the direct vote of the people.

His grandfather, Jeremiah Beal, came from Virginia, and was a lifelong Democrat, with which party all of his descendants have been affiliated and have been enthusiastic workers. Mr. Beal has always been a great admirer of William Jennings Bryan. He attended the Democratic national convention in Chicago in 1896 and heard Mr. Bryan deliver the famous speech which caused his nomination at that convention. Mr. Beal also attended the Democratic national conventions at Chicago in 1892 and at St. Louis in 1904, and in 1912 he attended the Democratic national convention at Baltimore where Woodrow Wilson was nominated. Mr. Beal has always been a great admirer of Woodrow Wilson and exerted himself in behalf of his nomination. Mr. Beal, with the Indiana Democratic Marching Club, made the trip to the inauguration at Washington and saw Mr. Wilson take the oath of office.

STUART A. BEALS

In these days of advanced thought and scientific educational methods the man who has in his charge the task of training the infant minds of the community and guiding the later studies of incipient manhood and womanhood must be one of proven worth in various directions. Not only must he be well educated in the actual studies taught in the classroom, but must have that broader education which comes of ripe experience and constant contact with the practical mental and physical problems of youth. That such a man has been found by the citizens of Crawford county, Indiana, is evidenced by the fact that he has served for eleven years as county superintendent of schools. This gentleman is Stuart A. Beals, a native of Indiana, whose birth occurred on the 31st of October, 1871. On the 28th of May, 1899, he was united in marriage to Miss Louisa E. McCullum. Mr. Beals attended the common and high schools of the county, later taking the full normal course. He was for a term of years engaged in teaching in the Leavenworth schools, thus demonstrating his eminent fitness for the position which he now holds. Fraternally he is affiliated with Crawford Lodge No. 470, F. and A. M., and with Wyandotte Lodge No. 268, K. of P.

THOMAS O. BECK

Thomas O. Beck, a prominent citizen of Boone county and resident of the city of Lebanon, was born in the Hoosier State on the 24th day of November, 1858. His childhood and youth were spent in Boone county, and on the 1st day of August, 1881, he was married to Miss Luella Phillips, whose home was also in Lebanon. Both Mr. and Mrs. Beck received their education in the schools of Lebanon, he graduating from the high school. He has for many years been successfully engaged as a farmer and stock-raiser, and is in touch with the various new movements for the aid of the modern, scientific farmer.

He has always been a staunch Democrat and from the year 1904 to 1914 (excepting one term of two years) he served as the county chairman of that party. He is now postmaster of the city of Lebanon, appointed for a term of four years, and is an honored member of the Indianapolis Democratic club.

Mr. Beck is the father of four sons—Dr. Herma A., Ora O., Arthur and Thomas O., Jr.; and three daughters—Lola I., Lavona L. and Nina B.

CHARLES BENTON BECK

Charles Benton Beck, now postmaster of the city of Richmond, came to his work after a broad experience in the educational and commercial fields; and the efficiency of his administration of the affairs of this office has demonstrated his fitness for the work.

Mr. Beck was born on a farm near Burlington, Indiana, on the 18th day of June, 1861, and here his boyhood was spent and his early education received. Later he attended the Indiana State Normal at Terre Haute, and for sixteen years following his graduation he taught in the schools of Cass, Carroll, Vigo and Fulton counties.

On the 16th day of February, 1884, he was united in marriage to Miss Inez Louise Cockayne.

He became engaged as a traveling salesman, and for seventeen years sold shoes and rubber goods in the central states. Afterward he located in the city of Richmond, and soon became identified with the local organization of the Democratic party. During the campaigns of 1907 to 1911 he served as county chairman, and was a member of the state central committee, acting as district chairman, from 1911 to 1913. In 1910 he was a candidate for representative to the state legislature.

Mr. Beck is descended from a long line of Democratic ancestors on both sides of the family, one grandfather being a loyal Virginia worker, and the other, Isaac Patty, being descended from the French Huguenots.

LAWRENCE BECKER

Lawrence Becker was born August 10, 1869, in Westphalia, Germany. He attended the German public schools until the family emigrated to America, in April, 1879, and settled in Tolleston, now Gary, Ind. In August, 1879, the family moved to Hammond, where young Becker attended the public schools. In May, 1883, the family moved to Montana. Here he worked on ranches during the summer and attended the public schools during the winter, until November, 1892, when he entered Valparaiso University, at Valparaiso, Ind., and for two winters prepared himself for the study of law. In the fall of 1894 he entered the law school of that institution, which he finished in June, 1896, when he opened a law office and settled in Hammond.

In March, 1898, he was elected chairman of the Democratic city central committee, and in May was elected city attorney of Hammond, which office he held until September, 1902. In 1903 he was one of the organizers of the Hammond Public Library and was a member of the library board until his removal to Washington, D. C. In May, 1904, he was elected mayor of Hammond, re-elected in 1905 and 1909. In March, 1911, Governor Marshall appointed him judge of the Lake Superior Court. In 1912 he was a delegate to the Baltimore convention. He represented Indiana on the committee of rules and joined the members of that committee who favored the abolition of the unit rule, and when beaten signed the minority report which provided that the unit rule should not apply to delegates who had been elected under a statutory primary election, which was adopted by the convention. In the election of 1914 he was defeated for judge of the superior court by the smallest plurality of any candidate on the Democratic ticket. On March 1, 1915, he was appointed solicitor of the U. S. Treasury by President Wilson.

Judge Becker is known as a student of municipal government and political science, and has drafted many of the laws of our state concerning municipal corporations and elections. He is a member of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, the American Political Science Association, and other civic organizations. He has farm interests in Indiana and Montana and is a member of the American Shropshire Sheep Breeders' Association. He is a member of the Elks, Odd Fellows and Masons, and also of several insurance orders.

On September 8, 1898, he married Agnes D. Eaton of La Salle county, Illinois, who was a student at Valparaiso. They have three children: a son, Eaton, born in 1901; and two daughters, Inez and Rose.

CHARLES H. BEDWELL

Charles H. Bedwell has attained a position of distinction and prominence in the legal profession of Sullivan county, and is highly esteemed as a legislator and as a public official of this commonwealth.

Mr. Bedwell is a native Hoosier, born on the 16th day of March, 1884. He attended the public schools of his home district and later entered Central Normal College at Danville for study in the higher branches and in pedagogy. Later a course in law was taken at Indiana University, and after his graduation he was admitted to the bar of Sullivan county and engaged in the general practice of his profession in the city of Sullivan. There he soon established an enviable reputation as an attorney of ability and in the year 1910 was appointed to the position of deputy prosecuting attorney, in which capacity he served for a period of two years.

In the fall of 1912 Mr. Bedwell was elected to represent Sullivan county in the lower house of the state legislature, and in the 68th general assembly he served with rare zeal and intelligence. During the years of 1913 and 1914 he served the party in the capacity of county chairman, and in that capacity rendered valuable service to the local organization.

Fraternally, Mr. Bedwell is allied with the order of Free and Accepted Masons and with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

On March 22, 1913, Mr. Bedwell was united in marriage to Miss Lulu M. Cain, who has since been the presiding genius of his home and his able assistant in the various undertakings which have marked his career.

JOHN E. BELDING

The name of Mr. John E. Belding is a familiar one to the citizens of Jackson county, being that of a leading hardware merchant of Brownstown and former treasurer of Jackson county.

Mr. Belding was born on the 24th day of August, 1870, on a farm in Grassy Fork township, Jackson county, and in that locality his life has been spent. He attended the public schools, including the high school of Brownstown, and has since been engaged in mercantile lines. He is a faithful Democratic worker, and served one term as county treasurer.

LON E. BERNETHY

Few citizens of Starke county are not familiar with Mr. Lon E. Bernethy, the present station agent and operator at North Judson for the Pennsylvania railroad.

Mr. Bernethy is a native Hoosier, born in Logansport, Cass county, on the 21st day of January, 1856. He attended the schools of Cass county, and in the year 1872 located in North Judson, Starke county. In the fall of 1888 he was elected to represent Laporte, Starke and Pulaski counties in the state legislature, and in the assembly of 1889 was an active participant. He was returned also to the assembly of 1891, and in 1914 was a candidate for nomination for treasurer of state, but with five others was defeated for this office. He has been a diligent worker in the party ranks since in his youth, and has rendered valuable service to the local organization in the various campaigns.

JUDGE HARRY BERNETHA

A prominent attorney in the city of Rochester and an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party is Judge Harry Bernetha. He was born in Indiana on the 12th day of May, 1867, and attended the public schools of his district. After completing his course of study in the high school he continued his work as a teacher in common schools, looking forward to the law as his chosen profession.

In the year 1890, in August, his marriage to Miss Rhoda Delp was solemnized, and in the same year he began the active practice of law in the city of Rochester. In 1896 he assumed the duties of prosecuting attorney of the 41st Judicial District, serving in this capacity for four years; and so zealous was he in the administration of the affairs of this office that he was nominated in 1902 for the still greater responsibilities of judge of the same district. He was elected, and at the expiration of his term of office was re-elected and served until the close of the year 1914.

Judge Bernetha is now successfully engaged in the practice of law, a member of the firm of Holman, Bernetha & Bryant; and still retains that clearness of vision and grasp of various phases of intricate legal problems which characterized his decisions for so many years from the bench.

ANDREW TULLY BITTERS

For many years an honored official in the service of the commonwealth and a leading journalist of the community, Andrew Tully Bitters is well known throughout Fulton county.

He was born in the State of Pennsylvania on the 16th day of January, 1841. Here he attended common school, and at the age of fifteen years accompanied his parents to Peru. Mr. Bitters was a member of the 87th Indiana Volunteers and the Mississippi Marine Brigade from 1862 to 1865. In 1869 he located in the city of Rochester, and here his interests have since centered. In the same year he was elected to the office of justice of the peace, serving in this capacity until the close of 1870. Later, also, he held this position for several years. During the period from 1886 to 1890 he served as postmaster of the city of Rochester, and was a member of the city council for a term. On the first day of May, 1910, he was appointed attendance and probation officer, and in this capacity has since served.

His career as a journalist began in the year 1872, at which time he owned and edited the Rochester Sentinel, and for fourteen years thereafter he was largely responsible for the molding of public opinion in the community through the influence of this organ. In the year 1886, however, he sold to Mr. Barnhart.

Mr. Bitters was twice married, his first wife, to whom he was married January 23, 1867, being Miss Sarah J. St. Clair; and the present Mrs. Bitters, to whom he was married April 28, 1901, having been formerly Miss Eliza Chatten, a native of London, England.

GEORGE A. BITTLER

Successful and popular both in politics and business, knowing that friends are a far greater asset than money in this life that is full of things, setting the pace by becoming the youngest man who ever held the office of treasurer of state in Indiana, George A. Bittler stepped from one place to another in the business world with remarkable speed; all the time, in politics, being filled with enthusiasm and working for the party success, whether as one of the candidates or merely as a private citizen, believing in the righteousness of the party principles.

George A. Bittler was a bank cashier at the age of twenty-seven, and four years later was nominated and elected on the Democratic ticket as treasurer of state, with nothing but his own bootstraps, thousands of personal friends of all political affiliations and his ability and character to bring him over the top. These things all combined to not only secure for him the nomination in a strong field, but enabled him to march into the office with 3,000 votes ahead of his ticket.

Coming from Fort Wayne, where he originally held the position of bank cashier, serving his term as state treasurer, he stepped into the position of vice-president of the Merchants' National Bank of Indianapolis, one of the strongest and largest banking institutions in the State, being placed in direct charge of the bond department, and in this place represented this strong concern in all the war financing drives in the war with Germany, in addition to being in full charge of one of these early and speedily successful campaigns for the community.

The progress made by the Indiana Democratic Club in the accumulation of members from all over the State, and at the same time the construction and enlargement of the handsome club house, was due to the energy, well directed, of Mr. Bittler while he was treasurer of state.

George A. Bittler came of a well-known family. The son of Mr. and Mrs. William Bittler, he was born in Fort Wayne, May 10, 1881. Was educated in the schools of his native city and graduated from the normal school at Woodville, Ohio, in the year 1900, entering the profession of teaching. He was thus engaged at Michigan City for a time. Leaving this profession, he took employment in the motive power office of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company at Fort Wayne, later entering the banking house of Nuttman & Co. as teller and assistant cashier.

Shortly after he was promoted to cashier, which position he held at the time he was appointed in 1908 by Governor Thomas E. Marshall as deputy state examiner on the state board of accounts to fill the unexpired term of William M. Fogarty, who had organized the Fidelity Trust Company of Indianapolis and became its head. As a member of the board of accounts he was reappointed in February, 1910, for a term of four years, serving until September, 1914, after he had been nominated by the Democratic state convention over a field of eight candidates for state treasurer. He resigned his office held by appointment to make this race. In the election which followed, as already stated, he led the remainder of the ticket by over three thousand votes. He took charge of the office of treasurer February 10, 1915.

That he made good in a big way as state treasurer is shown by the public records. During his term he enjoyed the distinction of signing the check that paid off over three millions of state debts which had been inherited from the Republican administration. The Vincennes University bonds amounting to $120,548 (not due until 1917) and Indiana University bonds amounting to $340,000 (not due until 1921) were paid in full in 1916, and the entire foreign and domestic debts were liquidated, stopping all interest charges and freeing the State from all debt for the first time in eighty-four years.

At the session of the Legislature in 1917 the state debt sinking fund was abolished. Inasmuch as the State was out of debt there was no further need for this fund. Thus the state tax rate of 40.1 cents on each $100 of taxables was reduced by 1½ cents, making the rate 38.6 cents on each $100, and the lowest tax rate of any State in the Middle West.

Mr. Bittler was treasurer of the Teutonia Loan and Savings Association of Fort Wayne, secretary of the Fort Wayne chapter of the American Institute of Banking and secretary of the Jefferson Club of Fort Wayne, the oldest and most active Democratic club of the State. He was a member of the advisory committee of several financial institutions, a director of the Indiana Democratic Club, a member of the Pen and Pencil Club of Indianapolis, member of the University and Commercial clubs of Fort Wayne and a trustee of St. Matthew's Evangelical Lutheran church of Indianapolis.

ADOLPH BLICKWEDEL

Adolph Blickwedel was born in the province of Saxony, Germany, April 3, 1861, a son of Frederick J. and Mary (Schultz) Blickwedel. He received his preliminary education in the schools of his country, learning the trade of cabinet maker, which he followed until he came to America, coming direct to Richmond, arriving February 21, 1882. He continued to follow the career of cabinet maker for about ten years, then going to the employ of the Panhandle railway as car repairer. After an accident, which nearly cost him an arm, he embarked in the grocery business in 1892, occupying the same quarters that he now has, and being known as a progressive and reliable man.

Mr. Blickwedel is secretary of the Minck Brewing Co., president South Side Improvement Co., president German Mutual Fire Insurance Association, and treasurer of the German Maennerchor Society. He is also a member of the Young Men's Business Club of Richmond. He takes a lively interest in politics, but has never desired office. He represented the 4th ward in the city council 1896 to 1900, and again 1904 to 1906. On February 21, 1881, he married Mary M. Wieharke, who died in 1889, leaving two children. On April 29, 1890, Mr. Blickwedel married Anna Randkoph.

Mr. Blickwedel is an active member of St. John's Lutheran Church and a member of St. John's Benevolent Society.

BENTON J. BLOOM

The name of Benton J. Bloom is familiar to the citizens of Whitley county, being that of a prominent attorney of Columbia City and formerly an honored public official of that place.

Mr. Bloom was born in this state on October 29, 1879, and received his early schooling in the public schools, graduating from the high school. He attended Indiana University for a course in law, in due time was admitted to the bar of Whitley county, and entered into the active practice of his profession at Columbia City, his ability as an attorney and his loyalty to his clients soon winning for him a large and lucrative practice.

In the year 1910 Mr. Bloom assumed the duties of mayor of his home city, and during his four years of service in that capacity established an enviable record as an official of ability and integrity.

On the 15th day of May, 1912, Mr. Bloom was united in marriage to Miss Marie A. Meyers, who has proved an able second in his career and a charming hostess to their many friends.

MICHAEL C. BLUE

Mr. Blue is best known in Indiana as the "Father of the Wells County Democracy," inasmuch as he has always been called upon to cement slightly fractured friendships, settle disputes, party quarrels—and, although not a lawyer, has frequently even been called upon to adjust family differences, hence the cognomen of "Father."

He was born in Ohio on the 16th day of April, 1836, and God has spared him to a useful and ripe old age, which, to his credit, he has used in helping others rather than helping himself. His parents moved to Indiana in 1840, and he received his education at the country schools and Roanoke College.

On May 1, 1866, he was married to Miss Rhoda Richey, and in 1857, while but 21 years of age, was appointed constable, and two years later, in 1859, was elected township assessor. In 1866 he was elected county surveyor, serving until 1870, and then was elected county auditor, serving from 1870 to 1874. In 1881 he surveyed and admirably laid out the town of Tocsin, and taught the first term of the Tocsin school, as well as being instrumental in securing a postoffice and, with others, in inducing the C. & E. R. R. to put a station at Tocsin.

In 1892 he was elected to the state legislature, and re-elected in 1894; both times proving his popularity and worth to Democracy by running ahead of his party ticket by large majorities. In 1894 he was one of the fifteen Democratic representatives who survived the fierce legislative campaign waged by the Republican party while Claude Matthews was in the governor's chair.

Since his last term in the legislature he has devoted his attention to his large farming interests, being an extensive raiser and shipper of hogs; and yet has never been too busy to give his party his best efforts, financial support and counsel at the primaries and on election day.

In these days of Democratic success, we cannot lose sight of the stalwarts like Michael C. Blue who have made our present supremacy possible by their eternal vigilance in the days gone by, when "corrupt political practices" had to be fought, even in the face of a forlorn hope.

Mr. Blue is a prominent layman in the Methodist Episcopal church, and was always active in benevolent and local commercial circles until his age and large farming interests forced his retirement. Wells county, the state and Democratic party are proud of him.

DR. FELTY A. BOLSER

Dr. Felty A. Bolser was born in Hamilton county, Ohio, in 1858, and moved with his parents to Henry county, Indiana, about 1870. During the eighties he attended veterinary college at Toronto, Canada, and took a very thorough course. Setting up an office in Newcastle his practice soon took him in many parts of the state. During the administration of Governor Matthews he was made state veterinarian, a position he held for nearly six years. Dr. Bolser was several times chairman of the Henry county Democratic committee and has used his splendid organizing ability in every campaign for the last thirty years.

Soon after the election of Governor Ralston he was made assistant state veterinarian and served four years in that capacity. It was during this term that the foot-and-mouth plague took hold in Indiana and Dr. Bolser in connection with federal agents was given the task of stamping it out.

For the last year or more the name of Dr. Bolser has been mentioned in connection with the state committee and when that body reorganized last May he was elected vice-chairman. He is married and has one son, Dr. Harry W. Bolser, who is his business associate at Newcastle.

LEWIS W. BORDERS

Mr. Borders is a native of Hendricks county, his birth having occurred in Franklin township on the 6th day of October, 1863, and is esteemed as one of the substantial citizens of Danville. His education was received in the common schools of the county, and he has since remained in the home of his birth, loyal to Hendricks county and proud of the progress she has made in the many years of his residence within her borders.

Since his youth he has been engaged in the pursuit of agriculture, and is a successful breeder of live stock. In October, 1907, he was united in marriage to Miss Eva Worrell. In the fall of 1911 he was elected to the position of auditor of Hendricks county, and so conscientiously did he perform the duties of his position that he was renominated in 1914, serving until January 1, 1916. Always a zealous worker in the ranks of the Democratic party, he served as precinct committeeman for a number of years and attended state conventions as delegate. He is a member of the Indiana Democratic Club and of the order of Masons.

AUGUST C. BORGMAN

August C. Borgman, one of the best known business men of Ft. Wayne, is a native of that city and has lived there all his life. He received his early education in the German parochial schools and at Concordia College, which he attended for a short time. When but a boy he began to work for his father, who was engaged in the excavating business, and was so employed until he attained his majority. At the age of twenty-two he married Elizabeth Horstmeyer and began to shape his own career.

For seven years Mr. Borgman was a member of the Ft. Wayne police force, but resigned to go into the trucking business with his brother, Captain William F. Borgman. Subsequently he was appointed chief of police by Mayor Grice, but resigned after two months' service. He was tendered the same position by Mayor Hosey in January, 1914, but declined the office. In 1910 he was a candidate of sheriff of Allen county.

Mr. Borgman has for years taken an active part in local affairs and is one of the strong Democrats of Ft. Wayne, with many influential friends and a host of adherents. He has been delegate to several conventions and is always active in campaigns. He is an upright and successful business man and has a clean record in every way.

JAMES BOUSLOG

A roster of the prominent citizens of the city of Newcastle would be incomplete were mention made of the present sheriff of Henry county, Mr. James Bouslog. This gentleman is a native of the Hoosier state, and most of his life has been spent in the pursuit of agriculture. His birth occurred on the 25th day of June, 1854, and his education was received in the public schools of Henry county. In the year 1880 he was united in marriage to Miss Lenora Bunner, and three children have come to brighten their home.

Mr. Bouslog has since his youth been a staunch Democrat, and in the year 1911 was appointed chief of police of the city of Newcastle. This position he held until the fall of 1914, at which time he was elected sheriff of Henry county. During his incumbency of these important offices, Mr. Bouslog has shown conscientious zeal in the administration of the affairs in his charge, and has served with great credit to himself and his constituents. Though not interested in fraternal affairs, he has a wide acquaintance throughout the county and has won a high position in the esteem of the community at large.

FRANCIS EDWARD BOWSER

Judge Francis Edward Bowser, for many years an honored official of Kosciusko county, is a true product of this county. He was born in Kosciusko county, and here his life has been spent and his interests are firmly established. His birth occurred on the 1st day of February, 1861, and in all the years which have passed since his loyalty to Warsaw has not wavered. Here he attended the public schools, taking both the elementary and high school grades; but when he wished to fit himself for his chosen profession, the law, a course of study was taken at Indiana University, at Bloomington. In 1885 he was admitted to the bar of Kosciusko county and engaged in the active practice of law. In the fall of 1908 he was elected judge of the 54th Judicial Circuit (Kosciusko county), and re-elected in November, 1914.

Mrs. Bowser, to whom he was married June 20, 1894, was formerly Miss Regina Bitner, and to her, as the presiding genius of his home, much credit is due for the success of her husband.

Judge Bowser is a staunch Democrat and has adhered consistently to the tenets of his party.

JOHN P. BOYD

John P. Boyd was born on a farm in Penn township, Jay county, on March 28, 1869. His father, Amor Boyd, located in Montpelier in 1877, where he is still in active business, and the son John has been a resident of Montpelier ever since. He was educated in the schools of Montpelier and was married to Miss Minnie Arnold. Two sons have been born to them, Robert A., born October 31, 1893, and Francis D., born December 18, 1899.

Mr. Boyd chose the legal profession for his activities, studied law, and was admitted to the Blackford county bar. He was made city attorney from 1902 to 1906, and again from 1910 to March 1, 1913, when he resigned on account of pressure of other duties. He also served as deputy prosecuting attorney for Blackford county from 1904 to June 1, 1913, when he resigned. He was also county attorney in 1911 and 1912.

On January 1, 1909, he was appointed receiver of the Montpelier Light & Water Company, which position he held until December, 1913, when the company was re-organized and he was appointed as manager of the new company—the Montpelier Utilities Co. He is also treasurer of the corporation.

Mr. Boyd is president of the board of school trustees and member of the library board and also continues his practice of law. He takes an active interest in his party politics, having been Democratic township chairman for the past twelve years, and continues in that position. Fraternally, he is a member of No. 625 Elks Lodge.

P. S. BRADLEY

Closely identified with the political and business life of the city of Elwood, and one of the most faithful and zealous of the party workers in that city and vicinity, P. S. Bradley is familiarly known to the citizens of Madison county.

Mr. Bradley is a native of the state of New York, born in Brooklyn, May 14, 1854. He received his education in the public and parochial schools of the city of Troy; and in the year 1887, when the natural gas fields were opened in Indiana, came to this state for the purpose of engaging in the business of laying natural gas mains.

Mr. Bradley is descended from a line of Democratic ancestors and throughout the family no other political faith is known. He has often served as precinct committeeman and delegate to county, district and state conventions. He also has been a member of the city council, elected in a Republican stronghold.

After twenty-five years of service for the Standard Oil Company, laying pipe lines, Mr. Bradley organized the Home Storage and Manufacturing Company, a thriving concern, of which he was president. He died December 22, 1917.

DR. GEORGE BALES BREEDLOVE

Dr. George Bales Breedlove, a prominent physician and surgeon of Morgan county, Indiana, who has had charge of the Barnard, Colonial and Highland sanitariums of Martinsville, Ind., but who is now confining himself to the general practice of medicine and surgery in Morgan county, was born in Marion county on the 18th day of May, 1868. He attended the public and high schools of Marion county and later entered Purdue University for further study, and after graduation entered medical college and received his medical degree from the University of Tennessee at Nashville. His post-graduate work in medical science and surgery was taken in Chicago Post-Graduate School and in Cornell and Bellevue hospitals, New York City.

He established himself in Morgan county, where he entered into the active practice of medicine and surgery with marked success. He is now county health commissioner and a member of the county, state and American medical associations, having served as president of the former and was twice delegate to the American Medical Association.

He is now Democratic county chairman, and politically has rendered valued service to his party since his youth.

Fraternally he is allied with the Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Red Men and Eagles. He enjoys the distinction of being the best-informed Mason in his county.

He has been very active in fighting the great white plague, tuberculosis, in his county and in rendering conditions sanitary. He is on the advisory board of the Anti-Tubercular Society and has always been a very prominent worker in behalf of the cause.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL FRANKLIN LANDERS BRIDGES

Franklin Landers Bridges, by appointment of Governor Samuel M. Ralston, served as adjutant-general of the Indiana National Guard from January, 1914, to January, 1917. Born in Indianapolis in 1878, educated in the schools of Indianapolis, Indiana University and Butler College, he enlisted in the Indiana National Guard in 1895 and served in the Spanish-American war, receiving promotion to quartermaster sergeant in the organization of the 158th Indiana, and serving until the regiment was mustered out.

While he served as adjutant-general the efficiency of the guard was considerably raised, calling several times for special compliments from General A. L. Mills, then in charge of the militia division of the Federal War Department. It was during the service of Adjutant-General Bridges that for the first time under peace conditions the national guard was called upon to qualify under the standard of the regular army. When called to service on the Mexican border, with most of the men and officers new in service, Indiana was complimented with official recognition several times on its comparatively high standard in organization, personnel, equipment and ability to adapt itself to conditions in the field. Its field hospital was declared the best on the border by representatives of the Saturday Evening Post when all the troops arrived at the border for service.

JUDGE GEORGE W. BRILL

A lifelong worker for the cause of Democracy, a delegate to many state conventions and to the national conventions of St. Louis, Cincinnati and Baltimore, and a member of the Indiana Democratic Club is Judge George W. Brill of the Hendricks circuit court.

He was born in Hendricks county, December 6, 1859, and attended the public schools of his district, later continuing his studies in the Central Normal School of Danville. Read law with the well-known firm of Hadley, Hogate & Blake. Following his graduation in 1883 he was admitted to the bar and entered upon the active practice of law, bringing to his work keen intelligence and unflinching zeal. In 1885 he was appointed deputy prosecutor for Hendricks and Martin counties under James F. Mitchell, and in 1912 was elected judge of the Hendricks circuit court, the first Democrat to hold this position since 1887. His wife was formerly Miss Emma L. Gregg.

JUDGE WILLIAM HADEN BRIDWELL

The name of William Haden Bridwell is well known throughout Sullivan county and its environs as that of a public-spirited citizen, a brilliant jurist and an able and just judge.

Judge Bridwell is a native Hoosier, born in Owensburg, Ind., on the 14th day of October, 1871, and descended from sturdy pioneers of this State. He attended the public schools of Owensburg, graduating from the high school of this place with the class of 1888. Then followed a course of study at the normal school of Bloomfield, and in the year 1893 he entered the law department of Indiana University. The following year he was admitted to the bar of Greene county and entered into the active practice of this profession. In 1895 he was appointed to the office of deputy prosecutor of Sullivan county, and in this capacity served for a term of two years.

In 1898 he completed the interrupted course of his legal education and graduated from the university. He was again appointed as deputy prosecuting attorney of Sullivan county in the year of 1900 and served for a period of two years.

In 1895 he located in the city of Sullivan, and has ever since resided in said city.

In 1901 he assumed the duties of county attorney of Sullivan county and served continuously in said capacity until he was appointed by Governor Marshall to the higher responsibilities of judge of the 14th Judicial Circuit, in February, 1911. In the following year he was nominated without opposition for a further term in this office, and was elected with a majority of 1,891 votes.

Judge Bridwell was secretary of the Democratic central committee of Sullivan county in 1904, treasurer in 1906 and chairman in 1908.

Judge Bridwell has been for many years in the van of all movements for the betterment of the community, and is also highly esteemed in the various fraternal orders to which he belongs, including all Masonic bodies in Sullivan, Terre Haute Temple Mystic Shrine, the I. O. O. F. and B. P. O. E.

THOMAS DRAKE BROOKSHIRE

Though still in the prime of life and actively engaged in the various movements which arise from time to time for the betterment of the community in which he lives, Thomas Drake Brookshire of Roachdale has attained the goal toward which he started in his youth, and has retired from the arduous labors of the farm to enjoy the fruits of his earlier toil.

Mr. Brookshire is a native of Montgomery county, Indiana, born on the 15th day of October, 1861. He attended the public schools of his district, and after completing the high school course continued his studies at the Normal School of Ladoga. His boyhood and youth were spent in the wholesome environment of farm life, and after leaving school he returned to the life of the farm and engaged in the pursuit of agriculture with renewed vigor and increased knowledge. Here, by the application of unbounded energy and progressive methods, he was enabled to amass a competence for his later years, and before age overtook him, wisely retired to a less strenuous life.

In the year 1898 he assumed the duties of county commissioner and for over nine years his best energies were devoted to the service of the commonwealth in this capacity. Prior to this, from 1893 to 1895, he served as chairman of the construction board to oversee the construction of Putnam county's new court house, and in this position won the high esteem of his fellow citizens. In 1913 he served on the famous Dyna mite Jury at Indianapolis.

He is an active member of the Greencastle commandery Knights Templar, among whom he is held in high esteem.

Mrs. Brookshire, to whom he was married November 27, 1884, was formerly Miss Emma Myers.

THOMAS W. BROLLEY

The present state statistician, Thomas W. Brolley, has been for a number of years prominently identified with the workings of the Democratic party in Indiana.

Mr. Brolley was born in Newport, Ky., on the 10th day of February, 1854; but at the age of six years accompanied his parents to Jennings county, where they located and where he has since resided. Here, in the schools of North Vernon, he received his schooling, and in his youth learned the stonecutters' trade, engaging in this work in the year 1872. After working several years as a journeyman he branched out for himself and was soon a general contractor in stone building. Many prominent buildings in North Vernon and vicinity are now evidence of his handiwork.

In the fall of 1906 he was elected representative for Scott and Jennings counties to the state legislature, and in the session of 1907 was an active participant. In the session of 1909, also, he represented his district in this body. In 1910 he was elected to the higher responsibilities of state statistician, assuming the duties of office early in the following year and discharging them with credit to himself and his constituents. In 1912 he was re-elected to this position, and still remains, an honored official and fitting representative of Indiana Democracy.

CLINTON T. BROWN

Clinton T. Brown, attorney-at-law at Tipton, occupies a high position in his profession. Born in Switzerland county, October 28, 1877, a son of Hiram R. and Susan R. Brown, he was reared on his father's farm near Bennington, Switzerland county, and secured his education at the district schools. He began teaching at eighteen and for fifteen terms continued thus engaged. He meanwhile took up the study of law and was admitted to the bar on December 3, 1902. He began to practice at Sharpville, Tipton county, in 1904, where he remained until 1912, when he moved to Tipton. He was elected prosecuting attorney of Tipton county in 1912. In this office he established a remarkable record.

Mr. Brown married Cora Land on December 5, 1897, and they have three children, Willie O., Robert W., and Eva Hazel.

Mr. Brown is a lifelong Democrat and has taken much interest in politics. During his residence in Sharpville he filled an unexpired term of one year as justice of the peace.

JOHN W. BROWN

Former auditor of Elkhart county, Mr. John W. Brown has been long in the service of the public in this county, and is known throughout its confines as a man of sterling worth and integrity.

He was born on the 29th day of December, 1860, and spent his childhood in Elkhart county, this state, beginning his schooling in this locality. On the 14th day of July, 1881, his marriage to Miss Lizzie Brumbaugh was solemnized; and in the year 1885 he was appointed postmaster at Gravelton, Indiana, serving in that capacity until 1889. In 1895 he received the appointment of postmaster of Nappanee, which position he filled with much credit until the year 1899. In 1906 he was elected city clerk of Nappanee, and served until 1910. In the fall of 1910 he was elected to the high position of auditor of Elkhart county, assuming the administration of affairs of this office on the first day of January, 1912. As in his former positions, Mr. Brown served the public with conscientious zeal, continually striving for increased efficiency in his department.

Throughout his career, Mr. Brown has been a consistent Democratic voter and worker, and has done much in his locality to further the cause of the Jeffersonian party.

L. J. BROWN

L. J. Brown, son of Christian and Maria Stoll Brown, was born in Dearborn county, Indiana, January 4, 1854. He received a common school education, attending the Dearborn county schools, and took up farming, which pursuit he followed until about thirty years ago. He then engaged in the lumber and grain business in New Trenton, Indiana, and was successfully thus engaged there until the flood of 1913 washed nine of his buildings away, with a loss of $30,000. He then moved to Cedar Grove, beginning again, and has been successful.

On October 17, 1878, Mr. Brown was married to Miss Himalaya Bower. To this union seven children have been born.

Mr. Brown has always been interested in the politics of his county. He served as trustee of Whitewater township from 1900 to 1905; was county commissioner for several years, and has acted as precinct committeeman in 1914, also served as delegate to the state convention.

He is a member of the Lutheran church.

THEODORE H. BROWN

Theodore H. Brown was born in Prussia, Germany, the son of Christian and Maria Stoll Brown, October 6, 1845. At the age of five years his parents brought him to this country, going to Cincinnati, Ohio, where his early education was acquired. He learned the trade of a mason and in 1868 moved to Brookville, where he continued to ply this trade until 1899, when he moved to a farm, where he still lives.

Mr. Brown has always been active in politics, and in 1908 was elected trustee of Brookville township, serving until 1915. He was also a member of the city council for fifteen years.

In 1868 he was married to Miss Elizabeth Schaeffer, who died in 1891. He was again married in 1899 to Miss Harriet Bonwell. Of his first marriage four children were born.

AUSTIN BRUMBAUGH

One of the most active and popular workers in the ranks of the Democratic organization of Madison county, and a leader in municipal affairs, is Austin Brumbaugh of Elwood.

Mr. Brumbaugh is a native of Huntington county, Indiana, born September 20, 1868. His schooling was received in Huntington in the grammar and high schools. Early in life he became actively interested in political affairs, and many times served as delegate to the various conventions of the party. In the year 1888 he engaged in the creamery and ice cream business, and in this business he has since remained, at one time operating several thriving factories and spending much of his time traveling about from one to the other. In 1904 he located in Elwood for the purpose of operating an ice cream plant, and here he has since remained. In the year 1910 he was elected mayor of Elwood, serving with distinction until 1914.

Fraternally, he is allied with the Masons, Odd Fellows, Elks, and United Commercial Travelers. Mrs. Brumbaugh, to whom he was married April, 1900, was formerly Miss Anna Henry.

WILLIAM BUEHRLE

Having long since passed the allotted span of man's days, the proverbial three score years and ten, William Buehrle, of Monterey, is still progressive in his ideas and interested in the welfare of his county.

He is a native of Indiana, born November 17, 1840. He received his schooling at New Riegel, Ohio, where he resided for a time. In the year 1869, however, he came to Pulaski county, and this has since remained his home. In the year 1861 he enlisted in the army, but was wounded in battle and this resulted in his disability for further service.

On the 25th of February, 1868, he was united in marriage to Miss Philomena Riemen, and she has been his faithful helpmate. He was for many years engaged in the general mercantile business, but is now retired from active labor. He served the county as treasurer for two terms of two years each, and was elected county commissioner for three years.

ROLLIN H. BUNCH, M. D.

Dr. Rollin H. Bunch has, for a number of years, been a prominent figure in the professional, business and municipal life of the city of Muncie. He is a native of Indiana, born on the 12th day of December, 1881. He attended the public schools of Muncie and took a course at Culver Military Academy. His medical studies were then pursued at Bennett Medical College and the American Medical College, both Chicago institutions; and after his graduation he returned to Muncie, entering into partnership with his father, Dr. Robert A. Bunch, his brother Fred L. Bunch and Morrel M. Bunch, the latter now of Oshkosh, Wis. This partnership continued until the death of the father in 1912.

In the year 1902 Dr. Bunch was united in marriage to Miss Ruth Racer, who has since presided over his home and dispensed its hospitality.

In the fall of 1909 he was elected city councilman, his term of office expiring with the close of 1913, at which time he was elected to fill the most important office within the gift of the people of Muncie, that of mayor of the city, his tenure of office to cover a period of four years. Throughout his career he has shown the spirit of a conscientious and progressive citizen, and is a man eminently fitted for the great responsibilities in his care.

HENRY WASHINGTON BULLOCK

The name of Henry Washington Bullock is known throughout the state as that of an authority on legal and legislative affairs.

Mr. Bullock was born on a farm in Jackson township, Clay county, Indiana, on the 10th day of September, 1866. He attended the public schools of his district and later continued his studies at the University of Valparaiso.

After he located in the city of Indianapolis, his interests centered there and his activities were marked with success. He took a vital interest in movements for the public welfare, and many of the most effective laws on our statute books were drawn by him, notably the law to establish free employment bureaus, in 1909; to regulate private employment agencies, in the same year; the employer's liability bill and the dangerous occupation bill, both passed in 1911. In 1913 he was chairman of a commission appointed by Governor Ralston to draft a workman's compensation act, and in 1915 and 1916 he was a member of the national commission on uniform state laws. In this connection also he was a frequent contributor to magazines, and an annotator of law books.

The workmen's compensation law was passed by the Democratic Indiana legislature among the first of all the states, and afterwards held its reputation as being one of the best laws on the subject adopted by any legislature anywhere. It stood the test of time and its reputation was such among liability insurance companies of the country, with whom the compensation board has to deal, that other states sent their commissioners and secretaries to Indianapolis to study not only the law, but its workings under the first Indiana board. Most of these other states not only adopted the law but also adopted the rules under which the Indiana Board worked.

Mr. Bullock descended from a long line of patriotic American ancestors, his great grandfather, Nathaniel Bullock, having served in Captain Bryan's company of infantry, McDonald's regiment of N. C. militia, war of 1812; in service under command of Col. John Bowman in 1780 and Col. Benjamin Logan of Virginia in 1782, under General George Rogers Clark in the Revolutionary war. On his mother's side he is the greatgrandson of Peter Helton, of Benj. Goo's company, Austin's regiment, S. C., war of 1812.

Mr. Bullock is a member of the Indiana Bar Association, the Commercial Law League of America, the Press Club and numerous civic bodies, and prominent in the fraternal order of Masons, Knights of Pythias, Odd Fellows, Elks, Moose and Red Men.

HENRY BULTMAN, JR.

Henry Bultman, Jr., a native of Ripley county, and known throughout its confines as an active party worker and the incumbent of the office of sheriff, needs no introduction to the citizens of that locality. He was born in Delaware township on November 19, 1870, and received his education in the public schools. Early in life he engaged in the pursuit of agriculture for himself and is now the owner of a fine farm in Delaware township.

On April 26, 1893, Mr. Bultman was united in marriage to Miss Virginia Baylor, who has proved a faithful helpmate and the presiding genius of his home.

Elected to the position of sheriff of the county in 1914, Mr. Bultman was candidate for re-election to this position. He has been an active party worker, serving for several years as precinct committeeman, and attending many county congressional and state conventions. He is a member of the orders of Masons, Odd Fellows, and Modern Woodmen of America.

JOHN W. BURNS

Mr. John W. Burns, a leading citizen and honored public official of Bartholomew county, is a native of the Hoosier state, born in Jackson county on the 27th day of March, 1866.

His boyhood and youth were spent in Jackson county, where he received his schooling, in the public schools of his district. In the year 1882 he came to Bartholomew county, and here, in the city of Columbus, his interests are centered.

On the 24th day of September, 1903, he was united in marriage to Miss Mary J. Stader, and their home, then established, has extended hospitality to many friends throughout the county.

In the fall of the year 1912 Mr. Burns was elected sheriff of the county, his term of service extending until January 1, 1915. During his tenure of this office he displayed unusual ability and zeal in the administration of the affairs involved. Indeed it has been stated by those in position to judge that it is agreed by his Democratic constituents and conceded by the Republicans of the county that Mr. Burns proved the best official in this position which Bartholomew county ever had.

He has been a loyal worker in the ranks of the Democratic party since his youth, and has rendered valued services to the local organization.

ROBERT A. BUTLER

Robert A. Butler needs no introduction to the citizens of Warren county, having, for many years, been closely identified with the business and political life of the community, and noted among his constituents as being the only Democrat to hold office in the county, having been elected to this office with a majority of over two hundred.

Mr. Butler is a native of this locality, born in Warren county on the 24th day of September, 1868. His education was received in the public schools of his district, and on the 11th day of November, 1897, he was united in marriage to Miss Emma Milligan and their permanent home was established. During the years which have since intervened, Mrs. Butler has been his able assistant in his many and varied undertakings.

In the year 1904 he was elected township trustee, and in this capacity served with diligence for a term of four years. In 1908 he was elected to the still greater responsibilities of county commissioner, and for three years these duties were faithfully discharged.

Mr. Butler is well known as an extensive farmer, owning and managing several hundred acres of land; and his abilities as an auctioneer of farms and other utilities are known throughout western Indiana and eastern Illinois. For six months he was president of the Warren County Bank, but resigned in order that his full time might be given to private affairs.

He is an active member of Warren Lodge No. 38 F. and A. M., is also affiliated with the B. P. O. Elks, No. 143, of Lafayette, and is an active member of the Jackson Club of that place.

FRANK CALLAHAN

Frank Callahan's election in 1913 as mayor of East Chicago was the elevation to chief executive position of a man whose accomplishments in business had thoroughly justified the honor.

He was born at Flint, Mich., December 11, 1876, son of James and Ellen Callahan.

After completing his schooling he entered his father's office as a contractor, until coming to Indiana Harbor in March, 1904, where he engaged in the same business, building many of the prominent structures of that locality.

Mr. Callahan is secretary-treasurer of the Calumet Laundry; president of the Commercial Club Auxiliary association and one of the organizers of the Commercial Club.

It was as a Democrat in politics, though more particularly in recognition of his qualifications, that he was elected mayor.

He was married to Elizabeth Marwick of Chicago on April 6th, 1905, and to them have been born four sons and one daughter.

Mr. Callahan is a member of the Catholic church and is affiliated with the Knights of Columbus and Elks.

VICTOR CAMP

The present treasurer of Lagrange county, Mr. Victor Camp, bears the record of having been a most efficient official, zealous in the performance of his duty and progressive in his methods of work.

Mr. Camp was born in the State of Ohio, near Dundee, on the 12th day of September, 1864, but at the age of six years accompanied his parents to Indiana.

He attended the public schools of his district, the high school of Lagrange and later graduated in the commercial course at Valparaiso University, Valparaiso, Ind.

In the year 1901 he assumed the duties of assessor of Clay township, Lagrange county, and in this capacity he served a four-year term with much credit. On the 1st of January, 1914, he became the treasurer of the county, the first Democrat to hold this position of responsibility, and so well did he serve that he was renominated in the fall of that year.

Mr. Camp finds his greatest pleasure in the pursuit of agriculture, and in this work also he has been successful.

Mrs. Camp, to whom he was married June 5, 1911, was formerly Miss Bertha Stine.

BARTLETT H. CAMPBELL

Bartlett H. Campbell, a native of Madison county, and now a prominent attorney of Elwood, was born April 14, 1862. He attended the public schools of Anderson, graduating from the high school in June, 1879, and later studied law with the firms of Schwin & McMahan and Robinson & Lovett, being admitted to the bar in May, 1892.

In 1884 he was appointed assistant postmaster of Anderson, serving for four years, after which he became deputy sheriff under James Etchison. He was a member of the school board for six years, resigning in 1892 when he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county. In 1896 he served as presidential elector from the Eighth District; and from 1898 to 1900 was chairman of the Democratic county central committee. In 1900 he was elected a member of the state central committee. From 1902 to 1906 he was city attorney of Anderson under Mayor John L. Forkner. In 1907 he located in Elwood, and three years later was elected city attorney, serving until 1914.

Mr. Campbell is now engaged in the practice of law and is known throughout the State as an able attorney and active worker for the cause of Democracy. For the past twenty-five years he has attended all county and state conventions of the party. He is an active member of the Indiana Democratic Club and is also affiliated with the Masons, B. P. O. Elks and Royal Arcanum.

Mrs. Campbell, to whom he was married on July 7, 1883, was formerly Miss Luella Wright.

FRANK E. CAMPBELL

Mr. Frank E. Campbell, a well known member of the Jay county Democracy, has been for a number of years closely identified with the business life of Redkey and vicinity.

He was born in Jay county on the 2nd day of December, 1869, and attended the schools of Redkey. Following his graduation here, he entered Valparaiso Normal School, completing a business course.

Returning to his home at Redkey, he engaged in contracting, and very successful has he been in his chosen work, many of the leading business buildings and residences of the community being evidence of his handiwork.

Mr. Campbell has, since attaining his majority, been a loyal worker in the ranks of the Democratic organization, and for the past eighteen years has been a member of the county committee. He has been a regular attendant at the district conventions of the party, and in the year 1912 was a delegate to the state convention. He was appointed postmaster of Redkey January 12, 1915.

Mrs. Campbell, to whom he was united in marriage on the 8th day of March, 1911, was formerly Miss Augusta A. Kehrer.

CARROLL W. CANNON

Carroll W. Cannon, a native and life-long resident of Starke county, has demonstrated his ability in various lines of endeavor, but in the educational field his career has been noteworthy.

Mr. Cannon was born in the town of Knox, Starke county, on the 17th day of December, 1883, and here his life has been spent. He attended the public schools of Knox, graduating from the high school with the class of 1902. Later a course in the higher branches was pursued at the university of Valparaiso. Returning to Starke county, he entered the field of education, teaching in the schools of the county with marked success.

On the 21st day of September, 1907, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Edna Myers, and their home, established in Knox, has extended hospitality to many friends during the intervening years. A little daughter, Eleanor Edna, born in 1914, also adds interest to their home.

In 1911 he was elected to the position of county superintendent of schools, and his labors in this field have been marked by a vital interest in his work, rare tact in meeting the many perplexing problems connected with the development of the youthful mind and progressive methods which have placed the schools in his care on a high plane of scholarship.

Mr. Cannon is an active member of the Knox Christian church and an enthusiastic worker in the Sunday-school. He is also heavily interested in farming.

Fraternally, he is affiliated with the Knox Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons, No. 639; Order Eastern Star, Tippecanoe-Winamac No. 96, and the Yellow River Lodge, I. O. O. F. He is a member of an old and prominent family, the men of whom have all consistently stood for the principles of Democracy.

THOMAS C. CARMICHAEL

The name of Thomas Carmichael is familiar to every citizen of southeastern Indiana, being that of the present mayor of the city of Aurora and a prominent worker in the Democratic party in this section for many years. He is a native Hoosier, his birth occurring on the first day of February, 1878. He attended the public and high schools of his district, graduating in 1902. On the third day of May, 1905, he was united in marriage to Miss Clara A. Barkley, and in their home life they have gathered about them a wide circle of friends. On the 15th day of September, 1910, he assumed the duties of mayor of Aurora, his term of office expiring January 1, 1914; and in the fall of 1913 was re-elected to this important position for a further term of four years.

Mr. Carmichael is affiliated with the fraternal orders of Masons, Knights of Pythias and Red Men.

C. E. CARNEY, M. D.

Dr. C. E. Carney was born in Logansport, Indiana, on the 23rd day of May, 1868, and in this city his schooling was received. Following his graduation from the public schools, he attended the Indiana Medical College, in Indianapolis, graduating in the year 1895, taking up the active practice of medicine in the town of Pymont in the same year. Later a post-graduate course was taken in the Rush Medical College, and in the year 1903 he moved to Delphi. On the 10th day of November, 1898, he was married to Miss Della Pettigean of Tippecanoe county, and to them have been born three children, all of whom are now living. He has always been an active Democratic worker, and in the year 1904 was elected coroner of Carroll county on this ticket. His father was also an energetic worker in the cause of Democracy, and the son assisted at the polls at the age of fifteen years. Dr. Carney has many times been a delegate to county, district and state conventions, and is a member of the Indiana Democratic Club of Indianapolis, the order of Masons and Knights of Pythias.

CHARLES E. CARROLL

Charles E. Carroll of Hartford City is known as one of the substantial farmers of Blackford county. He was born in Blackford county, May 17, 1870. His father was one of the "Forty-niner" emigrants to California and invested his earnings from the California gold fields very wisely in Indiana land. Mr. Carroll was educated in the public schools of Hartford City, and since his majority has served upon the Democratic county committee. In 1910 he was elected a member of the county council of Blackford county, but resigned when elected joint representative for Blackford and Grant counties in 1912. He was a member of the committee on highways in the legislature of 1913, and was known as one of the hard working members of the committee. One of the notable measures reported by this committee at that session was the Spencer-Hawkins bill. Mr. Carroll is known as one of the most extensive and successful farmers of the state, having managed a farm of 900 acres since he was sixteen years of age. He makes a specialty of high class Poll-Durham and Hereford cattle and Duroc-Jersey hogs.

Mr. Carroll was appointed by the governor in 1904 as Indiana delegate to the Farmers' National Congress, and has been re-appointed biennially since that time. In 1913 he delivered an address to that body which attracted much attention. He has been an active member of the Wool Growers' Association and of the Indiana Cattle Feeders' Association for the past fifteen years. Notwithstanding Mr. Carroll has always found many duties to perform as a large farmer and stock breeder, and also through his devotion to the principles of the Democratic party, he has found time for social and fraternal affairs, being an active member of the Elks, Knights of Pythias and Eagles.

JOHN A. CARTWRIGHT

One of the ablest, as well as the oldest, citizens of Carroll county is John A. Cartwright. He was born in Trumbull county, Ohio, November 17, 1830, educated in the public schools of his district and at Mt. Union Seminary; and after moving to Wells county, Indiana, in 1851, attended Indiana University, graduating in 1855. In 1856 he began his career as a school teacher, taking charge of the schools of Delphi in 1859, which position he held for three years. In 1860 he was married to Susannah Hiatt, of Tippecanoe county, and to them were born five children, three of whom are now living. For fifteen consecutive years, 1872 to 1887, he served as Democratic county chairman, and has been a delegate to many conventions of the party. Was mayor of Delphi one term, county auditor eight years, representative one term, and has the honor of being the oldest Mason in the county. He has been in the banking business twenty years, and is now president of Delphi State Bank.

MARVIN H. CASE

Closely identified with the business interests of Parke county and vicinity and for many years an active worker in the ranks of the party is Marvin H. Case, of Rockville.

Mr. Case is essentially a Parke county product, born within its confines on the 10th day of July, 1835. He received his schooling in the country schools of his district and later attended Bloomingdale Academy. Early in life he entered into the pursuit of agriculture for himself, tilling the soil with characteristic diligence and energy and breeding fine cattle, hogs and sheep extensively. His holdings grew steadily, and before the coming of the years when the heavy labors of the farm became a burden, he had amassed a competence. He is now the holder of about two thousand acres of land abundantly stocked with fine live stock. He is also vice-president of the Rockville National Bank and a heavy stockholder in the McKean National Bank of Terre Haute.

His father, who emigrated to Indiana from New York, was a Whig and late cast his lot with the Republicans, but he has always been an old-line Democrat, adhering strongly to the principles promulgated by Thomas Jefferson. In the year 1880 Mr. Case was elected township trustee, and in this position served for two years. His position in the locality now is one of influence, and disagreements among various families of the neighborhood are frequently brought to him for adjustment and settlement.

Fraternally, he is allied with the Free and Accepted Masons, being an active member of the Catlin Lodge No. 402.

Mrs. Case, to whom he was married March 28, 1863, was formerly Miss Sarah E. Hartman.

GEORGE LEO CASSIDY

George Leo Cassidy, a loyal worker in the cause of true Democracy and an active member of the legal profession in Indianapolis, is a native of the state of Rhode Island, his birth having occurred in that state on the 19th day of February, 1888. He attended the schools of Woonsocket, R. I., and was graduated from the high school of that place. He also took a commercial course in his native state before he came to Indiana. In the year 1910 he entered the University of Valparaiso, Indiana, and after a course there entered the American Central Law School, where his legal studies were completed. He was admitted to the bar of the state in 1912.

In the short time devoted to the practice of his profession Mr. Cassidy has evinced keen insight into the various phases of questions before him, and has been diligent and loyal to the interests of his clients, characteristics which inevitably make for success.

In the year 1914 Mr. Cassidy was candidate in the primaries for the legislature, and, although defeated, made a splendid race.

Mr. Cassidy is a member of the Marion county and state bar associations and is taking a deep interest in municipal affairs.

WALTER SCOTT CHAMBERS

Walter Scott Chambers was born in Newcastle, Ind., in June, 1870, and has never strayed from the town of his nativity; was educated in the schools of that city and graduated in 1888. Later he attended Indiana University and Wisconsin University. Not having been born in a log cabin, nor reared on a farm, nor having taught school, he had none of the qualifications of greatness, so settled down to the life of a country editor, although educated for the law. His father was David W. Chambers, an attorney, a captain in the Civil war, twice a member of the Democratic state central committee during the eighties and a candidate for Congress in 1876.

In 1895 the subject of this sketch bought the Newcastle Democrat and struggled along with it for several years. In 1909 he started the Daily Times and is still publishing these papers. Has been president of Democratic Editorial Association, was appointed by Governor Marshall as a trustee of Central Insane Hospital and served until 1914, when he was elected to the state senate. There he served four years, and at this time is a candidate for re-election. He was several times chairman of the Henry County Democratic committee and for the past six years has been the Sixth District member of the Democratic state committee.

He was married in 1903 to Adaline Beam, of Newcastle. Four children came to brighten the home—Harriett, Scott, Ruth and Mary—but Ruth died in 1911.

In addition to newspaper and political positions Mr. Chambers was one of the organizers and a director of the Central Trust and Savings Company of Newcastle in 1902, and remained with it until the first of 1918, when he resigned to take the presidency of the First National Bank of Newcastle.

ALBERT T. CHAPMAN

Has served as representative from Howard county in the general assembly of the State (elected November 5, 1912); enjoys the unique distinction of being the first Democrat ever elected to office in this county; and this gentleman received a plurality in the last election of 491, truly an enviable showing.

Albert T. Chapman is one of the young men who are forming so strong an element in the present success of the party; and his zeal and loyalty have placed him in the front rank of influential workers in Howard county. He was born near the town of West Middleton, his present home, on the 16th day of January, 1887; and attended the public schools of the township, graduating with the class of 1903. Later a course of study was taken at the Marion Normal College, from which he graduated in the year 1909. The ensuing years were spent in teaching in the county schools, and, though so young, he has for some time held the position of principal of the schools of Alton, the former home of Senator John W. Kern.

Mr. Chapman is of Scotch-Irish descent, and finds his greatest pleasure in the labors of the farm, the pursuit in which he is at present engaged. Fraternally, he is allied with the Order of Masons, and the Red Men, in both of which orders he is well known and highly esteemed.

ALBERT A. CHARLES

Albert A. Charles, a well-known business man of Kokomo, belongs to that element of society which forms the bone and sinew of our society and our body politic, the sterling business man who is yet deeply interested in civic affairs and seeking the best for the community.

Mr. Charles was born in Brighton, New Jersey, December 3, 1852, and there his youth was spent and his schooling obtained. In the year 1887 he came to Indiana and located in Kokomo, where his interests have since centered.

Prior to her marriage, Mr. Charles' wife was Miss Lydia Reiley.

Mr. Charles is now president of the Kokomo Steel Wire Company, and is well known in the business life of the city. He is affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and is a trustee of the Grace Methodist church.

JOHN C. CHENEY

John C. Cheney, rated as one of the most active and effective workers in the ranks of the Democratic party in Shelby county, like many of the other leading Democrats of that section was born and always lived there. The date of his birth was November 29, 1867. He was the son of John C. Cheney, a Shelbyville merchant.

He completed his education, after the Shelbyville graded and high schools, at the Indiana Law School of the University of Indianapolis, and was admitted to practice in 1897, opening his office at Shelbyville, where he remained in continuous practice. He married Minnie B. Boyd of Shelbyville, in 1894.

Mr. Cheney served for several years as secretary of the Democratic committee of Shelby county. He served as city attorney of Shelbyville from 1904 to 1908 and in the latter year was elected prosecuting attorney of Shelby county, being re-elected in 1910 and 1912, retiring in 1914. In both offices he made a splendid record, as testified in the two return terms by popular vote.

As one of the leading spirits in the event, the people remember the part taken by Mr. Cheney in one of the historical political rallies in Shelby county, this being in 1896, when David B. Hill insisted on seeing one of the barbecues for which the Shelby Democracy had become famous. It is described as "one of the grandest affairs ever staged and one in which the whole county took part, eliminating political lines to hear David B. Hill speak."

CHARLES N. CHRISTEN

The name of Charles N. Christen is so well known to the Democracy of Indiana as to need little introduction. A native of Indiana, he was born on the 17th day of February, 1872, and was married August 12, 1903, to Miss Amelia Smith. His education was received in the schools of Adams county, and later he became identified with the business life of the city of Decatur through his services as an architect and building contractor. He is also president of the plumbing firm of Christen & Smith, and in the year 1906 he was elected councilman of the city, which position he filled conscientiously and loyally until the fall of 1913, at which time he was called to fill the office of mayor of the city of Decatur, taking office January 1, 1914.

FRANK P. CHRISTOPH

Frank P. Christoph's name stands conspicuously forth as that of an official of St. Joseph county. Mr. Christoph was born in Erie, Pennsylvania, December 14, 1858, a son of Frank and Magdalena Christoph, both natives of Germany, who came to this country in their early life. Mr. Christoph received his early education in Erie, attending a Catholic school. At the age of seventeen he engaged in railroad work, and has since been in the employ of many of the big companies from New York to San Francisco. For two years he was with the Mishawaka Woolen Company. In 1906 he was elected clerk of St. Joseph county. He previously had served as marshal of Mishawaka. In 1884 he was married to Miss Minnie Smith of Mishawaka. They have two children, Hazel F. and Frank H.

Mr. Christoph has always been an active Democrat, laboring earnestly for the adoption of the principles which he believes will best advance good government. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, Knights of the Maccabees, and Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

GEORGE WASHINGTON CHOLER

Having achieved success in educational work and demonstrated his ability in the pursuit of agriculture, George Washington Choler has also proved his versatility by being a most efficient incumbent of the office of clerk of the circuit court of Lagrange county.

Mr. Choler was born in Lagrange county, Indiana, on the 24th day of June, 1870, and attended the common schools of his district. In the year 1890 he graduated from the Lagrange high school.

On the 2nd day of August, 1898, his marriage to Miss Maude May Long was solemnized, and the home then established in Lagrange county has extended hospitality to a host of friends.

For ten years after leaving high school he was engaged as instructor in the schools of his home county, later, however, devoting his energies exclusively to farming, in which profession he excelled. In the fall of 1912 he was elected to the position of clerk of the circuit court of Lagrange county, and assumed the duties of office on the first day of the following January.

Since attaining his majority he has been an active party worker and has served as delegate to several state conventions.

JOHN H. CLAMME

John H. Clamme, of Hartford City, was born in Blackford county, September 12, 1876, and was married to Miss Bessie E. Grooves, the only daughter of Aaron Grooves, January 25, 1902. Mr. Clamme is of French origin, his father having emigrated from France to the United States in the year 1872. From early years Mr. Clamme has taken an ardent interest in the success of the Democratic party. In 1906 he was elected sheriff of Blackford county, being at that time the youngest sheriff in the State of Indiana. So general was the satisfaction which he gave to the people of Blackford county in his official capacity that in 1908 he was re-elected by the largest majority ever given in the county to any candidate of either party for any county office. From 1909 to 1913 he served as secretary to the Democratic city central committee.

After his retirement from office he returned to the farm, where he engaged in the breeding of high-class Polled Durham cattle and Poland China hogs, in which business he is widely known in northeastern Indiana.

CHARLES J. CLAMME

Charles J. Clamme of Hartford City was born in Blackford county, March 8, 1878. He was educated in the county schools of Blackford county, and on December 21, 1901, was married to Miss Arminda Emshwiller.

Mr. Clamme has taken an active interest in politics, and has been an ardent Democrat since attaining his majority. In fact, he was elected a member of the Democratic county committee of Blackford county before he became of voting age. He served faithfully as a member of this committee for about eight years. He was elected a member of the county council in 1910, and was unanimously renominated for the same position in 1914.

The name of Clamme Bros. is well known among live stock breeders and farmers. Charles J. Clamme is the largest feeder and shipper of cattle and hogs in Blackford county. He is also general manager of the firm of Clamme Bros., who are general contractors in road and ditch building, and have the reputation of being the largest contractors in their line in northern Indiana. Mr. Clamme has been very successful in a financial way. He was one of the first organizers of the Farmers' Co-operative Club, and was elected the first treasurer of that organization. He is an active member of the Lutheran church.

DAVID M. CLARK

David M. Clark was born on a farm near Bedford, Lawrence county, Indiana, on the 23rd day of March, 1867. Here his childhood and youth were spent, and his education was received in the public schools of his district. He was united in marriage to Miss Katie Armbruster, and in the year 1895 emigrated to Boone county, taking up his residence on a farm near Jamestown. In 1900 he entered the hardware business at Jamestown. Since that time he has been very closely identified with the business and political life of the place, working zealously for the success of the Democratic party, and winning many friends in the community. In the fall of the year 1910 he was elected to the responsible position of auditor of Boone county for a term of four years; and is now living in the city of Lebanon, devoting himself diligently and conscientiously to the duties of this office.

Mr. Clark has taken a deep interest in fraternal affairs, and is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Encampment of Jamestown and Canton No. 2, Indianapolis; the Knights of Pythias and the Order of Red Men of Jamestown.

SALEM D. CLARK

To those who have taken an active interest in legislative affairs in Indiana the name of Salem D. Clark, state senator from Marion county in the assemblies of 1909 and 1911, needs no introduction, for his active participation in the affairs of those bodies and the clean record then established are well known.

Senator Clark was born in the year 1872 on a farm in Washington township, Hendricks county, and here, in the environment of God's out-of-doors, his boyhood was spent. He attended the schools of his district, graduating in the year 1889, and continuing his studies at the Central Normal College of Danville. Then followed a course of study at Valparaiso University, and, finally, his legal studies were taken up at the Indiana Law School, from which he graduated in the year 1898. While pursuing his studies in this latter institution, in the city of Indianapolis, he decided to locate in this city, and accordingly was admitted to the bar of Marion county and entered into active practice. Here he has since remained, building for himself a lucrative clientele and establishing an enviable reputation as a lawyer and legislator.

In the fall of 1908 he was elected senator for Marion county in the general assemblies of 1909 and 1911. During his attendance at the deliberations of these bodies Senator Clark was instrumental in passing the registration law, corrupt practices act, employer's liability law, child labor law, bi-monthly pay law, and many other measures of benefit to the public.

Senator Clark is a member of the Broadway Methodist church, Odd Fellows Lodge No. 465, the Independent Turnverein and the Indiana Democratic club. Mrs. Clark, to whom he was married in 1899, was formerly Miss Emma Pence.

WILLIAM F. CLEVELAND, M. D.

The name of Dr. William F. Cleveland is widely known throughout Vanderburg county and vicinity as that of a prominent physician, a public-spirited citizen and a legislator of note.

He was born in Gibson county, Indiana, on the 23rd day of November, 1855. He attended the schools of his district and graduated from the Ft. Branch High School in the year 1874. In the same year he entered the educational field, and taught in the schools of the county for fifteen years, spending the summer months in the pursuit of agriculture. In the year 1889 he entered the Kentucky School of Medicine, at Louisville, and graduated from this institution with the class of 1892. Locating in the city of Evansville he entered into the active practice of medicine, and in this field has proved himself a master, soon establishing himself in the front rank of his profession.

Dr. Cleveland takes an active interest in political and municipal affairs and was a member of the city council of Evansville for ten years. He served in the 1913 and 1915 general assembly as senator for Vanderburg county.

He is an active member of the Hendricks club, the Ohio Valley Medical Association and the Vanderburg County Medical Society, and is allied with the fraternal orders of Red Men, Knights and Ladies of Honor and Modern Woodmen of the World.

Mrs. Cleveland, to whom he was married November 21, 1882, was formerly Miss Mary E. Prichett.

JOHN J. CLEARY

An active member of Vigo county Democracy since his boyhood and a member of various committees in almost every campaign since before he attained his majority, also closely identified with the business life of Terre Haute for many years, the present postmaster, John J. Cleary, is well known.

He was born in Terre Haute, March 23, 1874, and here he received his schooling, graduating from Wiley High School in June, 1893. Three years later, on the 12th day of August, 1896, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Margaret Louise Hammerstein.

At the age of less than twenty years, in 1893, he assumed the duties of deputy county clerk, and in this capacity served four years. In 1899 he became a member of the firm of Hoermann & Cleary, in the seed business, and afterward organized the Cleary Coal & Supply Co. In June, 1904, he disposed of his holdings in this company and became proprietor of the St. Nicholas Hotel, where he continued until appointed postmaster by President Wilson, March 23, 1914.

He is affiliated with the fraternal orders of Elks, Knights of Columbus, Young Men's Institute and Travelers' Protective Association, and is an active member of the Terre Haute Chamber of Commerce.

JOHN CLEARY

John Cleary, for many years a prominent Democratic worker of Vigo county, was born in Ireland near the town of Limerick, March 27, 1844. Here he attended school, and later served an apprenticeship in the butcher business in the town. At the age of twenty-two years he emigrated to America, locating in Terre Haute, and here the remainder of his life was spent. After a brief interval in the meat business, he became a member of the police force of the city, and later served as deputy sheriff under George Carrico and Lewis Hay, demonstrating in marked manner his efficiency and zeal in this capacity. In 1882 he was elected sheriff by a handsome majority in a Republican county, and two years later was re-elected with a large majority.

He was an active member of the Ancient Order of Hibernians; and in the local Democratic organization was a valuable worker for many years, serving through many campaigns and nearly always a delegate to the state conventions.

On the 9th day of April, 1892, death claimed him, and his loss was mourned by many friends.

JOHN CLERKIN

John Clerkin is a man of unusual attainments, having won a position of distinction in the educational field before entering the legal profession. He was born on a farm in Jennings county, one mile east of Butlerville, January 22, 1873. He attended the public schools and graduated from Butlerville High School in 1893. He continued his studies in Franklin College, Danville Normal School, Valparaiso College and Indiana University at Bloomington.

In June, 1903, while a student at Bloomington, he was elected county superintendent of Jennings county schools, being the first Democrat elected to this office in Jennings county. His first term was highly successful, and in June, 1907, he was re-elected for a second term of four years, although a majority of the trustees were Republicans. In 1911 he was offered the unanimous vote of the board, but declined a third term for the purpose of entering the practice of law, his ambition since boyhood.

Mr. Clerkin's general education, his experience as superintendent of schools, and extensive acquaintance have been most valuable to him in building up a legal practice. In 1913 he was appointed county attorney of Jennings county, and was reappointed in 1914 and 1915.

Mr. Clerkin comes from a family of old-time Democrats and takes an active interest in politics. In October, 1903, he was united in marriage to Miss Grace Gant, and they now live in their home on State street in North Vernon.

WILLIAM HENRY COBLE

A well-known and loyal worker in the ranks of Wabash county Democracy is William Henry Coble, a representative citizen, successful farmer and the incumbent of various positions of trust in the public service.

Mr. Coble is a native of this county, born on the 5th day of April, 1869. He attended the common schools of his district, and from his youth engaged in farming. Descended from a long line of Democratic ancestors, however, he has been true to the traditions of the family and has worked at all times zealously for the furtherance of the cause in his community. For several years he served as township and precinct committeeman, and in the year 1912 was elected to the position of sheriff of the county. At the expiration of his term of two years he was again nominated for this position.

Mrs. Coble, to whom he was married September 22, 1892, was formerly Miss Emma R. Crumrine.

JOHN A. CODY

A roster of the loyal Democratic workers of New Albany would be incomplete were mention not made of John A. Cody, one of the most zealous citizens of that place in his efforts in behalf of the party.

Mr. Cody is a native of the city of New Albany, born in that city on March 4, 1872. He attended Holy Trinity parochial school in his youth and after his graduation became connected with the office force of the Louisville, Henderson and St. Louis Railroad. At the present time he holds the position of chief clerk in the auditor's office of that company.

Since attaining his majority Mr. Cody has worked unceasingly for the success of the Democratic party, was for eighteen years a member of the city committee, and for twelve years acted as chairman of that organization. For ten years he served upon the county central executive committee, and in 1908 was elected president of the Floyd County Democratic Club. In all of these positions of responsibility his conscientious zeal and capacity for organization have stood him in good stead, and he has uniformly served with credit to himself and his constituents. In the year 1914 he was recommended by Congressman W. E. Cox for the position of postmaster of the city of New Albany.

On October 28, 1903, Mr. Cody was united in marriage to Miss Margaret Arnold and their home in the years since has extended its hospitality to a host of friends.

Mr. Cody is an active member of the Knights of Columbus and a deputy in that order.

William L. Coffey was born in Nashville, Ind., September 17, 1866. His father, Judge Richard L. Coffey, was born and reared in Monroe county, this State; educated at Franklin College and Indiana University, graduating from the law department of the latter March 1, 1859. He came to Brown county during the Civil war, soon won a commanding position at the Nashville bar and continued to practice his profession until his death, May 1, 1901. Julia M. Mason, his wife, was a native of Bedford, Ind., and bore her husband five children, the subject of this review being the eldest.

William L. Coffey's youth was spent in Nashville, where he enjoyed the best educational advantages the town afforded. After completing the public school course he was assisted and tutored by his father in special subjects. In 1882 he took up the study of medicine, to which he devoted five years. Returning from college in 1888, he was elected county coroner, serving two years. In 1893 he was induced to take charge of the Nashville schools, and, finding enjoyment in the profession of teaching, abandoned the pursuit of medicine and began preparation for his new work.

Mr. Coffey was at the head of the Nashville schools ten years. His success here won him high honors, and in 1903 he was elected county superintendent.

In 1905 he made a campaign in every school district in the county, demanding that the people give attention to the matter of providing high school training for their children. This effort bore fruit. In 1906 a convention of teachers was called which decided to petition the trustee of Washington township asking for a joint high school at Nashville; and in the spring of 1907 a beautiful building with full equipment for high school work adorned the town. This building stands as a monument to Mr. Coffey's fidelity to the educational interests of his county, and it is fitting that he bear the title of "Father of Nashville High School."

In 1907 Mr. Coffey was unanimously re-elected county superintendent. It is said that he dismissed more inefficient teachers and revoked more licenses than all his predecessors together. A state superintendent said, "No county in the State has shown such marked progress in its schools as has Brown county under Mr. Coffey's supervision."

Declining to serve further as superintendent in 1911, after twenty-five years' connection with the schools, he withdrew to devote his time to business enterprises with which he was connected. In 1908 he was chosen president of the Nashville State Bank, which position he held until 1911, when he assumed the duties of cashier, which position he now holds. He has proven a capable, efficient banker, thoroughly familiar with all details of the banking business.

Mr. Coffey has been a lifelong Democrat and always enthusiastic about his party's success. He is president of the city school board, elder in the Presbyterian church, superintendent of the federated Sunday-schools of Nashville, member of the Masons, K. of P. and Modern Woodmen of America.

On July 2, 1893, Mr. Coffey was married to Rosa B. Clark of Brown county, the union resulting in the birth of five children, two girls and three boys—L. Marie, William Wendell, Alton Powell, Arthur Livingston and Eugenia Marguerite.

CHARLES A. COLE

Charles A. Cole, a leading attorney of Miami county, and the holder of various positions of trust during the years since he attained his majority, is highly esteemed throughout the legal profession of the state as legislator and jurist.

He is a native of Indiana, born on the 21st day of March, 1855. He attended the district school of Peru township, Miami county, and later graduated from the Peru High School with the class of 1872. Then followed a course of study at Indiana University. He studied law in the office of Lyman Walker at Peru, Indiana, and in the year 1878 was admitted to the bar and entered the practice of his profession in Peru. In 1880 he was elected to the legislature of Indiana as representative from Miami county. He also served as county attorney for four years, and was a member of the Peru School Board from 1904 to 1907. In 1908 he became the senior member of the law firm of Cole and Cole, the junior member being his son, Albert Harvey Cole. He is now judge of the Miami Circuit Court, to which position he was elected in 1914.

Mrs. Cole, to whom he was married December 3, 1884, was formerly Miss Elizabeth Shirk.

HUGH COLVIN

An honored public official of Scott county for many years, Hugh Colvin is well known in this locality.

He was born in this county on the 11th day of December, 1856, and attended the public schools of Scott and Clark counties. On the 17th of September, 1877, he was united in marriage to Miss Annetta Hartman and their home was established in Scottsburg, where he became the proprietor of a thriving blacksmith and implement business. In the year 1886 he was elected township trustee, and in this position served until 1890, at which time he was elected to the position of county treasurer; and at the expiration of two years was re-elected to this position. Again, on the 1st day of January, 1913, he assumed the duties and responsibilities of this position, and in the campaign of 1914 was the candidate for re-election.

He has been an active party worker and has missed but two state conventions in the past twenty-five years.

JOSEPH COMBS

The ancestors of the Combs family were of Holland descent, and settled in New Jersey prior to the Revolutionary war. One of the earliest known, John Combs, served as a captain in the struggle for independence. Joseph Combs is a native of Clinton county, Indiana, and was born on a farm in Washington township, November 15, 1860. His father was Nathan B. Combs, Sr., and was one of the pioneers in that county, locating there in 1856, when the country was one vast forest. He came from Butler county, Ohio. The family has been Democratic from the time of the formation of the party under Thomas Jefferson.

Joseph grew up on the farm and became used to all of the hardships of the early pioneer. About nine months of every year was spent in helping to clear and improve the farm, and about three months in the district school, where he obtained a common school education. He attended several terms of the local county normal, and the state normal school at Terre Haute, and prepared himself for teaching. He taught in the district schools for six years, and then began the study of law in the office of Judge J. C. Suit, in Frankfort, and was admitted to the bar in 1886. In 1890 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the 45th Judicial Circuit, and served in that office for two years, making a very creditable record for efficiency and ability. Later he entered the practice of law in the firm of Brumbaugh & Combs, which continued for eight years, and where he was successful as a lawyer. From 1901 to 1908 he practiced law alone, and was city attorney for Frankfort from 1906 to 1908.

In June, 1908, he was nominated on the Democratic ticket for judge of the Clinton Circuit Court, after a hard contest with four members of the Clinton county bar. The county was then very close politically, and after a spirited and exciting campaign he defeated Judge Claybaugh, the Republican candidate, for re-election, by a plurality of 100. From the first his record on the bench has been creditable to himself and his party. He at once gave evidence of his desire to be fair and impartial to all, regardless of whether they had been for or against him in the contest for election. He became a hard worker and gave close attention to all of the business of the court, and long before his first term expired he had practically the unanimous support of his own party, and many warm friends in the Republican party. He was re-nominated by acclamation by the Democrats in 1914, and re-elected by over 900 plurality, the first judge to be re-elected in the district for forty years. He received the support of many Republicans, Progressives, and other parties, leading all the other candidates by many hundreds.

ISAIAH CONNER

Isaiah Conner, one of the most favorably known citizens of Fulton county, was born near Marion, Ind., August 4, 1838, the son of Nelson and Sarah (Boots) Conner, the father being born in South Carolina and the mother in Scotland. They had seven children who survived infancy, Isaiah being the third. He was brought up mostly on a farm. His early education was obtained in the Quaker school near Marion, a school supported by subscription funds, and unquestionably the best in the county. After leaving here he took an academic course at Marion, following which he began the study of law at Marion with the firm of Van Devanter & McDowell, and was there admitted to the bar. He chose other pursuits, however, until 1867, at which time he took up the practice of law, locating in 1869 in Rochester, where he soon had a large clientage and won a good reputation as a lawyer.

In November, 1884, he was elected judge of the Forty-first Judicial Circuit, composing the counties of Fulton and Marshall. He held the office one term, six years, and upon retiring from the bench in November, 1890, the bars of both counties adopted resolutions in which the high esteem in which he was held was expressed, and on the same occasion he received from the Marshall county bar a gold-headed cane and from the Fulton county bar a fine office desk and chair. Since retiring from the office of judge he has continued in the active practice of law and became the head of the well-known firm of Conner & Rowley, which for many years stood in the front of the law practice of northern Indiana.

Mr. Conner has always, since he was old enough to take any part in politics, been a Democrat, and is a great admirer of one of the greatest and most democratic presidents who ever filled that office—Woodrow Wilson.

On January 26, 1862, Mr. Conner married Miss Talitha Line, who was the daughter of Jacob and Nancy (Wallace) Line. She was born near Marion, October 15, 1841, and died at Rochester, July 18, 1895, having been an invalid for many years. No children were born of this marriage and therefore the husband bears alone the sorrows of the greatest grief which can come upon anyone in this world.

JAMES MILO CONAWAY

The name of Conaway is familiar, not only to the adherents of Democracy in Dearborn county, but to the community at large; for the family, consisting of the father and five sons, have for many years been active in the councils and work of the party. One of the brothers, James Milo Conaway, a prominent business man, with whom this review has to deal, has given generously of his time as well as his means to further the Democratic cause in his community. He was born on the 9th day of February, 1882, in Ohio county, Indiana, and received his education in the public schools of Ohio and Dearborn counties. In the year 1904 he cast his first vote for William J. Bryan and since that time has served his party actively in each campaign, attending the various conventions held in the county, district and state, and laboring diligently for the success of the cause.

In March, 1907, Mr. Conaway was united in marriage to Miss Lyda Phillips and they have gathered about them a large circle of friends.

Mr. Conaway has taken a deep interest in the fraternal affairs of Aurora, and is now president of the fraternal order of Eagles, and an active member of the Mutual Aid association. Throughout his career, whether in his own affairs or in the affairs of the public, he has been aggressive and progressive, keeping abreast of the times and evincing a deep interest in all movements tending toward the betterment of the community.

HOMER L. COOK

The official records during his term as secretary of the state of Indiana, and during all the time he served the people as a public official, are sufficient commendation for the good work of Homer L. Cook of Indianapolis. An investigation of the records for the administration of Mr. Cook, and a comparison of these with the records of others in the same place, makes the Cook service stand out conspicuously for its excellence in line of efficiency and economy of management.

Homer L. Cook was born in Wabash, Indiana, in 1867, a member of a large family. It was due to his individual effort, work and ambition that success came to him. When he moved with his parents to Indianapolis, the same industry, energy, ambition and vision carried him forward. He became interested in school work and was elected county superintendent of schools.

This work led into other fields. He was always an active worker for the Democratic party. He was elected a member of the House of Representatives, 1911 and 1913, where he served as speaker during a session in which there was more constructive legislation placed upon the statutes of Indiana than during any other term of any legislature ever assembled. It was all good Democratic legislation, the result of the best thought and combined efforts of the Marshall and Ralston administrations.

Mr. Cook became the candidate of his party for secretary of state and was elected to the term beginning in 1914. Following his retirement from this office he returned to the management of Cook's Educational Agency in Indianapolis.

WALTER DOUGLAS COOK

Since his great-grandfather journeyed from Guilford county, North Carolina, the family of Walter Douglas Cook has been numbered among the representative citizens of Wayne county.

Mr. Cook was born on a farm in this county on the 28th day of October, 1885. Here he attended the schools of his district, graduating from the high school. Later he graduated from the University of Valparaiso with the degree of B. S., and continued his work with a three-year course at the State Normal School of Terre Haute. Special work was also taken at Earlham College, and he entered the educational field well equipped for the work. For twenty-eight years, in Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin, he taught in the public schools, but in 1911 became a traveling salesman.

In 1898 he was elected representative for Wayne county to the legislature, polling the largest vote ever given this official in the county.

Mrs. Cook, to whom he was married October 28, 1885, was formerly Miss Cora Lycan; and as the presiding genius of their home she has drawn about them a wide circle of friends.

ALLEN F. COOPER

Has served as county treasurer of Hancock county, coming to the position well equipped for the administration of its affairs, and conversant with municipal matters and their requirements.

Mr. Allen F. Cooper is a native of this state, born in Hancock county on the 10th day of November, 1862. He attended the public schools of Greenfield, and has since remained in the home of his childhood. In the year 1893 he was united in marriage to Miss Anna Conn, and she has been his faithful helpmate through the years that have passed.

In 1899 he was elected a member of the city council, serving in this capacity for two years, assuming the duties of the position with the beginning of the following year. In 1912 he was elected county treasurer, his term of office to extend for two years, beginning with 1918. He was re-elected in 1914, thus serving four years in this capacity.

During his long residence in Greenfield, he has won a large circle of friends, and his devotion to the duties entrusted to him is a matter of note in the community.

WALTER G. CORY

Walter G. Cory was born in Marion county, Indiana, July 23, 1874. He attended the public schools and was employed as a messenger boy in Indianapolis. In this capacity he had the honor of carrying to Hon. Benjamin Harrison the notice of his nomination to the presidency of the United States in 1888. Later Mr. Cory found employment in a grocery, but at the age of twenty-four years located upon a farm in Jefferson township, Boone county. Here he was married to Miss Eva Hill, also a resident of Boone county, and here their permanent home was established. The grandfather of Mr. Cory was the first judge in the old court house; his father was in the mail service under President Cleveland; and he himself was a member of the county board of tax review, appointed by Judge Parr. He is now a member of the orders of F. and A. M. and the Knights of Pythias.

JUDGE CHARLES E. COX

In politics one of the most earnest, active and best grounded in reasons for the faith, as an attorney one of the ablest, as a judge recognized by the people of all parties as one of the best jurists who ever sat as a member of the supreme court of the state of Indiana. Nothing could better describe the recognized standing of Judge Charles E. Cox, and the esteem in which he is held by the people.

Charles E. Cox was a native Hoosier, born on a farm in Hamilton county, February 21, 1860. His paternal great-grandfather was one of the patriotic fighting Quakers of North Carolina and a warm friend of General Greene. The family conducted a water-power mill on Deep river at the time of the Revolutionary war and before.

At this mill "The Regulators," an organization born to resist the tyranny of the royal governor of North Carolina, was formed and was responsible for the "Tryon" rebellion in 1769. As a result this great-grandfather, with others, was arrested and charged with treason to the English government. A maternal great-grandfather was a Virginia surveyor and moved into Kentucky with Daniel Boone.

The immediate ancestors of Charles E. Cox were Aaron Cox and Mary A. Skaggs, who were married in Ohio in 1844 and shortly thereafter came to Indiana, where they reared a large family and died in the fullness of years with the respect of all who had known them. Among the children were three who especially made their impress on the history of the state as Democrats, lawyers and judges. These were Jabez T. Cox of Peru, Indiana, the oldest, who served two terms as judge of the circuit court of Miami county; Millard F. Cox, one time judge of the criminal court of Marion county and long actively connected with the publicity bureau of the Democratic state central committee; Charles E. Cox, of whom this brief historical sketch is written.

Charles E. Cox was educated in the public schools of Indiana, and at the age of nineteen moved from the farm to Indianapolis to study law. For this career he had had aspirations which persisted from the time when, as a very small boy, he haunted the court rooms at every opportunity to listen to trials. Shortly after locating in Indianapolis he became a reader of records, briefs and law books pertaining to cases before the supreme court. This work he did for Judge William E. Niblack, then a justice of the state supreme court, this service being required because the sight of the judge was greatly impaired.

Judge Niblack became the kindly and able preceptor in the law of his young aid and the mutual help formed a friendship which continued very close till the death of Judge Niblack. Through this friendship and the young man's interest in the supreme court library, Charles E. Cox was made supreme court librarian and served in this capacity from 1883 to 1889, in which latter year he began the practice of law.

From 1891 to 1894 he was chief deputy under Prosecuting Attorney John W. Holtzman in Marion county. In 1895 he was elected city judge of Indianapolis, the same election in which Thomas Taggart was first elected mayor of Indianapolis. He was elected for a second term, but declined a third term as he wished to return to the practice of his profession.

In 1910 he was elected a judge of the Indiana supreme court, serving in that judgeship for six years. He was nominated for a second term by the Democratic party, but that was the year in which the entire Democratic ticket went to defeat in Indiana, and he lost with the others.

Among the many important cases decided by the supreme court during this period, cases in which Judge Cox wrote the opinions, there were two that attracted especially wide attention, these being the so-called "Marshall constitution" and the "Technical Institute" case.

An intense patriotism, a belief in our governmental structure as being the most effective for the common good ever devised, and in the Democratic party as the most effective instrument to administer it in the spirit in which it was instituted, always characterized Judge Charles E. Cox.

Charles E. Cox and Emma M. Cooley were married in 1884 and have three children: Mrs. Elinor C. Karsten of New York, and two sons, both of whom volunteered in the war against Germany in the first month after the declaration of war and served until its close—Samuel L. Cox as an infantry lieutenant in the National army and Charles E. Cox, Jr., as a lieutenant pilot of a combat plane in the air service.

IRVIN A. COX

The subject of this brief review is a well-known Democrat and prominent business man of Columbus, Indiana. His birth occurred on the 25th day of October, 1868, near the city of Noblesville, in Hamilton county. He attended the schools of Columbus, taking the full high school course, and later attended the normal school of that place. He married Miss Hallie E. Hunt, of Bartholomew county.

That Mr. Cox is held in high esteem by his constituents is evidenced by the fact that he was twice chosen sheriff of his county, serving in that capacity for four years. For five years he was marshal of the town of Hope. Later he served as local statistician for the United States Agricultural Bureau. For the past seventeen years he has been carrying on a large business in live stock.

In the various positions to which he has been called Mr. Cox has served conscientiously and faithfully, and has at all times consistently stood for the principles of Democracy.

JUDGE JOHN E. COX

In the legal profession of Indiana the name of Judge John E. Cox is recognized as that of a leader; while his decisions from the bench have won for him an enviable reputation for strict integrity and broad knowledge of judicial procedure.

Judge Cox is a true son of Vigo county, born within its borders and educated in the public schools of Terre Haute, graduating from the high school of that city in the year 1886. In the same year he entered DePauw University for work in the higher branches, and three years later was graduated from that institution. During his years in college, he also read law with the firm of Smiley & Neff, and later entered the office of I. N. Pierce of Terre Haute. In 1889 he was admitted to the bar of Vigo county and entered upon the active practice of the law, later forming a partnership with Ora D. Davis. His ability as a jurist soon became apparent, and his loyalty to the interests of his clients won for him a rapidly increasing and lucrative practice.

In the year 1906 John E. Cox was elected to the position of judge of the Superior Court. He assumed the duties of that office with the beginning of the following year and at the expiration of his term of four years was re-elected, his conscientious zeal in the conduct of the affairs of the public having won for him an enviable place in the esteem of the people.

Judge Cox retired from the bench January 1, 1915, and again began the practice of law, forming a partnership with Henry Adamson, the firm name being Cox & Adamson. Business came to such an extent that in 1917 T. P. Gallagher became the junior member of the firm, with offices in the Star Building.

In the campaign of 1918 Judge Cox again became a candidate for judge of the Superior Court of Vigo county against his wishes, being drafted by his party, and was easily elected. He again went on the bench January 1, 1919, for a term of four years.

Politically, Judge Cox has stood firmly for the principles promulgated by Jefferson, and has consistently labored for the furtherance of the Democratic cause. He was one of the original organizers of the Jackson Club in 1884, a unique organization which did excellent work for the cause of Democracy between the years 1884 and 1900, changing uniforms each campaign, but invariably distinguished by the carrying of hickory canes by its members. During the campaigns of 1900 and 1902 he served as county Democratic chairman.

During his years in college Judge Cox became affiliated with the Greek letter fraternity Delta Tau. He is an Elk and belongs to a number of orders.

Judge Cox's hobbies are farming and pure bred cattle, hogs, sheep and bird dogs.

JABEZ THOMAS COX

Holding high rank among the leaders of Indiana Democracy is Judge Jabez Thomas Cox, of Peru. He is a native of Clinton county, Ohio, but was brought by his parents to Indiana in the year 1850, at which time they located in Hamilton county. He attended the public schools, Westfield Academy and later received his legal training at Noblesville and Tipton.

In the year 1864 he enlisted in Company B, 136th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and served until his regiment was mustered out. In 1867 was solemnized his marriage to Miss Jennie Price, of Tipton, and in 1875 their home was established at Hutchinson, Kansas. Four years later they emigrated to Colorado, where Mrs. Cox was called from his side by death. During his residence in Kansas he was the Democratic candidate for attorney-general and ran more than 30,000 votes ahead of the Democratic candidate for governor of that state. Returning to Peru in 1883 he resumed his practice, and four years later became a member of the state legislature. In 1884 he was married to Miss Elizabeth Meinhardt, of Peru, who died in 1893. In 1890 he was elected judge of the circuit court of Miami county for a term of six years, and in 1896 was re-elected to that office.

The present Mrs. Cox, to whom he was married July 9, 1905, was formerly Miss Addie Alleman of Huntington.

He has two children living: Edward E. Cox, postmaster at Hartford City and editor and proprietor of the News and Telegram, and Mary Elizabeth Cox, who is a kindergarten teacher at Indianapolis.

JAMES COX

James Cox was born on the 8th of October, 1837. He was a native Hoosier. Early in life he was married to Mary Engle and they were the parents of John E. Cox, who was afterwards elected judge in Vigo county. James Cox was one of the best known men and members of the Democratic party in the early days of Vigo county.

He spent his boyhood in Parke county, attending the district schools of the locality, moving later in life to Vigo county, where he continued to reside.

He was elected and served a term as treasurer in his county. During his incumbency of his office—in fact, prior to his election—because of his scrupulous business methods he became known as "Honest Uncle Jimmy Cox," a title which went with him through his entire life.

WILLIAM ELIJAH COX

William Elijah Cox is one of the most conspicuous political figures in the state of Indiana, holding public offices of importance from the time he began practicing law. His most conspicuous services were as prosecuting attorney of the 57th Judicial District composed of DuBois, Pike and Gibson counties, and for 12 years in the Congress. He was born on a farm near Birdseye, DuBois county, September 6, 1861. His father being James Cox. He was one of eleven children, four boys and seven girls, he being the seventh child. He attended the country school and entered the normal school for a while, retiring to teach in 1880. He taught six years in a country school and graduated in the law department of Lebanon, Tennessee, in June, 1887, taking a post-graduate course in law at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, which he completed in June, 1889.

He immediately began the practice of law at Jasper, the county seat of DuBois county, this being his native county. He was elected prosecuting attorney in 1892 and re-elected again in 1894 and 1896. He was elected district chairman of the third congressional district in 1898 and 1900, serving through these four years as a member of the State Central Committee. He was first elected to Congress in 1906, entered the sixtieth congress and was re-elected for five successive terms thereafter, serving full six terms or 12 years from the third congressional district of Indiana.

As prosecuting attorney many important cases which were of far more than local interest were handled by him, and handled successfully. The most noted cases which he conducted were against what were known as the "White Caps," who predominated in that part of the state. He succeeded in securing the conviction of the first "White Caps" who were prosecuted and found guilty in Indiana, and broke up the organization by sending a large number of them to the penitentiary. During his public life he was very prominent in the councils of his party in the state and nation and became a leader of much strength in his party councils, on congressional committees and in other activities connected with his position as congressman. Throughout the state he was generally known as "Lige" Cox.

HON. MILLARD FILLMORE COX

A history of the Democracy of Indiana would be incomplete were honorable mention not made of Judge Millard Fillmore Cox, a man of remarkable brilliance of intellect, unusual attainments and loyal service to the state.

Judge Cox was born on a farm in Hamilton county, Indiana, and attended the common and high schools of Hamilton and Tipton counties. Having completed his school work he came to Indianapolis and entered the law offices of Buel & Bartholomew, and here, under their tutelage, he studied for the legal profession; later was admitted to the bar of Marion county and entered into practice. From 1885 to 1889 he served as deputy reporter of the supreme court of Indiana under Hon. John W. Kern, and the following year was elected judge of the criminal court of Marion county for a four-year term. He was secretary and legal adviser of the state board of accounts from its creation until his death, on the 16th day of March, 1914. He was also for some time chief editorial writer for the Indianapolis Sentinel and was director of the press bureau of the Democratic state committee. He was also widely known as the author of "The Legionaries," a romance of Morgan's raid. He was an active member of the Fourth Presbyterian church.

OTTO LORENZO COYLE

Otto Lorenzo Coyle, son of Thomas J. and Jessie (Green) Coyle, was born in Shelby county, November 11, 1878, his parents having been born in the same county and having always lived there. He was reared on the farm and was educated in the common schools and the township high school, from which he graduated in 1896. He attended the Central Normal College at Danville, where he graduated as a bachelor of science in 1889. Later he took a post-graduate course at the Northern Indiana Normal University at Valparaiso, completing this course in 1900.

He taught school and for six years was principal of the high schools. He quit teaching to become deputy clerk of the Shelby county court, in which place he served four years, from 1906 to 1911. In the latter year he became clerk and served in that office until 1915. While serving as clerk he was also Democratic county chairman, and one of the most efficient who ever headed the organization.

He was always most active in all farmers' organizations and served as both secretary and chairman of the Farmers' Agricultural Institute of Shelby county, as well as general superintendent of the Shelby County Fair Association for three years.

He always kept a lively interest in educational affairs and served as a member of the township board of education after retiring as a teacher and as principal. After retiring from the office of county clerk he devoted his attention to his extensive farming interests and attending to his city properties, owning one of the finest farms in Shelby county, located at the edge of the city of Shelbyville.

CHAS. C. CRAMPTON, M. D.

Dr. Charles C. Crampton, son of A. B. Crampton, was born in Logansport on the 15th of June, 1872, and accompanied his parents to Delphi in 1879. He attended the public schools of Logansport and Delphi, and spent one year at Notre Dame. In 1891 he graduated from the pharmacy department of Purdue University, following which he took a two years' course in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Chicago, and received a diploma from the Kentucky School of Medicine in Louisville in 1893. At the age of twenty-one he was appointed pension examiner under Cleveland, the youngest person on record to hold this position, and honored by receiving the appointment direct from the President. He is now president of the C. I. & L. Railway Surgeons' Association and is their local surgeon; president of the county medical society, president city board of health, member various other societies and Masonic and K. of P. lodges.

JOHN WILLIAM CRAVENS

John William Cravens, of Bloomington, Indiana, is a son of William Reece and Sarah Ruth (Bray) Cravens, and was born on a farm in the southern part of Hendricks county, Indiana, October 1, 1864. He was married October 1, 1891, to Miss Emma Lucille Krueger, who died February 12, 1898. To this union was born a daughter, Miss Ruth Ralston Cravens.

Mr. Cravens was educated in the country schools, Danville High School, Central Normal College (B. S. 1884), and Indiana University (A. B. 1897). While attending the country school he worked on the farm; while attending the high school he clerked in his father's store; while attending normal college he was bookkeeper for the First National Bank; and while attending Indiana University he was registrar of that institution.

Mr. Cravens was editor of the Danville Gazette, 1884-85; superintendent Monroe county schools, 1887-90; secretary Monroe county Democratic central committee, 1886-90; chairman, 1890-94; clerk Monroe county court, 1890-94; editor Bloomington World, 1894-1906; registrar, Indiana University, 1895-1914; secretary of Indiana University, 1914; member of Indiana legislature, 1899-1903; presidential elector on state Democratic ticket, 1912; vice-president National Association of Collegiate Registrars, 1912; president, 1913; member of First Presbyterian church and for ten years superintendent of the Sabbath-school and president of the board of deacons; member of Phi Gamma Delta, Masons, Knights of Pythias, Odd Fellows and Elks.

JOSEPH MARSHALL CRAVENS

Among the loyal workers for the success of the Democratic party in Indiana, perhaps none have worked more faithfully than has Joseph Marshall Cravens, of Madison, and to his efforts the success of the organization in Jefferson county is largely due.

Mr. Cravens was born in this state on the 9th day of February, 1859, and attended the public schools of his district, later continuing his studies at Wabash College, from which he graduated with the class of 1882. Returning from college, Mr. Cravens engaged in the pursuit of agriculture and he has since continued in this, his chosen vocation. He has taken an active interest in political affairs and also in all movements for the development and progress of the community in which he resides. In the fall of 1902 he was elected to represent Jefferson county in the state legislature, and with such zeal and intelligence did he discharge the duties entrusted to him that he was returned to the assemblies of 1905, 1907, 1911 and 1913.

J. N. CULP

James N. Culp, postmaster at North Vernon, was born in Bartholomew county, October 28, 1877. At an early age he entered the field of journalism and in 1901 purchased the Vernon Journal. After conducting this paper successfully for several years during which time the politics of the paper was changed to the Democratic faith, Mr. Culp purchased the North Vernon Sun and for eight years was its editor. In July, 1913, however, he relinquished his newspaper business to become postmaster of North Vernon and to this work he has since devoted his energies with conscientious zeal. He is also chairman of the county library board and the secretary of the Jennings county chapter of the American Red Cross.

Mrs. Culp was formerly Miss Myra A. Hinchman, the daughter of Henry Hinchman, one of the best known citizens in Jennings county.

J. C. CUMMINS

Well known to the traveling public of eastern Indiana for many years, and later a familiar figure in political and municipal affairs of his home community, J. C. Cummins of Middletown needs no introduction to those of our readers living in that section of the state.

Mr. Cummins was born on March 4, 1878, and received his schooling in the public schools of Middletown. On the 4th day of July, 1910, he was united in marriage to Miss Ethel May Crittenger and established his home in this city.

For seventeen years Mr. Cummins was local freight and ticket agent for the Pennsylvania Railway Company, working at various points on the Richmond division of the line. In the year 1912 he became a member of the city council. For a time he also was connected with the township advisory board. In the year 1914 he was nominated for the position of township trustee. In the years 1911 and 1914 he was delegate to the state Democratic convention.

GEORGE F. R. CUMMEROW

An active party worker and for many years a leading attorney at law, practicing in Ft. Wayne, Hammond and Gary, is George F. R. Cummerow.

He was born in the State of Ohio on the 3d day of May, 1877. At the age of six months "he suggested to his people" that they move to Indiana. They located in Ft. Wayne and for many years his father, Otto Cummerow, published a daily Democratic paper there. The son attended the schools of Ft. Wayne, later attending the Kent College of Law at Chicago, graduating in the year 1898. He was at once admitted to the bar and entered into the active practice of his profession at Ft. Wayne. In 1900 he came to Hammond and, finally, in 1913, located in Gary. Here he has been an active worker in the Democratic ranks and is at present secretary of the Democratic central committee of this city.

JOSEPH S. DAILEY

An enumeration of those men who have won honor and public recognition for themselves, and at the same time honored their native state, must of necessity place at the head of the list such men as Joseph S. Dailey. He held distinctive precedence as an able lawyer and judge, having served with signal ability as associate justice of the supreme court of the state of Indiana, and as a judge in other courts. A man of affairs, who wielded a wide influence. A strong mentality, an invincible courage, a determined individuality—these have so entered into his make-up as to render him a natural leader of men and opinion. A native son of Wells county, and this the scene of the greater part of his life's labors, his home being in the city of Bluffton, where, excepting while sitting as judge, he was actively engaged in the practice of the law.

Joseph S. Dailey was born on a farm in Lancaster township, Wells county, Indiana, on the 21st of May, 1844, a representative of one of the worthy pioneer families of the state. He was the fifth in order of birth of the nine children of James and Lydia (Garton) Dailey, and of these children four died in infancy. His brother, Lewis W., died at the age of nineteen, while in command of a company of the Twenty-second Indiana Volunteer Infantry, during the Civil war. His sister, Mary A., died at the age of eighteen, the other sister being Mrs. Rachel L. Sowards.

As has been said in a previous published article referring to Judge Dailey: "His paternal ancestors were plain, unpretentious men who performed their several duties modestly and without ostentation. They were content to earn an honest living on the farm or in the shop, without seeking official honors or public favor. He is of the fifth generation by direct lineage from Dennis Dailey, who was a native of county Sligo, Ireland, and who emigrated to America before the middle of the eighteenth century, settling in New Jersey. Both of Judge Dailey's grandfathers attested their courage and patriotism by honorable service in the war of 1812. Both of them were natives of New Jersey; both removed to Indiana and became early settlers of Franklin county. Here his father and mother were married and lived until their first three children were born; they then removed to Allen county, where the fourth was born; thence to Wells county, which became their permanent home."

Joseph S. Dailey secured his early education in the public schools of Bluffton and then began his technical preparation for his chosen profession by entering the law office of Newton Burwell, of this place, under whose direction he continued his studies for two years. In order to secure the funds necessary to defray his course in the law department of the state university, he devoted a portion of his time to teaching in the district schools of Wells county and also in the public schools of Bluffton. In 1865 he matriculated in the law department of the university, where he was graduated in 1866, being admitted to the bar of Indiana in that year. He entered into a professional partnership with George S. Brown, who later removed to the state of Kansas, his death occurring in its capital city a number of years later.

In October, 1866, within the first year of his active practice in Bluffton, Judge Dailey was elected district attorney for the court of common pleas, and in 1868 he was elected prosecuting attorney for the district in which Judge Lowry, of Fort Wayne, presided. He was re-elected in 1870, 1872 and 1874, serving four consecutive terms. As a public official he acquired a reputation in the legal profession that brought him a splendid practice when he again retired from public office.

Mr. Dailey was not without ambition. In 1878 he was nominated and elected a member of the state legislature. His record in that body was that of a conservative working member—always persistent, always moderate, yet courageous in the expression of his views. As a member of important committees and in support of measures on the floor he was influential in formulating and securing the passage of much legislation. His uniform courtesy and firmness won for him the esteem of political opponents. His conscientious regard for public duty secured to him the confidence of all his colleagues and associates. Once afterward he yielded to the importunities of partisan friends and became a candidate for political office. In 1882 he accepted the Democratic nomination for Congress and made a race that was hopeless, because of the adverse partisan majority, though his canvass was highly creditable and entirely honorable. Settling down again to the practice of law, he secured a valuable clientele, extending over a large district.

In 1888 he was elected judge of the Twenty-eighth Circuit, comprising the counties of Huntington and Wells, for a term of six years. His service on the bench was alike acceptable to the bar and the populace. He exercised wise discretion and commendable humanity in dealing with youths convicted of violating penal statutes. In most instances of first offense, if the accused had previously borne a good reputation, sentence was withheld and he was allowed to enjoy liberty, after timely advice and warning by the court, so long as good deportment was maintained. In this way boys were reclaimed and saved for good citizenship instead of a life of crime.

Before the expiration of his term in the circuit, Judge Dailey was appointed judge of the supreme court of the state, by Governor Matthews, receiving his commission to this office July 25, 1893. His qualifications for the office of judge, whether in the trial of causes or in the court of last resort, were unquestionable. First of all, he had the integrity of character. He possessed the natural ability and essential acquirements, the acumen of the judicial temperament. He was able to divest himself of prejudice or favoritism and consider only the legal aspects of a question submitted. No labor was too great, however onerous; no application too exacting, however severe, if necessary to the complete understanding and correct determination of a question.

His career on the bench and at the bar offer a noble example and an inspiration, while he never was known to fail in that strict courtesy and regard for professional ethics which should ever characterize the members of the bar. Faultless in honor, fearless in conduct and stainless in reputation, his career reflects credit upon the judiciary and bar of one of the sovereign commonwealths of the Union. Following his retirement from the bench Judge Dailey actively engaged in the practice of his profession in Bluffton, though his range of professional labor far transcends local limitations, as a matter of course. He has as associates in practice his eldest son, Frank C. Dailey, and Abram Simmons, the large and important business being conducted under the firm name of Dailey, Simmons & Dailey. The writer from whose signally able and appreciative estimate we have hitherto liberally quoted continues further, as follows: "The judge is favored in the possession of a healthful, vigorous constitution, robust energy and marked vitality. He is in the prime of middle life, which is conducive to the most effectual utilization of all the mental resources. Candid, earnest and sincere, he is a reliable counselor. His popularity as a citizen is the natural outgrowth of confidence in his ability, integrity and sound judgment."

The domestic chapter in the history of Judge Dailey has been one of ideal character. On the 15th day of March, 1870, Judge Dailey was united in marriage to Miss Emma Gutelius, of Bluffton, who is of French extraction, tracing back to a distinguished surgeon in the French army. She was born in Fairfield county, Ohio, being a daughter of John P. and Henrietta Gutelius. Judge and Mrs. Dailey were the parents of four children—Frank C., who was admitted to the bar and is associated with his father in practice; Lewis W., who was graduated in the Indianapolis Dental College in 1884, and who established an excellent practice in Bluffton; Charles Gutelius, who became principal of the Bluffton high school, and Blanche.

Frank C. Dailey, the eldest son, gained more than a state reputation during his term as district attorney for the federal district of Indiana. He had many cases of unusual importance that attracted even national repute; and he justified all that the best of his friends might have wished for him. While always consistent in his Democracy, as district attorney he knew only his duty under the law and followed it, but always willing in his practice to temper justice with mercy to the full limit justified by the facts.

When Frank C. Dailey decided to retire from public office, he stepped into an unusually fine legal practice, the result of public confidence in his integrity and ability. He was one of the most active and effective workers and speakers participating in the drives for contributions and loans for the carrying on of the war with Germany. More than this he gave two sons who volunteered and went to France in the active fighting classes and saw service in the thickest of the great battles.

JUDGE WILLIAM DARROCH

Known throughout Newton county as one of the most substantial citizens, and a leading attorney, is Judge William Darroch, of Kentland.

He was born in Indiana on the 31st day of December, 1848, and attended the public schools. Later the regular course in law was taken at Asbury University, Greencastle, from which he graduated, and in the same year was admitted to the bar of Newton county and entered into the active practice of this profession.

On the 23rd day of June, 1878, he was united in marriage to Miss Emma V. Sammons, of Donovan, Ill., and their home was established at Morocco. In the same year he was elected township trustee and in this capacity served for a term of four years. In 1890 he was appointed by Governor Matthews to the position of judge of the 30th Judicial Circuit. He is an active party worker, and one of the best informed men in the county.

JAMES POWHATAN DAVIS

In business, political and religious circles of the city of Kokomo the name of James P. Davis is well known and highly esteemed, his activity in these varied walks of life having placed him in a position of prominence.

Mr. Davis was born in Henry county, Virginia, and here his education was received in the public schools of the county. Here also, on the 20th day of December, 1883, he was united in marriage to Miss Mary Finney and their first home was established. In the year 1892, however, the health of Mr. Davis failed, and he sought the benefit of a change of climate and came to Indiana on the third of December, locating in Howard county. The last two years of his residence in Virginia were spent in discharging the duties of justice of the peace; and in the years 1908 and 1912 he was elected joint representative from the counties of Miami, Howard and Carroll to the 66th and 68th General Assemblies of the state of Indiana, taking an active part in the deliberations of that body.

Since his residence in Kokomo, Mr. Davis has built up a lucrative business as general contractor and builder, and is at this time devoting his energies to this profession. He is a member of the Primitive Baptist church; is not interested in fraternal affairs.

PEARLE A. DAVIS

Since the Spanish-American war the name of Pearle A. Davis has been a familiar one to those interested in military affairs in Indiana; and when, on the first day of the year, 1914, he received from Governor Ralston the appointment to the position of quartermaster-general of the state militia it seemed but a fitting reward for his years of zealous service.

Mr. Davis was born in Clinton county, Indiana, on the 8th day of May, 1880, and attended the common schools of his district. His studies were later continued in the high schools of Frankfort and Kokomo; but when the call came for volunteers in the war against Spain, he left school to enlist in 158th Indiana Volunteer Infantry and was accepted on the 9th day of May, 1898. In August, 1900, he enlisted in the U. S. Army, and for three years he served in Troops F and K, 2nd Cavalry. On the 23rd of August, 1903, he received his discharge from Troop F, with the rank of corporal. On the 30th day of December, 1907, he enlisted in Battery A, Indiana National Guard, and here he served until August 5, 1908, when he was commissioned 1st Lieutenant of Infantry. On April 29, 1909, he was commissioned Captain of Infantry, and served until appointed quartermaster-general.

Fraternally, Mr. Davis is allied with the North Park Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons, Keystone Chapter No. 6, Raper Commandery No. 1, and Murat Temple, Mystic Shrine. He was a member of the prize-winning team of Raper Commandery in the conclave held in Denver in 1913 and is at present second lieutenant of this team.

Politically, he was reared in the faith of the Jeffersonian party and has consistently adhered to these principles. For four years he has been an active member of the Indiana Democratic Club; and is at all times a loyal worker in the ranks of the party.

Mrs. Davis, to whom he was married March 7, 1905, was formerly Miss Portia V. Schwartz; and her abilities as a hostess have drawn to their home a host of cultured friends.

JOSIAH P. DAY

Josiah P. Day, an active party worker at Versailles, for many years a precinct committeeman and attendant at state and congressional conventions, is also widely known as the incumbent of various positions of trust in the public service.

Mr. Day was born in Miami county, Indiana, July 29, 1861. He attended the schools of Marion and Ripley counties and later entered Moores Hill College for further study. On January 31, 1886, he was united in marriage to Miss Rudie Livingston and established his home in Versailles.

For eighteen years Mr. Day served as deputy clerk of Ripley county, and in the fall of 1912 was elected county clerk, leading his ticket. Later he assumed the responsibilities of clerk of the circuit court, and in this capacity still serves.

He is affiliated with the order of Free and Accepted Masons and is an active member of the Baptist church.

W. A. DEHORITY

Closely identified with the business and political life of Elwood for many years, and bearing the distinction of being that progressive city's first mayor, W. A. Dehority is well known not only in Madison county, but throughout the state.

Mr. Dehority was born in the city of Elwood on October 24, 1868, and received his schooling in the public schools of that city. Following his graduation from the high school his studies were continued at Earlham College. Subsequently he took a commercial course at the Bryant-Stratton Business College in Louisville, Kentucky.

In June, 1888, Mr. Dehority was united in marriage to Miss Frances E. Metts and established his permanent home in the city of his birth. In the year 1890 he was appointed deputy treasurer of Madison county, and at the expiration of his term of service in that position in 1891 he assumed the responsibilities of the office of mayor of the city. In this latter capacity he served until September, 1894, since which time he has been connected with the Citizens Gas and Mining Co. He also was one of the organizers of the Elwood State Bank, and is at present associated with the Elwood Lawn Mower Manufacturing Co.

Particularly noteworthy has been Mr. Dehority's work as a member of the state board of accounts from 1909 to 1913, this body being considered a model in its field and attracting attention throughout the United States and Canada, as well as in foreign countries. Prior to his connection with this body, Mr. Dehority was a member of the board of public works of Elwood, and also was connected with the county board of review. His work as a member of the board of equalization in 1896-7, the years of the first high valuation, is also worthy of note.

JOHN W. DEMOSS

Before assuming the duties pertaining to his present responsible position, that of sheriff of Decatur county, John W. Demoss, of Greensburg, was known throughout the county as one of its most successful farmers. He is a native of this locality, born on the 27th of August, 1856, the son of Benjamin L. Demoss. When he was only seven years old his father died a martyr to his country. He had one brother and a sister, and the three went out into the world to earn a living for their widowed mother. The boy John received his education in the public schools; and was married April 12, 1877, to Miss Martha A. Jackson, who died January 1, 1906. Six children have been born to them, all now married and living in the county: Benjamin W., Grover C., Irdo, Birdie Borden, Della Styers and Belle Vanderber. Mr. Demoss is the owner of a quarter-section of fine land, all bought and paid for by his own labor and effort. He was elected sheriff of Decatur county in November, 1912, assuming the duties of his office January 1, 1913; was renominated for the same office in April, 1914, without opposition and is at present serving his second term in this position, and is a candidate for re-election. Mr. Demoss is a fine and striking type of the self-made man and has made one of the best sheriffs Decatur county ever had. His term expired January 1, 1917.

JOHN DAY DEPREZ

Born October 1, 1872, at Shelbyville, Indiana, the son of John C. DePrez, who owned and operated a woolen mill at the edge of the city, John Day DePrez was a member of one of the oldest families in Shelby county. In 1874 the woolen mill was converted into a furniture factory owned by Conrey, Waller & DePrez, one of the pioneer furniture factories in the state.

John Day DePrez, after completing the high school course in Shelbyville, attended Hanover College, and for ten years after leaving college he was with the Shelby Bank, afterwards the Shelby National Bank.

At the end of his ten years in the bank he organized a company and bought and became the editor and publisher of the Shelbyville Democrat, a prosperous publication that under his direction advocated unrelentingly the principles of the Democratic party.

He was always a leader among the Democrats in his county and an adviser with the state committee at campaign times. He served as a member of the board of education and of the city council, being elected from what had always been one of the strongest Republican city wards. He served several years as Democratic city chairman.

At the time of the organization of the Indiana Democratic Club, with headquarters at Indianapolis, he became an active member and worker in the organization and for several years served as a member of the board of directors. Mason, Elk, Knight of Pythias and Red Man.

Married Emma Senour of Shelbyville, October 28, 1903.

ARTHUR LEROY DENISTON

Arthur LeRoy Deniston, the secretary and general manager of The Rochester Bridge Company, is one of the young workers in the Democratic party of Fulton county, and has forged to the front so rapidly that he is well known throughout his section as a leader in the party, and a prominent business man of the community.

He is a native Hoosier, born on the 9th day of September, 1882, near his present home. His childhood and youth were spent in the city of Rochester, and he attended the common and high schools of the place, later attending Purdue University, and finally taking a course at Wabash College. On the 24th day of June, 1903, his marriage to Miss Ada Rannels was solemnized, and their permanent home established in his home city.

On the first day of January, 1910, he assumed the duties of city councilman, serving in this capacity for a term of four years, showing a remarkable grasp of municipal affairs and conscientious diligence in the performance of the duties pertaining to this position.

In the fall of 1914 he received the nomination for joint representative to the general assembly for Cass and Fulton counties, and was elected in November.

Since attaining his majority, he has been a staunch adherent of the principles of Democracy, consistently voting the ticket, and serving the party loyally during the various campaigns. For this and his many sterling qualities as a citizen, he has won a host of friends throughout the county of Fulton and vicinity, and a brilliant future may be expected for him.

O. T. DICKERSON

O. T. Dickerson, a life-long resident of Owen county, was born one mile south of Spencer on the 23rd day of January, 1852, and on this farm he resided for fifty-six years. He attended the common and high schools of Spencer, and in his twentieth year was married to Miss Mary M. Workman, this event occurring on July 31, 1871.

To them were born four daughters and one son, all of whom are now living and married. The mother, however, was called from her family by death in 1908. On the 21st day of December, 1911, he was again united in marriage to Miss Rosalie Buzzard of Spencer, Indiana.

Mr. Dickerson's father, O. B. Dickerson, was one of the earliest settlers of Owen county, coming from Shelbyville, Ky., in 1830, at which time he moved all his personal effects on horseback to Owen county. Mr. Dickerson has been an active party worker, serving as county chairman from 1884 to 1890, and as delegate to many conventions. From 1883 to 1887 he was auditor of the county, and from 1893 to 1897 was postmaster of Spencer. For the past five years he has been employed as a commercial salesman. His early years were spent as a farmer, being a live stock shipper for twenty years, and the first breeder of pure-bred Poland China hogs in the county.

He is affiliated with the F. & A. M. and Knights of Pythias and is a member of the Christian church.

LINCOLN DIXON

Lincoln Dixon, during all his service in the congress, held the position of leader, not only in his own delegation, but respected and looked up to by all the members of that body, because of his exceptional ability and excellent judgment and capacity for handling the larger questions which came before that legislative assembly for consideration.

He had many qualifications fitting him especially as a member of the congress and these made him stand out most conspicuously. He served for several years without interruption from the fourth Indiana congressional district. Few men of this or any other state have rendered more efficient service for the people or in promulgating and promoting the interests and principles of the Democratic party.

Lincoln Dixon was born on the 9th day of February, 1860. He attended the public schools and afterward graduated from the high school. He continued his studies at the Indiana State University, where he graduated from the law department. He was admitted to practice at the Jennings county bar, and located his office at North Vernon, where he continued to practice.

He first entered public life when he was elected prosecuting attorney for Jennings county, in 1884, at the age of twenty-four, serving in that office by re-election until 1892. He retired at that time, but only continued his private practice for two years, when he was first nominated in 1894 and elected congressional representative from the fourth congressional district of Indiana, returning always by increased majorities until March 4, 1919.

During his first six years in congress, Lincoln Dixon was chairman of the pension committee, being then promoted to the important committee on ways and means.

While always a Democrat, and one of the strongest members of the party, he never had any of the characteristics of a narrow partisan. He always dealt with broad questions on a broad and patriotic basis, dealing with such matters entirely on their merits as public measures and in view of the benefits and interests of all the people.

Upon retiring from congress, Mr. Dixon resumed practice of his profession at North Vernon. He was married to Miss Kate Story, October 16, 1884.

During his years in college he was affiliated with the Sigma Chi fraternity.

While in the congress he always displayed a lively interest in the affairs of his own county and city, and was a leading spirit in promoting and developing important civic undertakings.

GEORGE W. DONALDSON

Closely identified with business and educational affairs in Knox county is Mr. George W. Donaldson, of Vincennes.

He was born in Knox county on the 11th day of February, 1856, and attended the common and high schools of Vincennes. Following his graduation, he entered the state normal school at Terre Haute, and after completing his work at this institution entered the educational field, teaching in Bicknell, where he was principal for two years.

On the 8th day of October, 1878, he was united in marriage to Miss Sarah A. Gilmore, and to their home have come three daughters and a son: Myrtle, Bess and Madie, and George R.

In the year 1888 he assumed the duties of treasurer of Knox county, and in this capacity served four years. He has taken an active interest in civic affairs and has attended various state and county conventions of the party.

He organized the Second National Bank of Vincennes in the year of 1893 and was president of same for thirteen years but had to give up the banking business on account of ill health.

He has been a student of our financial system for years, and as far back as 1908 advocated a system of currency almost identical to the one adopted by the last Democratic congress.

CHARLES P. DONEY

Among the loyal Democratic workers of Wayne county, Charles P. Doney holds a prominent position, having been active in the service of the party since he was a lad of twelve years.

Mr. Doney is a true son of Wayne county, born in Cambridge City and educated in her schools, graduating from the high school. The son and grandson of loyal Democrats, he was early taught the principles promulgated by Jefferson and has consistently labored for the furtherance of the cause. Soon after he attained his majority he served as precinct committeeman at various times, and in the campaigns of 1912 and 1914 was county chairman of the Democratic organization.

He is engaged in the insurance business, selling both life and fire policies, and was actively identified with business affairs of Cambridge City until September, 1914, at which time his political efforts were rewarded by an appointment to the Income Tax Department in the office of the Collector of Internal Revenue at Indianapolis. He was later placed in complete charge of that department until his resignation in December, 1917, when he opened offices in Indianapolis, acting as consultant on federal tax matters, specializing on federal tax laws, being the originator of this special kind of service to federal taxpayers within a radius of several hundred miles, his business extending throughout Indiana and adjoining states.

CHARLES B. DONOVAN, JR.

The present postmaster of East Chicago has, since attaining his majority, been an active party worker and has contributed valued service to the local organization during the various campaigns through which he has passed.

Mr. Charles B. Donovan, Jr., was born in Chicago on the 26th day of April, 1880. He attended the public schools of this city until he reached the age of ten years, at which time he accompanied his parents to East Chicago and entered the schools of that place. After finishing school he accepted a position in the office of The Grasselli Chemical Co., and held same until taking up the trade of iron molder. He held the position of assistant foreman for the Green Engineering Co. until the summer of 1913, at which time he received the appointment to the postmastership of East Chicago, assuming the duties of the office on the 1st day of July.

On the 25th day of November, 1903, he was united in marriage to Miss Katherine Farrington, and their home, then established in East Chicago, has extended hospitality to a circle of devoted friends.

As a worker in the ranks of the Democratic party he has been zealous and loyal and was for a number of years secretary of the local organization, resigning only to accept his present position.

WILLIAM V. DOOGS

Among the progressive agriculturists of Perry county, the name of William V. Doogs holds high rank.

He is essentially a product of this locality, born near the site of the present home and educated largely in its schools. Following his graduation from the district schools, however, a course of study in the higher branches was taken at St. Meinrad College, in Spencer county. His father, whose death occurred in 1882, emigrated to this country from Germany in the early fifties, and it was from him that he learned the love of the soil and its cultivation.

In the fall of 1906 he was elected to the position of county clerk, and served in this capacity for a four-year term. At the expiration of this period, he was re-elected and served for a further term, bringing to his work characteristic enthusiasm and unflagging zeal.

Since attaining his majority Mr. Doogs has been a staunch adherent of the tenets of Democracy, and has labored during the various campaigns for the furtherance of the cause. During the campaign of 1914 he served as secretary of the county Democratic committee.

He is essentially a self-made man, laboring since boyhood for the success which is his. He is now the holder of extensive farming interests and is also a stockholder, director and assistant cashier of the First National Bank of Cannelton.

Fraternally, he is allied with the Knights of Columbus, being an active member of Cannelton Council No. 1172.

HUGH DOUGHERTY

Hugh Dougherty was born in Darke county, Ohio, July 28, 1844, the son of William and Margaret (Studebaker) Dougherty and the grandson of Hugh Dougherty, a native of Ireland who immigrated to Washington county, Pennsylvania, in 1818, subsequently removing to Darke county, Ohio. His mother was a relative of the famous Studebaker family of Indiana.

Hugh Dougherty received his education in the public schools while living on his father's farm, and became a teacher in the public schools at the age of seventeen. After teaching for one term he enlisted in the Union army and fought during the Civil war with the 94th Ohio Volunteer Infantry, participating in some of the most important battles. He was made a prisoner of war at Stone River in 1862.

He began his business career in Indiana at Bluffton, in 1865, being employed by his uncle in the grain business. Later he entered the exchange bank of John Studebaker, his uncle, and was a partner in the bank until 1888, when he became president of the institution. In 1904 he resigned the presidency of that bank to take the same office with the Marion Trust Company of Indianapolis, which position he held until the merger of this bank with the Fletcher Trust Company, a much larger institution, of which he became vice-president.

He was one of the leading financiers of the Middle West, and was identified with the Independent Telephone Corporations of Indiana, organizing one of the first independents. When the independent telephone companies organized their national association, Mr. Dougherty served on their most important committees, looking after their contests with the Bell companies. Mr. Dougherty subsequently was made national president of the independent telephone companies. It was through Mr. Dougherty's efforts that the independent companies in many parts of the country were permitted to secure long distance service over the Bell lines into territories which the independents did not reach.

Mr. Dougherty was always a strong and influential member of the Democratic party. He served as state senator from 1871 to 1873, and from that time on until the second election of Woodrow Wilson he was prominently identified with the Democratic state central committee, serving a number of years as their treasurer.

He was a delegate to several national conventions. He also served as a member of many important boards in the management of state institutions. He was married at Milwaukee, Wis., October 25, 1877, to Emma Gilliland, of Indianapolis, and they had one daughter, Elizabeth, who married Charles W. Jewett, mayor of Indianapolis.

CHARLES P. DRUMMOND

Hon. Charles P. Drummond is one of the best known men in northern Indiana, and Democrats all over the state recognize him as one of the staunchest members of the party. He was born in Charleston, Clark county, Indiana, and educated in the literary department of Michigan University. There also he began the study of law, which he completed in the office of M. A. O. Packard, being admitted to practice in 1885. He quickly attracted public notice and was elected prosecuting attorney for Marshall and Fulton counties in 1886. In 1888 he was re-elected and served two full terms. In 1894 he was appointed mayor of Plymouth, to fill out an unexpired term, and filled that office for two years. In 1896 he was elected state senator for Marshall and Fulton counties, and served four years. In 1900 he accepted the nomination for attorney-general, but suffered the fate of the whole Democratic ticket in that year. In 1902 Mr. Drummond settled in South Bend, where he has since been actively engaged in the practice of law. In 1914 he was put forward as Democratic candidate for judge of the supreme court, and had a strong following from all parts of the state, but the desire to give a complimentary vote to favorite sons defeated him at the Indianapolis convention.

He has always been active in the support of the party and his worth, ability, and character are highly appreciated all over the state.

Mr. Drummond married Stella H. Packard and they have a daughter, Hortense, and a son, Donald P., who is associated with his father in the law firm of Drummond & Drummond.

FRANK R. DULIN

Frank R. Dulin is not only one of the most prominent of the young attorneys of northeastern Indiana, but is a scion of one of the oldest American families. His ancestors were residents of Kentucky, and his grandfather was the first of the family to settle in Indiana. His father was a farmer and Frank R. Dulin was born near Lebanon, this State, November 6, 1880. After leaving high school he entered the Indiana Law School and was graduated in 1902. In that year also he was admitted to practice. In 1903 he settled in Fort Wayne, where he has since been actively engaged in the practice of his profession.

Mr. Dulin's ability and personality carried him quickly to the front, and in 1907 he was appointed attorney for the juvenile court by Judge O'Rourke, at that time judge of that court. Mr. Dulin discharged the duties of his position ably for five years, until 1912, when he resigned to accept the position of deputy prosecuting attorney tendered to him by Mr. Hilgeman. In this responsible office he has proved himself an able lawyer and a splendid public official. Mr. Dulin has always been a staunch Democrat, as were his father and grandfather before him. The Dulins have been Democrats ever since the party came into existence. He takes warm interest in his party's success and is active in all campaigns. He was a delegate to the state convention of 1912.

On August 28, 1912, he was married to Della Hughbanks, and they have one son.

He is an active member of the Jefferson Club; is a 32d Degree Mason, Scottish Rite; a member of the Sol D. Bayless Lodge No. 359, F. & A. M.; the Fort Wayne Consistory, and Mizpah Shrine, A. A. O. N. M. S.

JOHN S. DUNCAN

A veteran in the service of the Democratic party, a substantial citizen of Howard county and an honored member of the commonwealth is the subject of this review, John S. Duncan.

Mr. Duncan was born in Rush county, Indiana, on the 10th day of October, 1842, and in that locality he received his education. On the 30th day of August, 1866, he was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth D. North, and she has been his faithful companion throughout life's journey. Since taking up his residence in Kokomo, Mr. Duncan's activities and interests have centered in that city. He has served as township trustee of Taylor township, and to the duties of that office brought a conscientious zeal and active intelligence. Since his youth he has worked faithfully and loyally for the furtherance of the cause of true Democracy, and has been sent as delegate to the state convention of the party.

ZACHARIAH T. DUNGAN

Zachariah T. Dungan, prominent attorney of Huntington, formerly mayor of that city and closely identified with the business life of the community, was born in Huntington county, December 7, 1859. He attended the country schools of his district, and at the age of sixteen years began teaching. For eleven years he continued in this work, teaching in winter and engaging in newspaper work in the summer. A course of study was also taken at the Danville Normal School, from which he graduated in the year 1878. On the 8th day of December, 1880, the day following his twenty-first birthday, he was admitted to the bar of Huntington county and entered into the practice of the law.

On the 11th day of May, 1881, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Lina C. Close, and their permanent home was established in Huntington, and here they have since drawn about them an ever-widening circle of friends.

In the general assembly of the state of Indiana in 1883 he was one of the assistant clerks of the senate and in 1891 received the united minority vote of all Democratic voters for chief clerk of the senate.

In the year 1892 he was elected mayor of Huntington and in this capacity served two years and six months. Later the law was changed and a four-year term was authorized. In 1898 he was again elected to this position and served for the full term of four years, at the expiration of which he entered the employ of the Wabash Railroad Company as assistant general claim agent, and this position he still holds. He has always taken an active part in business, municipal and civic affairs, and is at present second vice-president and director of the Huntington Commercial Club and first vice-president and director of the Huntington Young Men's Association. He is also secretary and member of the city board of education and is at present a member of the National Tax Association.

Fraternally, he is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, Red Men, Modern Woodmen of America; served as delegate to the court of honor, and for three years was one of their supreme directors.

He has but two children: Harry O., assistant cashier of the Citizens State Bank, Huntington, and Carl M., assistant claim agent of the Wabash railroad, Moberly, Mo.

W. R. DUNHAM

He to whose life history we now direct attention is a member of one of the pioneer families of Tipton county, his grandfather having entered government land along with the earliest settlers of the county.

W. R. Dunham, the present grand high priest of the grand encampment of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of Indiana, and a member of the Democratic state central committee from the ninth congressional district of Indiana, was born near Kempton, Indiana, February 1, 1856. His parents were Samuel G. and Matilda (Reese) Dunham. W. R. Dunham received his early education in the common schools of his township and later graduated from Valparaiso University, at Valparaiso, Ind. He then took up the profession of teaching and followed it very successfully for many years, making an enviable record for himself as an excellent instructor. His seven years as superintendent of the Kempton schools show that he was a success as a teacher. During the summer months he worked on a farm and clerked in a dry goods store. In 1912 the Democrats of Hamilton and Tipton counties selected him as the party's candidate for state representative, and at the November election he was elected by an overwhelming plurality. His record in the legislature was such as to commend him to the best citizens of his district.

Mr. Dunham was married April 8, 1881, to Belle Allen, the daughter of Samuel and Harriette Allen, of Sabina, Ohio. Their union has been blessed with three children—Dr. W. F., Dr. G. C. and Bonnie, the wife of Vernon Peters.

In his political faith Mr. Dunham has always been a staunch and unwavering supporter of the Democratic party. He is a member of the Masons, K. of P., Odd Fellows (encampment and cantons). Mr. Dunham is a good example of the self-made man, and in everything he has undertaken he has applied all those qualities which characterize successful men. As a teacher, as a county official, as a salesman and as a member of the legislature he has been true to the best impulses within him, and the result is that he is highly respected and honored by all who know him. He is a man of pleasing personality, which, united with his other good qualities, renders him an influential factor in the social and business life of the community in which he lives.

WILLIAM BOYER DURBOROW

William Boyer Durborow, the son of Allen C. and Elizabeth Boyer Durborow, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., on the first day of January, 1855, moving with his parents to Williamsport, Indiana, in the year 1863, where he continued to reside until his death, which occurred October 28, 1914.

He received his primary education at the schools of Williamsport, later attending Wabash College, at Crawfordsville, and finishing his collegiate course at Indiana University, graduating in the class of 1876, and graduating from the law department of the university in the class of 1877. Mr. Durborow was admitted to the bar of the Warren Circuit Court, October 14, 1877, and at once entered actively upon the practice of his chosen profession. He continued to devote all his time and energy to his business until compelled by failing health to relinquish it a few weeks prior to his death.

He was a prominent and active member of the Masons, the Knights of Pythias and the order of Maccabees.

Although a leader of the political party with which he affiliated, and taking an active and prominent part in local politics, and though he stood high in the counsel of the leaders of the party and in the confidence of the rank and file, yet he never sought or held a public office.

When Governor Hanly discovered evidences of malfeasance in the offices of certain state officers during his administration as governor he sought for men whose character and standing was well known and was such as to command the confidence of the public to make investigation and report upon the condition of affairs in the offices affected by the misconduct of the corrupt officers. At his earnest personal solicitation Mr. Durborow consented to serve upon this important commission. The work of this commission has gone into the history of the State. It was done so conscientiously as to be above criticism from any source and to meet with uniform approval. In the accomplishment of this result Mr. Durborow bore with the other members of the commission his full share of the responsibility and labor involved.

He was at the time of his death the vice-president and active head of the Warren County Bank, and had a very large clientele in his profession.

Mr. Durborow was married to Miss Mary Lawrence of Williamsport, April 21, 1881, and to them were born two children—H. L. Durborow, now of the faculty of Culver Military Academy, and Mrs. Fred Stevenson of Youngstown, Ohio, both of whom survive him.

ADAM R. EBERT

Adam R. Ebert needs no introduction to the citizens of Lake county. He is a native of Germany, born in Kurhessen, on the 21st of December, 1851. He attended the common schools in Germany, and in 1868 emigrated to America, locating in Chicago, where he remained until August, 1872. At this time he took up his residence in North township, Lake county. On the 29th day of August, 1880, he was united in marriage to Miss Sophia Brunswick, and she has ably seconded his efforts at all times.

In 1887 he became a member of the city council of Hammond, serving in that body until 1891. In 1890 he was elected representative from Lake county to the state legislature of 1891. January 1, 1894, he was appointed postmaster of Hammond for a term of four years, was elected justice of the peace in 1900 to 1914, and in May, 1908, was appointed chairman of the board of public works, serving until 1912. Since 1907 he has been president of the Hammond Savings and Trust Company.

CHARLES A. EDWARDS

Prominently identified with public affairs and with the mercantile life of Huntington county, Charles A. Edwards is familiarly known throughout that section of the state.

Mr. Edwards was born in northern Indiana on April 22, 1866, and received his schooling in the schools of Rochester. Miss Ella Rauch of Warren, Indiana, became his wife and Huntington county his permanent home.

Mr. Edwards has been connected with a number of prominent business enterprises in the city of Huntington. He has always been deeply interested in the doings of the Democratic organization in his locality and was appointed president of the board of public works of the city, a position he occupied but sixty days, resigning to accept a position as member of the Indiana state public service commission, to the labors of which commission his time is still devoted. He was also a member of the Democratic county central committee for a period of ten years, serving his party with the same zeal which he has displayed in the conduct of his private affairs.

Mr. Edwards is a stockholder in a bank at Huntington and is an active member of the Commercial club. He is also connected with the Factory Fund association, and is closely identified with the various movements which have arisen from time to time in behalf of civic betterment and the general progress and improvement of the community with which he is so closely associated.

Fraternally, Mr. Edwards is allied with the Masons, the Knights of Pythias, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and the Knights of the Maccabees. Socially, he and Mrs. Edwards hold an enviable position and are esteemed by an ever-widening circle of friends.

LOUIS EITEL

A loyal worker in the ranks of the party in Jennings county is Louis Eitel, a prominent citizen of Vernon. Mr. Eitel is a native of this county, having been born in Vernon on the 21st day of February, 1862. He obtained a common school education in the Vernon High Schools. His calling has been that of a salesman and merchant the greater part of his life. He is at the present time a partner in the firm of Eitel Brothers, general merchants, in Vernon.

On the first Monday in March, 1911, he was elected town recorder of Vernon, and assumed the duties of this office the same week in which he was elected, he being the only Democrat elected on the ticket at that time.

Mr. Eitel has always given freely of his time and energy for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy, and during the campaign of 1912 was treasurer of the county central committee.

EDWARD P. ELSNER

Senator Edward P. Elsner of Jackson county bears a state-wide reputation as an able and zealous legislator and has long been known as a leading attorney and able public official of Seymour.

He was born February 7, 1879, in Jackson county, and attended the public schools of Seymour, graduating from the high school. His studies were continued at Indiana University, where he took two years in the liberal arts department and graduated in the law department in 1904. Immediately after, he was admitted to the bar of Jackson county and engaged in the practice of his profession. On the first day of January, 1910, he assumed the duties of city attorney, serving in this capacity for a term of four years. In the fall of 1912 he was elected state senator, and was recognized as one of the leaders in the assembly of 1913 and that of 1915.

Mrs. Elsner was formerly Miss Mayme McDonald of Seymour; and two daughters, Dolores Mae and Mentoria Mabel, have added greatly to his home inspiration.

FREDERICK A. EMERSON

The present postmaster of the city of Angola, Mr. Frederick A. Emerson, has been for many years an active worker in the ranks of the party in Steuben county.

He is a native Hoosier, born on the 20th day of December, 1865, in Steuben county. He attended the public schools of his district and later entered Tri-State College for a course of study in the higher branches. On the 9th day of May, 1894, he was married to Miss Ina L. Craig, and their home was established in Angola. Here they have drawn about them a wide circle of friends.

Mr. Emerson was, for seventeen years, employed as a traveling salesman; but on the 19th day of March, 1914, was appointed to the position of postmaster of the city, and to this work has since devoted his energies with conscientious zeal. He is well known among the active Democratic workers of the county and has rendered valued service to the local organization.

FRANKLIN A. EMRICK

Franklin A. Emrick was born in Pleasant township, Allen county, Indiana, and received his early education in the public schools. He then took a two-year literary course in Ann Arbor, followed that with a year's course in law, and was admitted to the bar in September, 1899. Immediately after his admission he came to Ft. Wayne to take the position of deputy prosecuting attorney under his brother, E. V. Emrick. That position he filled from October 22, 1899, to December 31, 1903. During the past fifteen years he has achieved a high reputation in his profession and has also made a host of friends. In 1907 he was selected as a member of the township advisory board. At the Democratic primary, on April 3, 1914, he was nominated for prosecuting attorney for Allen county by a splendid majority and his election assured.

Mr. Emrick has always been a Democrat and a staunch one, as was his father before him, and is always ready to do his best for party success. His recent nomination is a clear expression of the high regard in which he is held by his fellow Democrats. He is affiliated with many social and fraternal organizations, among them being the Elks, Eagles, Buffalos, Moose, Knights of Pythias, and the Masonic fraternity, in which he has taken the 32nd degree, Scottish Rite, and is also a member of the Shrine. His clubs are the Jefferson Club, the Commercial Club and the German Athletic Club.

Franklin A. Emrick married Mary E. Hill, also a native of Indiana, and they have two children.

MARION A. EMSHWILLER, M. D.

Dr. Marion A. Emshwiller is a native Indianian and may likewise be called a native in the cause of Democracy. Dr. Emshwiller was born on October 25, 1869. After a course in the Montpelier high school he attended DePauw University in 1885 and 1886. He then took up the study of medicine, attending the Medical College of Indiana, now a part of the University of Indiana, and received his diploma. This training for his chosen profession he followed in 1911 with a post-graduate course at the Chicago Polyclinic, an institution known for its thoroughness.

Dr. Emshwiller is a member of the Blackford county medical society and of the Indiana state medical society. In 1892 he was elected coroner of Blackford county, being the first Democrat ever elected to that office. For the past three years he has been physician for Harrison township.

On October 8, 1891, Dr. Emshwiller was married to Miss Maggie E. Patterson, who passed away on April 1, 1895. In September, 1896, he married Miss Leota E. Adams.

Dr. Emshwiller has ever taken a deep interest in furthering the principles of Democracy. As an active worker for the party he is a familiar figure in the councils of party workers, is always a delegate to the county convention, and was a delegate to the last state convention.

WILLIAM ESPENSCHIED

The gentleman whose name appears above is well known to the citizens of Mt. Vernon and vicinity, he having been a resident of that locality for many years and the holder of various positions of responsibility and trust in the service of the commonwealth.

William Espenschied was born in the state of Kansas on the 27th day of April, 1876, but at the age of two years came with his parents to Indiana, the family locating at Mt. Vernon, where he received his early schooling, graduating from the high school. Later he pursued a course of study at Indiana University, from which institution he was graduated with the degree of bachelor of laws. In the same year he was admitted to the bar of Posey county and entered into the active practice of his profession at Mt. Vernon.

In the year 1899, Mr. Espenschied was appointed deputy prosecuting attorney for the 11th Judicial District, and in that capacity served until 1901, when he was elected to the position of prosecuting attorney of the same district for a two-year term. At the expiration of this period he was re-elected to the position of prosecutor, serving until 1905 with much credit to himself and his constituents. He later served as city attorney of Mt. Vernon, displaying in this capacity his characteristic energy and intelligence.

On the 30th day of October, 1901, Mr. Espenschied was united in marriage to Miss Katherine Gounerman. Fraternally, he is an active member of Beulah Lodge No. 578, Free and Accepted Masons, and of Mt. Vernon Lodge, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

MOSES EPSTEIN

The name of Moses Epstein is widely known among the citizens of Frankfort and of Clinton county, for he has been a substantial member of the community for thirty-eight years, closely identified with the business and civil life of the place, and belonging to the class of men who, by their stability and conservative methods add dignity and weight to the various interests with which they are identified.

Mr. Epstein was born on the 5th day of July, 1852, in Dearborn county, Indiana, and received his education in the public schools of Louisville, Kentucky. Miss Henrietta Gradwohl became his wife and the mother of his two children, a son and daughter. In the year 1876 he established his home in Frankfort, and since that time has shown an unusually keen interest in civil affairs, particularly those movements which tend to alleviate the sufferings of the unfortunate. He is at this time a trustee of the Northern Indiana Hospital for the Insane, having been appointed in 1911 for a term of four years. He is also a member of the Board of Charities and the Board of Children's Guardians, and is affiliated with the fraternal orders of Elks and Knights of Pythias. In all these various relations he has proven himself a man of sterling worth and unquestioned integrity.

Politically he is a staunch Democrat and an active worker for the success of the party, giving liberally of his time, as well as his means, to promote the principles of true democracy.

WILLIAM H. EVERROAD

William H. Everroad, a prominent attorney of the city of Columbus, Indiana, senior member of the firm of Everroad & Cooper, was born in the state of Illinois on the 27th day of June, 1858. In childhood he came with his parents to Bartholomew county, Indiana, and here his schooling was received until he entered Hartsville University. On the 25th day of December, 1883, he was married to Miss Mary B. Sweeney, whose birth occurred in Greencastle, Indiana, on the 2nd day of February, 1864. Six years later he was elected prosecuting attorney of the 9th Judicial Circuit of Indiana, which position he held until the expiration of his term in 1891. In the year 1908 he was elected as delegate to the national Democratic convention at Denver for the 4th Congressional District.

WALTER J. FABING

Though still a member of the younger element in the party, Walter J. Fabing of Valparaiso has been, for a number of years, a valued worker in the ranks and has established an enviable reputation among the legal fraternity of this section.

Mr. Fabing was born March 15, 1890, in Porter county, and attended the schools of Valparaiso. Following his graduation from the high school he entered Valparaiso University, and completed a course in law. After graduation he was admitted to the bar of Porter county and entered into the active practice of this profession. In this work he has evinced marked ability and unflagging energy and on the 6th day of March, 1913, was honored by receiving the appointment to the position of prosecuting attorney for the county. Prior to this period he was a law partner of D. E. Kelly.

Since attaining his majority he has been an active party worker, and in the campaign of 1912 was president of the Woodrow Wilson Club of Valparaiso.

Mrs. Fabing, to whom he was married June 3rd, 1913, was formerly Miss Kathryn Reagan; and she has proved a worthy second in his career and a charming hostess to the friends whom they have drawn about them.

JAMES W. FALCONBURY

The gentleman whose name appears at the heading of this article has for many years been a prominent member of the community and an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party.

James W. Falconbury is a native of Indiana, born on the 18th day of April, 1852. His life has been spent near the site of his present home, and his education was received in the common schools of Marshall county. He has been thrice married and is the father of eighteen children, sixteen of whom are now living, nine sons and seven daughters. His first marriage, to Miss Nancy A. Moffitt, occurred September 17, 1871; his second, to Miss Hattie Rowan, was solemnized November 29, 1875; and on the 7th of May, 1886, he was united in marriage to Miss Fannie Badgley.

In the year 1884 he was appointed postmaster of Rutland, serving for a term of four years, and again, during the period from 1892 to 1896, he discharged the duties of this office. Twice, also, has he been elected to the position of sheriff of Marshall county, his first term beginning January 1, 1911, and his second two years later, when he was re-elected and served until the close of the year 1914.

Mr. Falconbury has, throughout most of his life, found his pleasure as well as his profit in tilling the soil, and his sons have been taught the independence of the life of the agriculturist.

JOSEPH A. FAUST

Joseph A. Faust is a native of the State of Indiana, born at Lafayette, June 15, 1851, the eldest son of Joseph A. and Elizabeth (Buffert) Faust, both natives of Germany.

Mr. Faust was educated in the Catholic and public schools of Peru and was one of the seven members of the first graduating class of the Peru High School, that event occurring in 1870.

After his graduation, Mr. Faust taught German in the school he had just left, also teaching the philosophy and astronomy classes, but, not caring to continue in educational work, he became a dry goods salesman, then a book agent, and afterwards worked at his trade, that of cooper, which he had learned while working with his father. At this time he took up the study of law, being admitted to the bar in April, 1877. With the exception of a brief time when he was located in Cincinnati, Mr. Faust has been a continuous resident of the city of Peru, practicing his profession, and by his integrity, accomplishments and good citizenship, has taken a prominent place in the community. At the present time but two members of the Miami county bar antedate the admission of Mr. Faust to the bar.

Mr. Faust was twice a member of the school board, serving each time as secretary, being elected each time without his knowledge or consent, and resigning each time to accept the city attorneyship, which office he held for three terms, aggregating a period of eight years and three months.

While serving his second term on the school board the question of erecting a new high school was before the board, one of the trustees being for and the other against razing the old building. Mr. Faust's vote caused the razing of the school from which he had graduated, and which is replaced by the present magnificent structure, the pride of Peru, equipped with all the improvements applicable to modern schools. Mr. Faust devoted a great deal of his time to this end, being retained by the school board as clerk after his resignation until the building was completed.

Mr. Faust has always been a Democrat. He served as secretary of the central committee in 1884, chairman of the same in 1886 and vice-chairman a number of times since. On all occasions he has devoted his time and energy to further the interests of his party.

Mr. Faust was married May 13, 1879, to Mary Jane Comerford, and to them have been born seven children—Mary Elizabeth, wife of Charles A. Gosselin, of Kansas City, Mo.; Mary Agnes; Anna Louisa, deceased; Mary Josephine; Clara Gladys; Joseph Anton, and Rose, deceased.

EDWARD WEBSTER FELT

Judge Edward Webster Felt, for many years a representative citizen of Hancock county, is a man of wide acquaintance, deep experience and unusual attainments; noted among his constituents for his broad-minded policies, progressive ideas and just decisions. In the discharge of his official duties he has shown a loyalty to the interests of the public combined with the utmost fairness in rendering decisions from the bench, and his position in the legal profession of the State is an enviable one.

Judge Felt is a native of the State of Virginia, his birth having occurred on the 7th day of November, 1859. When less than one year of age, however, his parents came to Indiana, and it was in the schools of the Hoosier State that his education was received. After graduating from the public schools of Hancock county he entered the educational field, teaching school in the winter from the years 1880 to 1886, except the school year of 1883-84. In the meantime, when not teaching he pursued his studies at the Central Normal College of Danville, Ind., from which he graduated with the class of 1884. The following year, on the 17th day of April, his marriage to Miss Mattie L. Thomas was solemnized and their home established in the city of Greenfield, where he continued to teach and study, reading law with James A. New of that place, and being admitted to the bar in the year 1887.

Henceforth Judge Felt entered with characteristic energy and zeal into the active practice of law, and so well did he succeed that but three years elapsed before he held the responsible position of prosecuting attorney of Hancock county, his term of office extending over two terms, from 1890 to 1894. Two years later he assumed the duties of county attorney, serving in this capacity for three years. In the fall of 1900 he was elected to assume the still greater responsibilities of circuit judge of the 18th Judicial Circuit, and in this position he remained for the ensuing six years. In the year 1910 he was elected to the position of judge of the appellate court of Indiana, First District, and in 1914 was re-nominated without opposition and re-elected.

Throughout his career Judge Felt has administered the affairs of the various positions of responsibility with conscientious zeal and loyalty, and richly deserves the trust reposed in him by the entire community of Hancock county and the State of Indiana.

Politically, he has consistently adhered to the tenets of the Jeffersonian party, taking an active part in the counsels of the county organization and acting as county chairman during the years of 1894, 1896 and 1898. He has also evinced a deep interest in the various movements which have arisen from time to time for the betterment and development of the community at large, and has been an active member of all "booster" organizations in his section of the State. He is also a communicant of the Methodist church, and for many years has taught a men's bible class.

In fraternal circles he is also widely known, being an active member of the leading orders of Greenfield and Indianapolis, including the Irvington Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons; Greenfield Chapter, Royal Arch Masons; Greenfield Commandery of Knights Templar; Eastern Star, Indianapolis Consistory, 32d degree; Murat Temple Chapter, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine of Indianapolis; Greenfield Lodge No. 135, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Eureka Lodge No. 20, Knights of Pythias of Greenfield; Order of Red Men; Woodmen of the World, and Maccabees.

Five children have come to the home of Judge and Mrs. Felt, three of whom are now living.

HULBERT M. FERGUSON

To the miners of the state of Indiana the name of Hulbert M. Ferguson is a household word, his activities as an operator and a man who at all times seeks to promote the best interests of the men employed in this work being known to all. As a citizen of Vermilion county he is equally well known, having served the commonwealth as an honored official and having been closely identified with business, political and fraternal affairs in this community for many years.

Mr. Ferguson is a true Hoosier, born in this state on the third day of October, 1869. He attended the public schools of Terre Haute, and early in life became interested in coal mining in the surrounding fields. In Clinton his interests have centered and his activities have been most marked.

On the thirteenth day of June, 1904, he was married to Miss Leora Campbell. Their home, then established in this community, has extended hospitality to a host of friends throughout the state; and in the various enterprises which have been in his care she has proved a worthy second.

In November, 1909, he was elected to the position of mayor of Clinton, and the responsibilities of this office were assumed early in the following year. During his incumbency of this office its affairs were carried on with characteristic energy and zeal. Finding, however, that his private affairs must suffer if his full duty were accomplished in his public capacity, he resigned at the expiration of his second year of service, and has since devoted his energies to carrying forward the work of the Clinton Coal Company, of which he is general manager and a heavy stockholder. For twelve years he has been a member of the executive board of the Indiana Coal Operators' Association. This position has brought him in close touch with work for the rescue of miners and first aid in mine accidents, and in this connection he has contributed valued service in behalf of the employes and operators.

When a movement was instituted for establishing a public library in Clinton Mr. Ferguson was one of the most active promoters, and the consummation of the plan in the fine library which this community now enjoys has been a source of unmixed satisfaction to him. He has been a member of the executive board of this institution since its organization.

In fraternal circles Mr. Ferguson is perhaps best known through his connection with the Knights of Pythias, he having been an active member of this organization for the past twenty-five years, and a member of the Uniform Rank, Terre Haute Company, for eleven years. His work as captain of the Clinton Company Uniform Rank, for the past nine years has won high honor and distinction for himself and his company at the various national and state encampments at which they have drilled. He also enjoys membership in the Illinois Athletic Club of Chicago, having been associated with this organization for the past ten years.

Politically, Mr. Ferguson has been a consistent adherent to the principles of Jefferson, and has been actively interested in the promotion of the interests of Democracy in his home community.

THOMAS FERGUSON

The career of Thomas Ferguson, elected auditor of Vigo county in 1914, is unique and interesting, and his rapid rise from miner to county auditor is evidence of his remarkable energy and ability.

Mr. Ferguson is a native of this county, born on the first day of February, 1874; and received his education in the common schools of his district. When but fifteen years of age, his father passed from this life, and it fell to the lot of the two sons to support themselves and the mother and sister; so Thomas found employment in a coal mine, and here he labored until the fall of 1908.

At the age of nineteen years he was united in marriage to Miss Stella May Baker, their union being solemnized on the 26th day of April, 1893. On the 15th day of May, 1908, however, death claimed her. On the 26th of November, 1908, he was married to Miss Blanch E. Moore.

In the fall of 1907 he was elected to the office of city councilman for Seelyville, and the following year assumed the duties and greater responsibilities of township trustee. In the fall of 1914 he received the nomination for county auditor, and in the election which followed was elected to this position. When he became township trustee the Democratic poll showed a Republican majority in the township of 165; but Mr. Ferguson received a majority of 44 votes.

Fraternally he is allied with Brazil Lodge No. 264, F. and A. M.; K. of P. Lodge No. 391, and I. O. O. F. No. 865 of Seelyville; and the Eagles and Loyal Order of Moose of Terre Haute.

J. A. FIELDS

A. J. Fields is the scion of a long line of sterling ancestry, his forebears having participated in the Revolutionary war and in the war of 1812.

Mr. Fields was born in Lawrence county, Indiana, August 26, 1879, and his early education was received in Martin county. He was graduated from the Shoals high school and then entered Indiana University, from which institution he was graduated in 1904 with the degree of bachelor of laws. In September of the same year he entered upon the practice of law and has since been thus successfully engaged.

In 1909 Mr. Fields was elected mayor of Bedford and during his administration the city made great strides, there being made valuable additions to the water works system, new lighting contracts more favorable to the city, an increase in street lighting, the installation of boulevard lights, and, notwithstanding the improvements, more than $25,000 of Bedford's indebtedness was paid off.

Mr. Fields was the second Democratic mayor to have been elected in Bedford, and in 1913 he was re-elected. His sound business judgment has earned him the commendation of his fellow citizens.

Mr. Fields is a Mason, a Noble of the Mystic Shrine, and is also affiliated with the Elks and the Moose.

J. C. FISHEL

J. C. Fishel has attained prominence in his native state by unusual business ability, coupled with aggressive, untiring labor at his chosen vocation, that of a breeder of fine poultry. He was born in Hope, Bartholomew county, Indiana, on the 9th day of July, 1858, and here his education was obtained and his life has been spent. In the year 1879 he was married to Miss Miranda Schultz, a graduate of the female seminary of the place. A splendid family have come to bless the home of Mr. and Mrs. Fishel, and now five sons have added their names to the list of loyal Democrats, and three daughters are their mother's faithful assistants. Mr. Fishel has consistently voted the Democratic ticket throughout his life and is held in high regard by his constituents, as is evidenced by the fact that he was for four years a member of the town council of Hope and was appointed as postmaster of Hope by President Wilson, in which capacity he is now serving the public. As a business man he has, together with his brother, Ulysses, demonstrated the possibilities of their chosen vocation, breeders of fine poultry, and each in his particular breed of stock is surpassed by none. Diligent, skillful and aggressive, he has added much to the prestige of his native town, and has gained a national reputation.

ULYSSES R. FISHEL

The name of Ulysses R. Fishel is known throughout Indiana as that of a man loyal always to the principles of Democracy, and also as an active and aggressive business man. His birth occurred on the 23rd day of November, 1866, in the little town of Hope, and here he passed through the various stages of childhood and manhood, attending the public schools of the place, and finally developing with the growth of the place into a man of affairs. As breeders of high grade poultry he and his brother have become known not only throughout this state, but throughout the United States, and in farming sections particularly the name of Fishel is a household word. His stock has won prizes in five international expositions and 28 large poultry shows throughout this country.

Mr. Fishel was married to Miss Mary E. Atkesom. Politically, he has never failed to vote and work for the Democratic ticket, and feels that his principles are so firmly established in this regard that the rest of his life will be spent in the ranks of this party. He holds no public office and wants none, but is always anxious to assist his friends secure the offices to which they aspire.

JAMES R. FLEMING

James R. Fleming was born on a farm near Sulphur Springs, Henry county, Indiana, November 8, 1881, his parents being George R. and Sarah Fleming. He graduated from the country schools of Henry county, Elwood High School and from the law department of the University of Michigan, class of 1904. Soon after his graduation he entered the practice of law at Portland, Indiana, and was elected prosecuting attorney of Jay county in 1906 on the Democratic ticket and re-elected in 1908.

He was the Democratic representative from Jay county in the 68th General Assembly and was elected to the state senate from the district comprising the counties of Jay and Randolph, serving in that capacity in the 69th General Assembly.

He was married in 1906 to Miss Jennie Adair of Portland, and they have one daughter, Marian. Mr. Fleming is a member of the Masons, Elks, Eagles and K. of P. lodges.

He is actively engaged in the practice of his profession and enjoys an extensive legal practice.

HARVEY H. FLORA

The present postmaster of the city of Frankfort is a man of wide acquaintance and broad experience with men; eminently fitted for the important position to which he has been called. Harvey H. Flora is a native Hoosier, his birth having occurred on the 8th day of October, 1866, in Carroll county. He attended the common schools and later the high school in the little town of Flora. Then followed a two years' course in DePauw University at Greencastle. He was united in marriage to Miss Emma T. Dornier. Throughout his career he has, by his genial manner and kindly sympathy, bound to himself many friends; and he has never ceased to labor for the welfare of true Democracy in his locality. On the 2d day of February, 1914, he was appointed to the position of postmaster of the city of Frankfort.

Mr. Flora has taken a deep interest in fraternal affairs and is affiliated with the Order of Red Men, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Travelers' Protective Association; and it is a source of pride with him that he has passed through all the degrees of the Masonic order.

WILLIAM MICHAEL FOGARTY

William Michael Fogarty, extensively known and liked as well over the state, was born in Lima, Ohio, November 29, 1873. He lived in Indianapolis almost continuously since 1878. His has been an experience rather out of the ordinary. His father died at an early age, and the young man made his own way. Carrying every newspaper in Indianapolis, shining shoes on the streets, bell-hop in every Indianapolis hotel of any size, messenger boy for the Western Union, Postal, the old Baltimore & Ohio telegraph, and the old District Telegraph company, he earned his way through to the presidency of the Fidelity Trust Company of Indianapolis, to which office he has been continuously elected.

He spent sixteen years in the telegraph business, the last ten years of which was as press operator for the different press associations. As a telegrapher he was known throughout the country as one of the experts. He won the first prize in a telegraph speed contest in 1891. He was entered in both sending and receiving speed contests, but after winning the first receiving prize, which is considered the most important, he withdrew from the sending contest as a courtesy to the other contestants. As a writer of marked ability Mr. Fogarty has contributed much verse to newspapers and magazines. When he was elected city clerk of Indianapolis he was prevailed upon by numerous friends and published a small volume of verse known as "Giggle Time and Others."

He was married in 1895 to Miss Ida Justine Smith. To this happy union have come nine children, five boys and four girls.

Mr. Fogarty was elected county chairman by the Democrats of Marion county in 1908, when the entire Democratic county ticket was elected. When Thomas R. Marshall was elected governor of Indiana he appointed Mr. Fogarty as one of the first members of the Indiana State Board of Accounts. The organization of the Fidelity Trust Company was at that time in Mr. Fogarty's hands and after a year's service for the State he resigned from the accountant board to devote all his time to the trust company. From a capitalization of $100,000 the company in ten years grew to resources of approximately $1,500,000, attesting to the attention given the business by Mr. Fogarty and his associates.

Mr. Fogarty's nomination for the office of treasurer of Marion county in 1918 was unopposed. He served several years as treasurer of the Democratic state committee. He has worked and worked hard since he was a mere boy of eleven years. He attended St. Patrick's school in Indianapolis and graduated from the American Central Law School in 1914.

Shortly after the United States entered the war with Germany, attesting his intense Americanism, he offered his services to the Government signal corps and was at once accepted. In September, 1917, he organized a school for wireless telegraphy under the supervision of the Government and the Indianapolis public school authorities. An equipment was rigged up in one of the buildings at the Technical High School and he devoted three nights a week to this work. Later he was transferred to the Manual Training High School and from there to the Indianapolis Board of Trade building, where the classes were held nightly until all the 25 men in the class were called by the Government. This was the nightly offering to our Government of something he could do, and do well.

Mr. Fogarty now receives about 25 letters a month from as many young men scattered over the world who were given a lift prior to entering the service. To understand what this means one must know that the wireless code of telegraphy is not that used by the commercial telegraph companies in the United States. It is the code used by the European countries both on land and sea. Mr. Fogarty had experience in the use of wireless telegraphy on the Atlantic ocean. He realized, perhaps better than many of the Government men not actually in the signal corps service how long it takes to train men for this work, even though they were actually in the telegraph business in this country, on account of the use of the different code, and he began early. As a result 25 men entered the service during 1918 with months of advance practice in the work they were about to take up, all a tribute by Mr. Fogarty to his country's cause.

MICHAEL E. FOLEY

Soon after Michael E. Foley first began to talk he was talking politics. He talked Democracy. When he began to read he would read political history, and he knew the reason for the faith that was in him. He knew why he was a Democrat and why all other people ought to be, and he never enjoyed anything more than the pleasure of speaking to his audiences and telling them these reasons. So it was perfectly natural that he should become and continue to be one of the most attractive campaign speakers in his party, and he always maintained and was able to impart the enthusiasm of his youth through all the campaigns of maturer years.

A native of Indiana, born in Crawfordsville, graduated from Wabash College and from Columbia University Law School, he practiced law at Crawfordsville for ten years as the partner of A. D. Thomas, at the age of thirty-six becoming the principal trial lawyer for the Indiana traction companies and locating his headquarters at Indianapolis.

Aside from his activities as a campaigner he served from 1908 to 1912 as a member of the Democratic state central committee. He was appointed a member of the state prison board by a Republican governor in 1907, and continued to serve under other Democratic and Republican governors in the same position, one in which efficiency rather than politics controlled.

During the war with Germany the call came to him to accept the position of chairman of the Indiana State Council of Defense, a place to which no salary attached, but where much service could be done toward the winning of the war. The offer of the position came from a Republican governor and Mr. Foley at once retired from his legal practice to undertake the chairmanship, giving the work his exclusive time and attention to the conclusion of the war.

Under the direction of Chairman Foley the Indiana council maintained a position recognized and officially acknowledged by the national council at Washington as leading all the states in doing things effectively and with the promptness and earnestness that are factors in driving to victory.

WILLIAM H. FOLEY

The present messenger of the appellate court of Indiana has been for a number of years an active worker in the ranks of the party, and to the members of the local organization his name is a familiar one.

He is a native of the Hoosier state, born on the 18th of August, 1886. He attended the parochial schools of Indianapolis, later continuing his studies at Manual Training High School.

After completing his school work he studied telegraphy and for a number of years was operator for the Pennsylvania Railway Co. He has always been an enthusiastic worker for party success and served as precinct committeeman for two years. Twice, also, he was delegate to congressional conventions, and was a member of the state convention of 1914. He is a member of the Indiana Democratic club and of the Irish-American Democratic club also.

On the first day of January, 1914, he assumed the duties of messenger of the appellate court for a term of four years.

PETER A. FOLLMAR

Though a native of the "Fatherland" Peter A. Follmar has been for many years an honored citizen of Indiana and a trusted official in the service of the public at various times since his youth.

Mr. Follmar was born on the 6th day of August, 1851, at Blissranch Bach, Germany, but at the age of nine years accompanied his parents to Indiana, they settling in Fulton county, two miles east of Monterey. Here he continued his education, begun in Germany, in the schools of Plymouth and Monterey.

In the year 1873, on the 14th day of October, he was united in marriage to Miss Josephine Kietzer, and their home was established on a farm east of Monterey until 1880, when Mr. Follmar moved to Monterey.

In 1872 he was elected justice of the peace of Tippecanoe township and in this capacity he served for a period of eight years, winning the esteem of the community by his strict justice to all. During President Cleveland's last administration he served as postmaster for the full term of four years. He also held the position of county commissioner of Pulaski county for a term of six years, and in this capacity also his sterling qualities were demonstrated.

In the fall of 1912, also 1914, he was elected to represent the counties of Starke, Pulaski and St. Joseph in the legislature of the state, and in this position he served with conscientious zeal for the welfare of the community and his constituents and was asked to make a race for a third term, but declined.

GEORGE FORD

A resident of the city of South Bend for nearly seventy years, Mr. George Ford is well known throughout the county and vicinity. His career as attorney at law, prosecuting attorney and congressional representative has been of such a character as to establish an enviable reputation in the community as a man of marked ability and sterling qualities.

Mr. Ford was born on the 11th day of January, 1846, in South Bend, and here his life has been spent. He attended the common schools of the city and law school of Michigan University. In the year 1873 he was appointed by Governor Hendricks prosecuting attorney for the Laporte and St. Joseph circuit courts, and in this capacity served for a period of one year. In 1874 was elected prosecuting attorney for same circuit, and continued to hold the office for the period of ten years. In the fall of 1884 he was elected representative from the Thirteenth district of Indiana to the Congress of the United States, and in the 49th Congress he was an active participant. In 1914 he was elected judge of St. Joseph superior court, and is now serving in that office.

Politically, he has been a staunch adherent to Democratic principles and has rendered valued service to the party.

ERNEST E. FORSYTHE

Ernest E. Forsythe was born April 2, 1873, at Nineveh, Johnson county, Indiana, and educated in the common and high schools of that town and at Central Normal College at Danville, Indiana.

As a profession he engaged in the real estate business and continued that line of work for sixteen years. He became known over the entire State of Indiana through his extensive real estate transactions. His business was always conducted on a high standard and in all his many years of experience it is said that he never had occasion to engage in a single lawsuit, so common to that line of business. In 1902 he moved to Odon, Daviess county, Indiana, and began the development of a large tract of marsh lands in that county and here his extensive business ran into many hundred thousand dollars. It was here he became active in politics. He removed to the county seat, Washington, in 1907, and was made Democratic city chairman in the campaign of 1908. As an organizer he has few equals, and in that hard fought city election he successfully carried the entire Democratic ticket into power. He was then made county chairman and through his close organization, the entire Republican office holdings were replaced with Democrats. He was re-elected county chairman with like results. State Chairman Bernard Korbly commended Mr. Forsythe for his organization work as one of the best of any county chairman in the state. His political activities were of a clean character and he won his victories by close organization. Mr. Forsythe was appointed postmaster of the city of Washington by President Wilson, July 13, 1913, with no opposition, having the solid and undivided support of the Democratic party of his county. He was re-appointed for a second term of four years more, January 1, 1918, and was the first postmaster of the new federal building of that city, costing $60,000.

Mr. Forsythe was married to Mabel C. Fisher of Franklin, Indiana, June 1, 1900, and has two sons. Mr. Forsythe's activities are not confined to politics. He is an active worker in the church life of his city and is a member of the official board of the Christian church of his city. He has been a leading factor in the Bible school work and gives unsparingly of his time and money in support of that work.

He also is interested in the educational work of the city and served as a member of the Washington city school board of education and during his term of office a manual training building was erected, costing $70,000, which is the pride of his city.

As a war postmaster he has been one of the hardest workers in support of the government in all its war work, being a member of the Council of Defense committee, Red Cross, and chairman of the county on the Y. M. C. A.

He owns a beautiful residence known as Graham Place, one of the finest in the city of Washington.

FRANK P. FOSTER

Mr. Foster is a native of this state, born in Orange county on the 8th day of January, 1856. He attended the public schools in early youth at Paoli, later at Mitchell, and then at Bloomington, where he finished the high school branches in 1876. In the fall of that year he enrolled as a student at Indiana State University, choosing the classical course, and graduated in 1879. Then he took up the study of law in the office of Howell D. Thompson at Anderson, Indiana, and after three years' preparation was admitted to practice at the Madison county bar, in the supreme court of Indiana and the federal district court. In his work as an attorney, he has evinced ability, conscientious zeal for his clients and the success which usually comes to the faithful practitioner.

He represented Madison county in the lower house of the general assembly of 1877 where he was influential in helping to achieve the nomination and election of David Turpie to the United States Senate; when also he introduced the first bill submitted to an Indiana legislature to do away with the fee system for county officers. He was re-elected to the legislature of 1879, when he gave active and effective support to the reform and progressive measures of that memorable session, among which were the Australian ballot law, the Indiana school book law and the penal law aimed at corrupt practices at elections.

In December, 1891, Mr. Foster happily claimed as his wife Miss Diadema E. Murphy, daughter of William V. T. Murphy of Mitchell, Indiana. Thereupon they established their home in Anderson, where two years afterward a son, Frohman, was born to them, and where the family continued to reside, in the full joy of domestic affection and the sure delight of a genuine hospitality to their legion of friends, until the death of Mrs. Foster, 1911.

Mr. Foster became the mayor of Anderson in 1910 by the preference of a large majority of the voters. The record of his administration as such for economy, progress and high devotion to civic morals and advancement has never been surpassed in his home city or in any municipality. The merits of his work in this field grow as time leaves it behind us, and to which the citizens of Anderson without distinction of party bear witness.

INMAN HENRY FOWLER

Inman Henry Fowler was born June 7, 1834, at Lewisburg, Ohio, eighteen miles from Richmond, Ind., the son of John and Sarah (Kesler) Fowler. His great-grandfather, Jacob Fowler, came from Germany to this country about 1750. Jacob Fowler married an English lady by the name of Sarah Inman, whose maiden name the subject of this sketch bears. January 1, 1831, John Fowler married Sarah Kesler, daughter of George and Catherine Kesler of Lewisburg. George Kesler, the grandfather of Inman H., was a soldier in the war of 1812, and was with Jackson at the battle of New Orleans. John and Sarah had born to them five children, four sons and one daughter. Inman H. was the third son. In 1836 John Fowler with his family moved from Lewisburg to Tippecanoe county, Indiana. August 25, 1839, the father of Inman H. died, and on September 19th, following, an older brother died. After this the mother with the remainder of the family returned to Tippecanoe county, settling on a farm near Lafayette, from there moving to Clinton county, where she died December 3, 1887.

Inman H., having been thrown upon his own resources early in life, had to struggle with many adverse fortunes; yet he availed himself of every opportunity to acquire an education, which he did by alternately attending and teaching school. He entered Wabash College in 1852, remaining for three years. In 1858 he located in Owen county at Spencer, teaching school in that town the first year. In 1859 he entered the clerk's office of the Owen circuit court as deputy under Basil Meek, where he remained for two years, until the expiration of Mr. Meek's term. On July 4, 1861, Inman H. was nominated by the Democratic convention of Owen county for clerk of the circuit court to succeed Mr. Meek. His opponents were Philip Buck of Quincy and William S. Bullet of Cataract. On the first ballot Inman H. was nominated, receiving all the votes but five. His opponent before the people was John J. Cooper. Mr. Cooper had just finished an eight-year term as county auditor and had made a very efficient officer, was very popular with his party, was conservative and had a host of warm personal friends among the Democrats. The Civil war had just broken out. Lifelong friends engaged in personal abuse of each other, and in bitter denunciation and arraignment. The election came off, the Democrats were successful, the entire ticket being elected. In 1865 Inman H. was re-nominated by his party for a second term without opposition. The republican candidate for clerk was Major Harry Woodsmall. Again the Democratic party was successful, and Mr. Fowler was elected to a second term. Those who remember the canvass of 1861, as the Civil war opened, and that of 1865, as it closed, remember them as the most remarkable political contests in the history of Owen county politics. Excitement and party zeal were such as had never been witnessed in Owen county in any political contest before or since.

Inman H. served as clerk until October 28, 1870, holding the office for one year longer than the term for which he was elected. This was because the general assembly in 1869 changed the election law from annual to biennial. Mr. Fowler's term would have expired the fall of 1869 had there been an election; there being no election until the next fall, he held over until his successor was elected in October, 1870. Meantime, he prepared himself for the practice of law, having determined to make that his profession and to make every other interest subservient to that one purpose. After retiring from the clerk's office he immediately entered the law department of the Indiana University, graduating in 1871 in a class of thirty-two, the largest law class that had ever graduated from the institution. He returned to Spencer, entering upon the practice of the law with the Hon. John C. Robinson. This partnership continued until the fall of 1876, when Mr. Robinson was elected judge of the Fifteenth Judicial Circuit, and at the same election Mr. Fowler was elected state senator for the district of Owen and Clay. His opponent in this contest was Dr. David M. McDonald, of Quincy, Owen county. Mr. Fowler's majority in the two counties was over 700.

He was a member of the senate during the regular and special sessions of 1877 and 1879. During his senatorial term he was an active, energetic working member. Placed on some of the most important committees, he always had an eye single to the interests of his constituents. Some of the most important bills introduced at these sessions were framed by him, and are now upon the statute books of the State. Among the bills which became laws, which originated in the house of representatives, one was to compel coal operators to ventilate their coal mines. This bill for four or five previous sessions had passed the house without opposition, but always met with bitter opposition and defeat in the senate. At the regular session of 1879, after the bill had passed the house, it came to the senate and was taken in charge by Senator Fowler. Although there was an organized opposition of the operators, after a heated and bitter contest, it passed the senate, was approved by the governor, became a law and yet remains upon the statute books.

In 1875 Mr. Fowler, with other stockholders, organized the Exchange Bank of Spencer, and was elected president and attorney for the bank, which position he has ever since held; and the success, standing and confidence enjoyed by the bank are largely due to his management of the finances of the institution.

In 1884 Mr. Fowler was again nominated for state senator in the old district of Owen and Clay. Mr. Barty Cusick, a coal miner in Clay county, was his opponent. Mr. Cusick had made a special study of the tariff question and was well informed on the subject. He was a protectionist of the strictest sort; an extremist—so much so that some of his party friends refused to support him. The tariff question was the main issue in the canvass. There was the election of a United States senator involved and Mr. Cusick went down in defeat. Senator Fowler served in the sessions of 1885 and 1887, and no senator in the body stood higher nor one whose opinions were more respected by his fellow senators.

Senator Fowler has passed the meridian of life; though past eighty-one he does not look to be over sixty, if that; is in perfect health and as active as at any time in his life. He is actively engaged in the practice of the law. He has large farming interests which he superintends, as well as superintending other business and financial interests. He is a Mason, Odd Fellow, Knight of Pythias, a member of the association of Sons of the American Revolution and a member of the Greek fraternity of Phi Kappa Psi. September 20, 1866, he was married to Miss Lovina Hollebeak, daughter of A. A. and Emily Hollebeak, of Springboro, Pa. By this union there have been four children, only one of whom is living, Mrs. John H. Smith, of Spencer.

WALTER J. FRANK

Walter J. Frank is descended from a line of staunch Democratic ancestors, and in his political faith he has lived true to the traditions of his family. His father was a lifelong worker for the principles of the Jeffersonian party, and the cause of Democracy has no stronger adherent than the son to whom we refer. Since he attained his majority he has labored zealously in each campaign, giving freely of his time and means, serving at times as precinct committeeman and as delegate to the various county and state conventions. He is a native of Dearborn county, having been born in the city of Aurora on the twenty-first day of December, 1885, and receiving his education in the schools there, attending the common and high schools. In March, 1899, he was united in the bonds of matrimony to Miss Anna Cox, and they have since resided in his home city, gathering around them a wide circle of friends and acquaintances.

Twenty-six years ago his father established himself in the bakery business, and the son, Walter, has proven first a faithful assistant and later a successful proprietor of this concern.

In the fall of the year 1913 he was elected city councilman, his tenure of office to expire January 1, 1918; and in this capacity he has shown a clear understanding of municipal affairs, progressive in his ideas, yet conservative in his actions on questions of large moment to the commonwealth. In whatever capacity we find him he is diligent in the performance of the duties in his charge, a true servant of the people, as well as a successful business man.

Fraternally, he is allied with the order of Eagles, among whom he is widely acquainted and highly esteemed.

ALVA OTIS FULKERSON

The position of county superintendent of schools is one which requires peculiar abilities in its incumbent; and in the person of Alva Otis Fulkerson Daviess county has happily solved this problem. A man of broad education, high character and rare tact, he has placed the schools of this county upon a high plane of scholarship.

Mr. Fulkerson was born in Daviess county, Indiana, on the 18th day of March, 1868. Here he received his schooling in the public schools of his district, and later continued his studies at the Indiana State Normal School of Terre Haute, graduating from this institution. Later he graduated from Indiana University. Following his graduation he entered the educational field, and as an instructor in the schools was very successful, being progressive in his methods and diligent in his work. On the 7th day of January, 1911, he was elected to the position of county superintendent for the unexpired term, and in June of that year was elected for the following term, receiving the unanimous vote of the trustees. In this position he continued until August, 1917, constantly increasing the efficiency of the school system under his control. He is now principal of the Washington high school.

On the 5th day of September, 1900, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Minnie E. Casey, and her interest and assistance have perhaps been a large factor in his success. Their home is well known throughout the community and its hospitality has been extended to a wide circle of friends.

Mr. Fulkerson has been actively interested in the local Democratic organization, and has represented his district in several state conventions.

Charles E. Fuller is a man who has truly "risen from the ranks" by virtue of his own unflinching energy and innate ability.

Mr. Fuller was born on the 27th day of August, 1867, on a farm three and one-half miles southwest of Worthington, Indiana. He attended the district schools of the county, and after his graduation from the grammar grades attended the Worthington High School, and later graduated from commercial college at Terre Haute.

For three years thereafter Mr. Fuller held a position in a mine, where he labored digging coal, and here he learned the practical side of the mining industry. At the expiration of this period, however, he became employed as weighmaster for the Shirley Hill Coal Company, holding this position also for a period of three years. He was then promoted to the office as bookkeeper and paymaster, and served in this capacity until the fall of 1910, when he made the race for county recorder and was elected to this position, assuming the duties of office on the 1st day of January, 1912, and being re-elected in 1914 for the second term.

On the 15th day of April, 1890, his marriage to Miss Nellie Spainhower was solemnized, and their home has been the meeting place of many friends during the years which have since elapsed.

JOHN LEWIS FULLING

Known throughout the state as an educator of ability and a public official of unusual attainments, John Lewis Fulling is deserving the high esteem in which he is held by his fellow citizens of Gibson county.

Mr. Fulling was born in Indiana on the ninth day of August, 1876, and attended the public schools of Gibson county, graduating from the Snake Run graded school and normal school of Princeton. This was followed by a commercial course, and in this latter branch he has developed unusual ability. For nine years Mr. Fulling taught in the schools of Gibson county, and for eight years he held the responsible position of county superintendent of schools, an office demanding unusual qualifications.

On the 29th of May, 1911, he was appointed field examiner of the state board of accounts, and this position he held until July 29, 1913, at which time he assumed the duties of accountant for the Public Service Commission of Indiana, with headquarters at the Capitol in Indianapolis.

Since attaining his majority he has been actively interested in the success of the Democratic party, and for six years served as secretary of the county central committee.

Mrs. Fulling, to whom he was married March 6, 1901, was formerly Miss Mabel D. Shanner.

CHARLES N. FULTZ

One of the well-known leaders in the Democratic organization of Vermillion county, and a prominent attorney of Newport, is the gentleman whose portrait appears herewith, Chas. N. Fultz.

Mr. Fultz is a true son of Vermillion county, born on the 21st day of December, 1879, near Eugene, where his ancestors settled about 1827 and have ever since lived. He attended the common and high schools of Eugene, the academic and the law departments of Indiana University and was admitted to the Vermillion county bar in 1903. He was united in marriage April 9, 1902, to Goldie Smith of Georgetown, Illinois, who came from a good Kentucky Democratic parentage.

Upon his admission to the bar he located in Newport, where he has become identified with the business and political life of the community, giving freely of his time and energies for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy, and the promotion of the various movements instituted from time to time for the general progress of the community. In 1908 he served the party as vice-county chairman, and is the present Democratic county chairman.

Fraternally, Mr. Fultz is allied with the orders of Free and Accepted Masons, Newport Lodge No. 209; Royal Arch Masons, Vermillion Chapter No. 125, and Riverside Lodge No. 242, Knights of Pythias of Newport.

JUDGE JAMES F. GALLAHER

The name of Judge James F. Gallaher is familiar to the citizens of Laporte county and particularly to the residents of Michigan City, where he has long been an honored citizen.

Judge Gallaher is a native of the State of Missouri, his birth having occurred on the 22d day of October, 1860. He attended the public schools of his district, and later entered the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor for the purpose of studying law. Graduating from this institution in the year 1885, he was admitted to the bar of Michigan, but later came to Laporte county and engaged in the active practice of his chosen profession. In this he has demonstrated marked ability and conscientious zeal for the interest of his clients.

In the year 1910 he was elected judge of the Laporte circuit court, his term of office to expire in 1916.

HARRY M. GARDNER

Harry M. Gardner, Logansport, Ind., was born in Dunkirk, N. Y., September 15, 1880. He came to Indiana February 19, 1905, to work as reporter on the Logansport Reporter, independent daily newspaper. He became city editor and continued as such until the fall of 1912, when the paper became the Bull Moose organ of Cass county, so he resigned.

When the Reporter and Logansport Pharos (Democratic organ) consolidated in 1913 he became city editor of the Democratic organ.

Mr. Gardner was elected to the 1913 General Assembly, representing Cass and Fulton counties. Was not a candidate for renomination in 1914, but instead was candidate for county auditor, being defeated by a small vote in the convention. He was candidate for assistant clerk of the 1915 House of Representatives.

Mr. Gardner is at present employed on the Logansport Chronicle; is a member of the Elks No. 66 of Logansport; has always taken an active interest in Democratic politics; prior to coming to Logansport was on newspapers in Denver, Los Angeles, Buffalo and other cities; is a contributor to the magazines.

ANDREW A. GAST

One of the most active party workers of Fulton county, as well as one of the most aggressive and prominent business men of the community, is Andrew A. Gast, a citizen of Akron.

Mr. Gast was born on September 14, 1855, and received his education in the public schools of his home district. In the year 1879 he was married to Miss Laura A. Ball, but death deprived him of her companionship five years later. In the year 1886 his marriage to Miss Flora E. Bitters was solemnized, and she has since been his helpmate and the mistress of his home.

In the year 1885 Mr. Gast received the appointment of postmaster of the town of Akron, serving in that capacity until 1888, in which year he was elected sheriff of Fulton county for a term of four years. He also served his party at one time as county chairman.

Mr. Gast has engaged in numerous business enterprises, showing remarkable ability in this direction, and is now the owner of the Akron Light, Heat and Power Company, a manufacturer of drain tile and brick, a successful farmer, and general contractor.

LOUIS J. GAST

Louis J. Gast is a native of this state, born in Porter county on the 2nd day of March, 1875. He attended the common schools of his district, and in March, 1895, came to Valparaiso without a dollar and began working for J. W. Wood & Son in a grocery store at $5 per week. Here he remained a year, leaving to go with Fred Beyer in a general store, where he stayed fifteen years, after which he went into business for himself in a general store and grocery, also dealing in real estate, accumulating a fortune of about forty thousand dollars and owning besides his business block, a flat building, his residence and two fine farms west of Valparaiso.

Politically, Mr. Gast has always been a Democrat, and has labored zealously for the cause in this section. In 1910 he was elected city councilman for four years, and re-elected in 1914, his term to expire in 1918. Mrs. Gast, to whom he was married June 1, 1897, was formerly Miss Anna Henderlong.

JOHN GAUCK

An active party worker of Ripley county and closely identified with the business life of the community is John Gauck of Batesville. He is a native of Ripley county, born in Adams township on the 2nd day of March, 1856. He attended the common schools of his district, and in the year 1881 was united in marriage to Miss Clara Hohl, and has a family of six children, four girls and two boys.

Early in life he entered into commercial life, and later established the Western Furniture Co. He also held the position of assistant postmaster of Batesville during President Cleveland's second administration. He was city treasurer for a term of four years, and is a stockholder in the First National Bank of Batesville. He is now the proprietor of a thriving general merchandise store and actively interested in civic affairs. He has been an active party worker and attended county, district and state conventions. He is affiliated with the Catholic church and an active member of the Knights of Columbus; was nine years treasurer of the board of education and is now secretary and treasurer of the St. Louis cemetery committee.

JAMES W. GENTRY

Mr. James W. Gentry needs no introduction to the people of Hendricks county, for he is a native of this locality and has for many years held a position of influence in the community. He was born in Center township, November 4, 1866, and received his education in the common schools of the county. In January, 1890, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Nettie M. Neaville.

For four years he served as deputy sheriff of Hendricks county under John W. Ador, and in the fall of 1912 was elected to the position of sheriff and re-elected in 1914.

Mr. Gentry has, since his first vote was cast for Cleveland in 1888, been an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party, and has been in close touch with affairs of the county organization, attending many conventions as delegate. He is a member of the Indiana Democratic Club and is affiliated with the Improved Order of Red Men.

GEORGE WALLACE GILL

George Wallace Gill is descended from a long line of Democratic ancestors, and has since boyhood been an enthusiastic worker in the cause of Democracy.

He was born in Huntington county, on February 11, 1857. His grandfather Gill emigrated from Virginia in the early days, and his mother came from Tennessee in 1838, being one of five families to settle in Huntington county at that time. The son attended the country schools of the locality, and at an early age engaged in the mercantile business, which he conducted for a period of twenty-two years.

On the 11th day of February, 1882, his marriage to Miss Ella Downey was solemnized, and to her faithful companionship much of his success in material things and religious work is doubtless due. Mr. and Mrs. Gill are the parents of two sons, Harmon W. Gill, assistant cashier of the First National Bank, and Earl E. Gill, secretary-treasurer of the Thermos Silo Company at Huntington.

In the year 1878 he was nominated for justice of the peace of Lancaster township, being defeated by 14 votes, reducing the normal Republican majority of 85 to this figure. In later years he was nominated for county treasurer, and was again defeated by only 92 votes, at a time when the county went Republican by 500 majority. In 1910 he was again nominated for county treasurer, this time being elected by a majority of 67; and in 1912 was re-elected by a majority of 466—truly a remarkable record in a Republican stronghold. He has also been a delegate to several state conventions, and was chairman of the Democratic county committee in 1914, serving faithfully in the campaign of that year.

Mr. Gill is an active member of the First Christian church and the Y. M. C. A. of Huntington.

COURTLAND C. GILLEN

The gentleman whose name appears at the head of this article is a true product of this locality, his birth having occurred in Putnam county, Indiana, on the 3rd day of July, 1880. He received his schooling also in the common and high schools of the county, and following his graduation from the latter in the year 1897, he entered DePauw University for a year's additional study. Later he attended the Indiana Law School at Indianapolis, graduating in the year 1905.

In the same year he was admitted to the bar of Putnam county and located in Greencastle, entering at once into the active practice of the law. In this profession he demonstrated unusual capability, evincing a keen insight into complicated questions and working with unflagging energy for the interests of his clients; and soon a lucrative and steadily increasing practice came to him.

In the year 1909 he assumed the duties of county attorney for his district, and, save for one year and six months, has held this position until the present time, devoting himself conscientiously and zealously to the service of the commonwealth.

In the month of August, 1914, he became a member of the school board of the city of Greencastle, his term of three years to expire in August, 1917.

He has, since attaining his majority, been an enthusiastic worker for the cause of true Democracy, and during the campaign of 1914 held the position of secretary of the Putnam county Democratic central committee.

Mrs. Gillen, to whom he was married November 28, 1900, was formerly Miss Nellie B. Gough, who, as the presiding genius of his home and hostess to their many friends, has proved an able helpmate.

AMIEL C. GLADIEUX

Among the many Democrats of the state of Indiana who have given unselfishly of their time and service for the furtherance, growth and strength of their party, the name of Amiel Gladieux is a familiar one, this gentleman having taken an active part in politics since he cast his first vote, working loyally and conscientiously at the various elections and adhering stanchly at all times to the principles of true Democracy. In fact, the truths promulgated by Thomas Jefferson were instilled into his mind in childhood, as his father was a lifelong Democrat, an active worker in the party ranks, and at one time held the office of county commissioner for nine years.

Mr. Amiel C. Gladieux was born in Jefferson township, Allen county, on a farm, the son of Francis and Mary Gladieux. His birth occurred on the 7th day of March, 1870, and here, in the wholesome atmosphere of the farm, his childhood and youth were passed. Here he attended the district school, and as he grew in years and stature he mastered the many details of the science of farming and entered the profession of agriculture for himself, giving to this work the same zeal and attention to detail which has characterized his career in later life.

On the 29th day of February, 1894, he was united in marriage to Miss Ida Urbine, and four children have come to bless their home, three daughters and a son. Until the year 1909 Mr. Gladieux successfully carried on the labors of his farm, and his children, in turn, were given the advantage which he had enjoyed as a child of living in God's free out-of-doors; but in that year he became interested in the insurance business and organized the Wayne Health and Accident Insurance Company of Ft. Wayne, of which he is, at the present time, secretary and treasurer.

In the fall of 1912 he was nominated for the position of sheriff of Allen county and elected for a term of two years, assuming the duties of this position with the beginning of the following year.

At the expiration of this period he was re-elected to this responsible position. During the years he has served in this capacity he has taken an active interest in the study of criminology and of the latest methods employed by others in his position. To this end he has organized the Allen County Sheriffs' Protective Association, one of the strongest organizations in the state, of which he is president. He is also president of the State Sheriffs' Association and the Tri-State Sheriffs' Association.

Although taking so active a part in the work of his party for so many years, his present position is the first political position to which he has aspired; but he has brought to the administration of the affairs connected with it the most untiring zeal and devotion to duty, seeking to improve the condition of those unfortunates in his charge with due consideration to the rights of the taxpayers and the public.

During their long residence in Allen county and in their stay in Ft. Wayne, Mr. and Mrs. Gladeux have won for themselves a large circle of friends, many of whom have enjoyed the hospitality of their home and the delightful companionship of the family.

FRANK GILMER

Born in Charlottesville, Va., May 4th, 1891, Frank Gilmer resided in that state until 1909. He graduated in law at Valparaiso University with the class of 1911. In the spring of 1912 he opened his law office in South Bend and was actively engaged in the practice of his profession. He has been active in the Democratic party since coming to South Bend, and in 1917 was elected judge of the city court of South Bend, being one of the few Democratic candidates who were successful in that election. He is junior member of the law firm of Shively & Gilmer.

Mr. Gilmer is a member of the Eagles, the Modern Woodmen, the Masonic fraternity, Blue Lodge Chapter and Council, the Knights of Pythias, the Loyal Americans and the Loyal Order of Moose, in which he has held the office of dictator in South Bend Lodge No. 555.

The Gilmers have been Democrats since the days of Governor Gilmer, who was governor of Virginia and secretary of the navy under Andrew Jackson. Frank Gilmer (father) was prosecuting attorney in Virginia for twenty years and Mr. Gilmer's brother George now holds that office.

B. GLAZEBROOK

B. Glazebrook was born December 10, 1864, in San Pierre, Starke county, Indiana, a son of Dr. Lorenzo and Addie Bender Glazebrook. The family came originally from England.

Mr. Glazebrook had the advantages of a good education. After finishing a course at the public schools he took up the study of law with the late Judge George W. Beeman at Knox, being admitted to the bar in 1894. He also attended normal schools and Valparaiso University.

Early in his career he was elected prosecuting attorney of the 44th Judicial Circuit, and after completing his term was re-elected. During his practice in Knox he was county attorney of Starke county and also city attorney of Knox.

In 1911 he located in Indiana Harbor, forming a partnership with Newton A. Hembroff. On January 5, 1914, he took up his duties as city attorney of East Chicago and Indiana Harbor, being appointed to this position. He is a member of the bar of the United States supreme court.

Mr. Glazebrook is a stockholder and member of the board of directors of the First State Trust & Savings Bank of Indiana Harbor. He is a Master and Royal Arch Mason, Knights Templar and a member of the Mystic Shrine.

On March 26, 1911, he married Viola Summers Baker of Knox.

CHARLES L. GOETZ

A son of Casper and Mary (Holderied) Goetz, Charles L. Goetz was born in Rome, N. Y., on January 22, 1859. He received his education in the district and parochial schools of Rome, and at the age of fourteen began the trade of cigarmaker. He engaged in this trade until his removal to South Bend on April 29, 1881, and for four years thereafter. He then engaged in the manufacture of cigars, and at the present time has a large plant employing over forty employes and in addition is the owner of one of the finest city blocks in South Bend.

In 1883 Mr. Goetz was married to Emma E. Klingel, also a resident of South Bend, and they have one son, Philip K.

Mr. Goetz has always been active in public affairs in South Bend. For four years he served as deputy oil inspector, was a member of the board of public works and a member of the county council. He is a staunch Democrat, his public duties have always been discharged with promptness and fidelity, and he has supported all measures for the public good. He is a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

JOHN C. GORMAN

John C. Gorman is a product of Gibson county, his birth having occurred within its borders on the 12th day of December, 1866. His education was received in the schools of Owensville, his graduation from the high school taking place in the year 1883. On the 30th day of September, 1891, he was united in marriage to Miss Mary L. McGinnis.

It is, perhaps, through his work in the field of journalism that he is most widely known, for he has been engaged in this work since the year 1888. In 1895 he became the proprietor of the Princeton Democrat, a paper published daily and semi-weekly. For several years he has borne the honor of being secretary of the Democratic editorial association of the state; is also well known as an active member of the Princeton Commercial Club. He is a charter member of the Owensville Lodge of Knights of Pythias and a charter member of the B. P. O. Elks and Sons of Veterans, Princeton, Ind. In the years 1896 and 1898 he served as secretary of the Democratic county committee, and in 1914, on the 19th day of May, received from President Wilson the appointment to his present position, postmaster of Princeton.

WILLIAM B. GRAY

Few members of the order of the Knights of Pythias throughout the state are not familiar with the name of Brigadier-General Gray, commander of the Indiana brigade, U. R., and the same spirit of loyal endeavor which has characterized his work in this order has also been manifest in his business and political career.

He was born in Montgomery county, Indiana, on the 2nd day of December, 1862, and attended the public schools at Wesley and Waynetown, later taking a course at Ladoga Normal School and Purdue University. In the year 1900 he was elected the first mayor of Veedersburg on the Democratic ticket, this place being at that time a strong Republican stronghold, he being the second Democratic officer in this community for thirty years. In 1902 he was re-elected, and in 1906 was elected county auditor. In 1910 he was re-elected to this position, this time receiving a majority of 600 votes, a large gain over his first majority of 160. Thus he demonstrated his ability in the service of the public.

Mr. Gray is also successfully engaged in the mercantile business at Covington and has for many years been prominently identified with fraternal affairs, being an active member of the Elks, Veedersburg Lodge F. and A. M., Indianapolis Consistory Scottish Rite, Murat Temple Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, Order of Red Men, and the Knights of Pythias. In this latter order he has been very actively engaged since 1894 in building up its military department, and is known as one of the most successful commanders in the order, receiving the title of brigadier-general in 1911.

His wife, to whom he was married June 19, 1912, was formerly Miss Zoe V. Jones.

WILBUR ALLEN GRAY

Wilbur Allen Gray is essentially a self-made man, and as an aggressive business man and progressive citizen he has made for himself an enviable reputation and position in the community.

He was born near Oskaloosa, Iowa, on the 31st day of May, 1879, and came to this state at the age of thirteen years, residing upon a farm with his grandfather in Cleveland township, Elkhart county. He attended the common and high schools of St. Joseph county, Indiana. Politically he is a staunch Democrat, and has given freely of his time to assist the workers of the party in his district. In the year 1910 he assumed the duties of treasurer of the city of Elkhart, which position he held until the close of 1912, resigning that position on account of being elected to the position of treasurer of Elkhart county for a term of two years, assuming the duties of office on the 1st of January, 1913. On November 3, 1914, he was re-elected for a period of two years with an increased majority.

On the 16th of March, 1909, he was married to Miss Edna J. Funk; and the ensuing two years, while acting as treasurer of the city of Elkhart, he studied law in the evenings, and was admitted to the bar in October, 1911.

FRANCIS MARION GRIFFITH

In the roster of prominent members of the Indiana Democracy few names are found of more loyal workers than Francis Marion Griffith, native of Switzerland county. Having distinguished himself in various fields of endeavor, he has justly won the enviable reputation which he bears.

Mr. Griffith was born on the 21st day of August, 1849, and attended the common and high schools of Vevay. Following his graduation from this latter institution, he entered Franklin College for the purpose of continuing his education. Having completed his work here he entered the educational field, and in the year 1873 was elected county superintendent of schools, but resigned at the expiration of a year's service. On the first day of September, 1875, he assumed the duties of county treasurer of Switzerland county, and in this capacity served for a term of two years, establishing a record for zealous and splendid services. In the same year he was admitted to the bar of the county and entered into the practice of law, having acquired his legal education during the preceding years. In this profession he has since remained, demonstrating marked ability as a jurist and early in his career building for himself a lucrative practice.

In the year 1887 he was elected state senator from Ohio and Dearborn counties, and in the assemblies which followed until 1895, inclusive, he was an active and valued participant. In the fall of 1896 he was elected to represent the fourth district in the United States Congress, and in this position remained until 1905. He has also served the party as a member of the state central committee for eight years, and in 1914 was nominated by acclamation as the candidate for judge of the Fifth Judicial District of Indiana.

Mrs. Griffith, to whom he was married December 24, 1874, was formerly Miss Josie D. Saddy, and she has been a worthy second throughout his career.

WILLIAM E. GRINER

Mr. William E. Griner is well known to the residents of the town of Middlebury, Indiana, and throughout the county of Elkhart as well. He is a native Hoosier, born on the 6th day of February, 1864, and spending the years of his life within the boundaries of our state. His education was obtained in the schools of Elkhart county; and on the 22nd day of March, 1885, he was united in marriage to Miss Frances L. Bedford, and their permanent residence was established in the home of his childhood. Later he engaged in the retail lumber and coal business, and he has labored diligently for the upbuilding of the concern, which is evidenced by its growth as the years have passed. On the first day of January, 1900, he assumed the duties of township trustee of Middlebury township, serving in this capacity until the close of 1904. On the 1st of October, 1913, he took upon himself the greater responsibilities of county commissioner of Elkhart county, in which position he has remained until the present time.

Since attaining his majority he has been a loyal Democrat, losing no opportunity to further the cause of true Democracy in the community.

FRED C. GRISCHOW

An active party worker for many years, and the incumbent of various positions of responsibility in the service of the commonwealth, Mr. Fred C. Grischow is also closely identified with the business interests of Michigan City.

He is a native of Indiana, born in Michigan City, Laporte county, on the 15th day of May, 1859. He received his education in the schools of Michigan City, and at an early age entered into the commercial and political life of the place.

On the 22nd day of January, 1880, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Clara A. Hill, and their home was established in this city, and here their business interests have centered and their friendships have been made.

In July, 1906, he assumed the duties of police commissioner, and at the expiration of his term of three years in this position was elected city treasurer for a four-year term. In the fall of 1913 he was re-elected to this office, being the only Democrat elected at this election, and with an increased majority over 1907, and entered with renewed enthusiasm upon the duties of this position for a further term, to expire January 5, 1918.

AVERY McDONALD GROVES

Avery McDonald Groves, political editor of the Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette, was born July 9, 1886, in Milford, Kosciusko county, Indiana, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Milton B. Groves. He attended the common schools at Milford, finished high school and completed his education in Illinois.

After leaving school, Mr. Groves, following in the footsteps of his father, took up newspaper work and for many years worked on various papers of the twelfth and thirteenth districts. For some time he was managing editor of the Garrett Daily Press, and later took charge of the Lagrange Democrat, now the Lagrange Democrat-Call.

Eight years ago he accepted a position with the Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette as a proofreader and soon afterward was given a place on the reportorial staff. In 1913 he began writing politics for his paper and has continued in that capacity ever since.

Mr. Groves has always taken a deep interest in Democratic political affairs and much of his time during campaign years is spent on the stump as a public speaker.

FRANK V. GUTHRIE

The name of Frank V. Guthrie is perhaps familiar to every reader of this article, being that of the mayor of the city of Logansport, and for many years a prominent attorney of this place. His birth occurred on the 19th day of August, 1865, in the Hoosier state. His education was received in the public schools of his district, and later in Logansport High School. Since reaching maturity he has continued to study and inform himself upon all questions of interest to the community at large. From 1906 to 1912, inclusive, he was chairman of the Cass county Democratic central committee, and served as county attorney for four years, beginning January 1, 1909. In November, 1913, he was elected mayor of the city, his term of office to expire January 1, 1918.

HAROLD GUTHRIE

Many of our most prominent citizens were reared in the wholesome atmosphere of the farm, and the gentleman whose name appears above is a worthy representative of these. He was born on a farm in Ohio, a descendant of a line of Democratic ancestors, one of whom, his grandfather, fought in the battle of Ft. Wayne with General Anthony Wayne during the war of 1812.

Mr. Guthrie attended the county schools, and accompanied his parents to Indiana in 1864. In the year 1880, on the 14th day of November, occurred his marriage to Miss Elma Kelsey, and their home was established in Huntington county. In 1902 he was nominated for county auditor and defeated, and in 1906 was re-nominated, but, after being declared elected, was defeated by a recount of votes before a Republican judge, losing by three votes. In 1910 he was again nominated and elected, and has continued in the office till the present time. He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and the B. P. O. Elks.

FABIUS GWIN

Fabius Gwin was born July 1, 1867, in Martin county, Indiana, the son of Jesse and Cassandra Reeve Gwin. Reared on farm and attended country district school in winter and did farm work during spring, summer and fall. After completing study in district schools, attended Marengo Academy, at Marengo, Indiana, in 1886 and 1887. Parents not financially able to pay expenses at school, so he got through by working Saturdays on farm, and at stone quarry and unloading stone, and by cutting wood nights and mornings and sweeping college buildings.

After leaving Marengo Academy, taught school during the winter school term in district schools, and attended Central Indiana Normal College at Danville, Indiana, during spring and summer terms of 1888 and 1889.

Took law course. Was admitted to practice at the Martin county bar in the year 1890, and has continued to practice at same place ever since, occupying the same office.

Was a Democrat from infancy, having been born in a Democratic home and of Democratic parentage. While in his teens, became very much interested in politics and became a leader in his township before he was a voter. Before beginning the practice of law was appointed postmaster at Shoals and served in this capacity for about one year. Soon after the beginning of his career as an attorney he was appointed deputy prosecuting attorney for Martin county and held this position for some six years.

In the campaign of 1892 he became the leader of his party in Martin county and was urged to accept the chairmanship of the Democratic county central committee for the following campaign, in the year 1894; served in such capacity for 14 years, and also served as a member of the Democratic state committee for four years, and as vice-chairman of same for two years.

Married Miss Bertha Reichman and has one daughter, Ruth, and two sons, Fabius, Jr., and Thomas Taggart Gwin.

EUGENE HAASE

The present sheriff of Morgan county has for many years been a resident of that locality; in fact, his life has been spent within the confines of Morgan county, and there his interests are centered.

Eugene Haase was born on the 10th day of June, 1868, and received his education in the public schools of Jackson township. From his youth he engaged in the pursuit of agriculture, meeting with success in this work. In the year 1900, however, he accepted the agency of the Standard Oil Co. at Martinsville, and in that work continued until the year 1911, laboring with conscientious zeal for the interests of the company which he represented.

On the 19th day of February, 1902, Mr. Haase was united in marriage to Miss Cora M. Adams, and their home was established in Martinsville, where they have a large circle of friends.

Elected sheriff of the county, Mr. Haase demonstrated his ability as an official. He is a strong adherent of the principles of the Democratic party, and in the various campaigns has rendered such service as lay in his power for the furtherance of the cause in his home locality.

CHARLES A. HACK

Charles A. Hack, a prominent attorney, educator and public official of Shelby county, was born in Hancock county on the 25th day of April, 1868. At the age of five years his parents located in Shelby county, and here his schooling was received. Later, however, a course of study was taken at the Central Normal College of Danville, from which he graduated in the year 1894. Early in life he entered the educational field as a teacher and continued in the work nine years.

Following his graduation from the normal college, he entered the law office of Hord and Adams, and in the year 1896 was admitted to the bar of Shelby county. Later he was elected prosecuting attorney, in which capacity he served four years. He was also, for three years, a member of the Shelbyville school board. He is now serving his third term as chairman of the Democratic committee of Shelby county.

In 1899 he was married to Etta May Walker. They have two children, Maurice C. Hack and Ruth Jane Hack.

Fraternally, he is a member of the order of Masons, Knights of Pythias, Red Men and Ben-Hur.

WILLIAM HABERMEL

The man whom the citizens of Harrison chose to represent them in the general assembly of 1914-1915 is certainly well chosen, having had a broad experience and intimate acquaintance with the needs of the commonwealth which he represents.

William Habermel, whose home has for many years been in the city of Corydon, was born in Bradford, Indiana, on the 29th day of October, 1882, and here his childhood and youth were passed. The foundation of his education was obtained in the schools of Bradford, and in the year 1900 he entered the Valparaiso Normal School for a two years' course of study. The year 1902 was passed at the Ohio Valley Normal School of Corydon, the ensuing five years being spent as an instructor. At the expiration of this period he engaged in the business of road building, and for four years he was thus profitably engaged, meanwhile gaining valuable experience in county affairs and extending his acquaintance among representative men. In the year 1909 he was appointed assistant clerk of the Indiana House of Representatives; and in the year 1914 he was elected representative for Harrison county to this assembly.

Throughout his career Mr. Habermel has been a zealous worker in the cause of Democracy, in this respect following in the footsteps of several generations of Democratic forefathers; and in the year 1908 he acted as secretary of the county central committee, serving his constituents with the zeal which has characterized his work in other lines perhaps more profitable to himself.

His marriage to Miss Kathryn A. Baker was solemnized November 10, 1903, and together they have won a large circle of friends, many of whom have enjoyed the hospitality of their home.

OREN STEPHEN HACK

Born and reared in the Democratic faith, descended from a long line of Democratic ancestors and himself a strict adherent of the principles of Jefferson, it is but fitting that the name of Oren Stephen Hack should hold a high position in the roster of the party leaders of Indiana.

Mr. Hack was born on a farm in Shelby county, and in this wholesome environment he remained until he reached the age of seventeen, attending the district schools and later graduating from the high school of Boggstown. His studies were then continued at the Central Normal College of Danville, from which he graduated in the year 1896, and entered the educational field. For two years he taught in the district schools, and later accepted a position in the Boggstown High School, where he remained for four years. During the year 1897 he served as president of the Shelby County Teachers' Association.

In 1898 he received the degree of LL. B. from the Central Normal College, and in 1901 the degree of LL. B. from the University of Indianapolis, and was admitted to the bar. In 1898 he entered upon the active practice of law, and in this profession he has displayed unusual ability. In November, 1903, he was appointed deputy city attorney for the city of Indianapolis and served in this position until the year 1906. The following year he was appointed deputy prosecuting attorney for Marion county, and for three years he administered the affairs of this office.

On the 16th day of June, 1908, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Elizabeth Miller, the gifted author of "The Yoke," "Saul of Tarsus," "City of Delight," "Daybreak," etc., and she has since presided over his home and extended hospitality to an ever-widening circle of friends. Two daughters and a son have come, also, to add to the inspiration of their home life.

Mr. Hack is a member of the Indianapolis and State Bar Associations, the Contemporary Club, German House and Chamber of Commerce of Indianapolis, and is affiliated with the F. and A. M. and Royal Arch Masons, Murat Temple Mystic Shrine, Knight Templars and Knights of Pythias.

GEORGE M. HAEHL

The present chief of police of Shelbyville, George M. Haehl, is a native of Ohio, born April 21, 1849. He attended the public schools of Cincinnati, and in his youth worked at the jewelers' trade. Tiring of this, however, he ran away from home and joined the U. S. Navy, serving three years with the Mississippi Squadron, seeing active service at Hickman, Ky., Island No. 10, Fort Peller, Memphis, Haynes Bluff, Vicksburg, Tallahatchie river, Red river, etc. At the close of the Civil War, in 1865, he received his honorable discharge, and four years later located in Shelby county, where he has since become known as a representative citizen.

Mr. Haehl is affiliated with the Red Men and Grand Army of the Republic. In 1915 he was elected chief of police for a term of four years.

FRANK D. HAIMBAUGH

Frank D. Haimbaugh is a Muncie Democrat always on the job. He was born in Ohio in 1856, and when his parents moved him over to Indiana, in 1863, about the first thing he did was to commence working with the Hoosier Democrats. He never quit it. He liked it even if he never enjoyed the excitement of being a candidate for an elective office.

After graduating from the high school at Rochester he finished the scientific course at Valparaiso University. After graduation he was superintendent of schools for Fulton county for two years, 1885-1887. He was chief doorkeeper of the Indiana house of representatives in the sessions of 1889 and 1891.

From 1900 to 1904 he was a member of the board of police commissioners of Muncie. Served as field man for the state board of accounts from 1913 to 1915. Under the Woodrow Wilson administration was named post-master for Muncie, taking the office in March, 1916. During 1917 and 1918 he served as fuel administrator for his county, this position being without compensation and held during the war with Germany.

Mr. Haimbaugh spent twenty years as publisher of Democratic newspapers and was a delegate to a Democratic state convention before he was old enough to vote. His first newspaper venture was as a partner with a cousin in publishing the Miami County Sentinel at Peru. That was in 1889. Two years later he bought an interest in the Muncie Daily and Weekly Herald. As editor he worked for the Democracy constantly and won many victories. He founded the Muncie Press in 1905 and managed it for four years as an independent Democratic paper and lived to see it become a radical Republican sheet.

Mr. Haimbaugh was married to Miss Emma F. Elginfritz in 1890, and their only son served in the war against Germany. This son, Paul A. Haimbaugh, was commissioned a lieutenant from the first officers' training camp at Fort Benjamin Harrison in August, 1917. He landed in France a month later and saw active service in the heavy field artillery, until at his own request, June, 1918, he was transferred to the tank service, remaining there to the close of the war.

FRANK J. HALL

Frank J. Hall is a son of one of the oldest and most substantial families of Rush county, his parents being the Hon. Wm. S. and Nancy M. Hall. He was born February 16, 1844; was educated in the schools of Rush county and attended Indiana University, from which he graduated, later taking a law course at the same institution. He then became a resident of Rushville and was admitted to the bar in 1869.

In 1904, in the face of an overwhelming Republican majority, his popularity was demonstrated when he was elected mayor of Rushville, serving until 1906. In 1908 he was elected lieutenant-governor of Indiana, which position he held for four years.

Mr. Hall is still practicing law in Rushville.

MARSHALL H. HALL

The commonwealth of Posey county is fortunate in having secured for the office of sheriff a man of known integrity and sterling worth.

The incumbent, Mr. Marshall H. Hall, is a native Hoosier, born in Posey county on the 16th day of December, 1859. He attended the common schools of his district, and here his interests have centered.

On the 20th day of February, 1884, he was united in marriage to Miss Ruth Russell, and she has since been the presiding genius of his home and his faithful assistant in his undertakings.

In the year 1893 he was appointed custodian of the county court house, and for twenty years the duties of this position were discharged faithfully and loyally. In the fall of 1913 he was elected to the larger responsibilities of sheriff, and assumed the duties of office on the first day of the year 1914.

AUGUSTUS W. HAMILTON

To the citizens of Wells county, Augustus W. Hamilton needs no introduction, having been an honored public official of Bluffton for a number of years, and a prominent attorney of this community since 1902.

Mr. Hamilton was born in Indiana on the 30th day of August, 1873. He attended the public schools of his district, and after completing his work in high school entered North Manchester College for the purpose of continuing his education. In the year 1902 he graduated from the law department of Indiana University, and in the same year was admitted to the bar of Wells county and entered into the active practice of his profession at Bluffton in May. In his chosen work he was very successful, bringing to it untiring energy, patience in research and loyalty to the interests of his clients.

In 1906 he was elected to the position of mayor of the city of Bluffton, assuming the duties of office early in 1907, and for four years his time and energies were given to the service of the public.

Since attaining his majority, Mr. Hamilton has been a loyal adherent to the principles of Democracy, and has worked for the furtherance of the cause in Wells county. During the campaign of 1913 he served the party as county chairman, and has at various times represented Wells county Democracy in the state conventions of the party.

Mrs. Hamilton, to whom he was married June 30, 1904, was formerly Miss Blanche M. Small; and as the presiding genius of his home she has helped to win for them both a wide circle of friends.

WILL HAMMELL

Among the younger workers within the ranks of the party in Adams county the subject of this article is well known as a loyal and aggressive Democrat. A native of Adams county, Indiana, he was born on the 9th day of February, 1887. A resident of Decatur, he acquired his schooling in this city, graduating from the high school in 1908. The ensuing four years were spent in the study of law under the capable guidance of Judge D. E. Smith, since which time he has practiced in the county and is recognized as a rising lawyer of the community. He has taken an active part in campaign work, and was the successful candidate for clerk of the Adams circuit court of Adams county, Indiana, upon the Democratic ticket in 1914. Mr. Hammell is unmarried, an enthusiastic and conscientious worker and he has shown a remarkable grasp upon the possibilities of his profession.

WILLIAM ADELBERT HAMMOND

The name of William Adelbert Hammond is probably familiar to every citizen of Miami county, serving as mayor of the city of Peru. Mr. Hammond is a native of the state of Pennsylvania, born in Armstrong county on the 13th day of November, 1864. In the year 1898 he emigrated to Indiana, employed as a locomotive engineer by the Wabash Railroad Company. Since attaining his majority he has been an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party, serving on the city committee and as delegate to numerous conventions.

He has also continued an active member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and shortly after establishing residence in Peru was made chairman of this organization. In the year 1911 he was elected representative from Miami county to the state legislature, and in the fall of 1913 was elected to the position of mayor of the city for a term of four years.

Mrs. Hammond, to whom he was married June 26, 1911, was formerly Miss Norah Almeda Murphy.

STEPHEN J. HANNAGAN

Stephen J. Hannagan, an active party worker of Lafayette, is a native Hoosier, descended from early pioneers who settled in this State in 1844. He was born on the 25th day of May, 1863, and received his education in the parochial schools of Tippecanoe county.

In the year 1885 he was united in marriage to Miss Sarah Foley, and their home was established in Lafayette.

In the year 1889 he was elected city clerk, and in this capacity served until 1894. In 1896 he assumed the duties of city councilman, which position he held for many years. During the administrations of Governor Marshall and Governor Ralston he served as state oil inspector, and is the incumbent of this position.

He has taken an active part in the various campaigns through which he has passed, rendering valued service to the local organization.

ALFRED R. HARDESTY

A life-long Democrat, an unusually versatile man, and one distinguished in various lines of endeavor, Alfred R. Hardesty is justly held in high esteem in his home town, Valparaiso.

Mr. Hardesty was born in Boone county, Indiana, on the 17th day of January, 1860. He attended the public schools and, after his graduation from high school, entered the university for continued study in the higher branches, and for the courses in law and commerce.

Following his attainment of the degree of B. S., he entered the educational field, and for many years was an instructor in the public schools, during which time he held the position of superintendent of schools at Chesterton for a period of nine years, leaving there of his own accord to accept a similar but better position at Hobart, where he remained six or eight years and where, at that time, was the largest commissioned township high school in the state. For two years following this, under the superintendency of the late Frank E. Cooper, he acted as assistant county superintendent of Lake county, one of the largest and most important counties in the State from the educational point of view. During his incumbency of these positions his progressive methods and rare tact in dealing with the various problems involved in the training of the youthful mind won for him the high esteem of the community. He successfully passed the examination for and is the holder of a life state license to teach in any of the schools of the State. He was also, for a few years, an instructor in the university of Valparaiso.

Wishing to enter a new field of work, however, he passed the examination for accountants, under the public accounting act, and served two years as public accountant under the administration of Governor Marshall. At the expiration of this period he engaged in the real estate business, and now does a general insurance and brokerage business as well. Though a member of the bar of Porter county, Mr. Hardesty has never practiced law, but has kept in touch with legal affairs.

On the 25th day of August, 1887, he was united in marriage to Miss Belle E. Fish of Buffalo, N. Y., and their home in Valparaiso has been the meeting place of many friends, who rejoice to accept their hospitality.

HARVEY HARMON

Harvey Harmon, a native and lifelong citizen of Gibson county, is well known throughout the county as a zealous Democratic worker and a prominent attorney-at-law.

Mr. Harmon was born at Owensville on the 12th day of August, 1873, and attended the schools of that place, graduating from the high school. His studies were continued at the Indiana University at Bloomington, and he later entered the law school at DePauw University, from which he was graduated.

On the 14th day of June, 1901, his marriage to Miss Nora McGinnis was solemnized and their home was established in the city of Princeton, where he engaged in the active practice of law. So successful was he in his chosen profession that in the year 1911 he was elected county prosecutor, assuming the duties of office on the first of January, 1912. In the exercise of the duties pertaining to this office Mr. Harmon has shown the same conscientious zeal which has characterized his private undertakings.

He has taken an active part in fraternal affairs and has membership in Prince Lodge 361, F. and A. M.; the Princeton Commandery Knights Templar; the B. P. O. Elks; Hadi Shrine of Evansville; the Delta Tau Delta, Tau Epsilon and Phi Phi Delta Phi educational societies.

JOHN G. HARRIS

John G. Harris, for many years a leading attorney of Bloomington and mayor of this city, was born in Louisville, Kentucky, on the 12th day of October, 1869. In the year 1876 his parents located in Monroe county, where he received his schooling. Following his graduation from the high school he entered Indiana University, graduating from this institution in June, 1896. In the year 1901 he emigrated to Oklahoma for his health, and in the same year was elected police judge of the city of Hobart. This position he held until 1905, at which time he returned to his home in Bloomington. In the fall of 1908 he was elected joint representative from Monroe and Brown counties to the state legislature, and the following year was elected to the position of mayor of the city for a four-year term. At the expiration of this period, in 1913, he was re-elected. From 1890 to 1894 he served as secretary of the Democratic county committee, and was county chairman from 1906 to 1910, and also in 1914.

Mrs. Harris, to whom he was married April 22, 1889, was formerly Miss Florence Barnes.

COL. JOSEPH RICHARD HARRISON

Joseph Richard Harrison needs no introduction to the citizens of Whitley county, having been the holder of various positions in the service of the commonwealth, and for many years a leading citizen of the community.

Mr. Harrison was born in Green township, Noble county, Indiana, on the 28th day of May, 1862. In his childhood, however, he was brought to Whitley county by his parents, and here his schooling was received in the common schools of his district, and later in the Churubusco High School.

On the 10th day of February, 1881, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Jennie E. Stough, but death deprived him of her companionship in the year 1905.

In the year 1879 he assumed the duties of deputy county clerk of Whitley county and in this capacity served for eight years. During the first administration of President Cleveland he held the position of clerk of the United States court of the Fourth District, New Mexico; and four years were spent as clerk of the Whitley circuit court. He is, perhaps, best known for his service as mayor of Columbia City, a position which he held for eight years, entering upon the duties of this office in the year 1902.

Upon retiring from office January 1, 1916, he entered the profession of the law, having been admitted to the Whitley county bar in 1891.

Colonel Harrison is a Spanish war veteran and for 20 years was an officer in the Indiana National Guard, retiring in 1915 as lieutenant-colonel of the 2d Indiana Infantry. He has been a Shetland pony breeder for 20 years and is past president of the national club.

CHARLES L. HARTING

A true product of Madison county, serving as city treasurer of Elwood, Charles L. Harting is well known and highly esteemed by the entire community.

He was born on a farm near Elwood, March 6, 1876, the son of Harmon G. Harting and Josephine Mock Harting, both natives of Johnson county. When he was three years of age the family moved to Elwood, and here the son received his schooling, graduating from the high school. Later a course in electrical engineering was taken at Purdue University, after which he entered the employ of the Elwood Electric Light Co., now known as the Indiana General Service Co. Here he remained for twelve years, resigning to assume the duties of city treasurer, a position to which he was elected in the fall of 1913. He has often served the party as precinct committeeman and delegate to the various conventions. He is affiliated with the fraternal orders of Masons, Elks, Knights of Pythias and Moose.

Mrs. Harting, to whom he was married June 22, 1904, was formerly Miss Roxana Moore of Kokomo.

BAYLESS HARVEY

The responsibility which falls to the lot of the publisher of a newspaper is great, as the molding of the sentiment of the community is largely in his hands; and seldom is this responsibility borne by one of greater ability or having more interest in the community than the publisher of the Paoli News, Bayless Harvey.

Mr. Harvey is a native Hoosier, born on the 12th day of November, 1873. He attended the public schools of his district and graduated from the high school. Later he entered Indiana University at Bloomington for study in the higher branches, and received the degree of bachelor of arts in 1895. The following year he returned for the study of law and in 1896 received the degree of LL. B.

In the same year he was admitted to the bar of Orange county and entered into the practice of his profession at Paoli. The following year he was appointed deputy prosecuting attorney of Orange county, and in this capacity served for nine years, rendering efficient service to the community and establishing a reputation for marked ability in the legal profession.

In the year 1912 he assumed the duties of county attorney, and was the incumbent of this position until 1915. He is now the publisher of the Paoli News, and in this venture has demonstrated a marked intelligence in administration.

On the 28th day of November, 1898, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Erma King, and to them has been born a daughter.

During his years in college he became allied with a Greek letter fraternity and is now affiliated with the Royal Arch Masons No. 134 at French Lick and the Free and Accepted Masons Lodge 119, of Paoli, and Bedford Commandery No. 42, Knights Templar. In 1918 he was elected Democratic county chairman of Orange county.

SIDNEY B. HATFIELD

Few citizens of Warrick county are better known or more highly esteemed than Sidney B. Hatfield, for many years a prominent attorney of Boonville.

Mr. Hatfield was born in the state of Kentucky, but at an early age was brought by his mother to Indiana, his father having purchased and located upon a farm in Perry county, near the Ohio river. There he remained until he attained the age of seventeen years, when he entered Indiana University. Following his graduation from the literary department of that institution in 1864, he matriculated in the law department, from which he was graduated in 1866. Immediately thereafter he was admitted to the bar of Perry county and entered upon the active practice of his profession at Cannelton. On the 10th day of March, 1872, he assumed the duties of clerk of the Perry circuit court, and in that capacity served for four years. In the fall of 1879 he was elected prosecuting attorney for Perry county, and at the expiration of a two-year term, in 1882, was re-elected for further service of two years. Later he located in Boonville, where he has since been engaged in practice.

During his college days Mr. Hatfield became a member of the Phi Delta Theta Greek Fraternity, and during his residence in Cannelton became affiliated with the Masons and Odd Fellows. He is a member of Strangers' Rest Lodge No. 240, Free and Accepted Masons, and Hebron Lodge, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, both of Boonville.

Throughout his career Mr. Hatfield has stood for the principles promulgated by Thomas Jefferson, and has consistently voted the Democratic ticket and given his support to the various organizations of the party. Mr. Hatfield ranks as one of the leading attorneys of Southwestern Indiana, and also is regarded as one of the best citizens.

FRED A. HAUSHEER

For many years the incumbent of various positions of responsibility in the service of the commonwealth, Fred A. Hausheer needs no introduction to our readers.

Mr. Hausheer is essentially a product of the Hoosier state, having been born in Indiana on the 14th day of March, 1861. He attended the public schools of Laporte county and early entered into the business life of Laporte.

In the year 1889 Mr. Hausheer was appointed deputy treasurer of Laporte county and for five years he remained in that position, working with conscientious zeal and intelligent effort. In 1906 he was appointed deputy auditor of the county and in that capacity acted for a term of four years. He then was elected county auditor and on the first day of the following January assumed the duties of the office, amply qualified by his years of service as deputy and thoroughly prepared to administer the affairs of the office in an efficient manner. In the fall of 1914 he was again the candidate of the Democratic party for this position.

On April 22, 1882, Mr. Hausheer was united in marriage to Miss Susie Held.

CHARLES H. HAVENS

Charles H. Havens was born in Kokomo, May 4, 1858, a son of Henry Bascomb Havens, one of the early settlers of Howard county, and a grandson of the Rev. James Havens, noted pioneer Methodist preacher and contemporary of Peter Cartwright. He was carrier-boy for the Radical Democrat (afterward the Kokomo Dispatch) when it was established in Kokomo by Jap Turpin in 1872. Entering a printing office at the age of fourteen years, he was identified with newspaper work as printers' "devil," printer, reporter and editorial and political writer, with the exception of half a dozen years in which he was engaged in the theatrical business, until his appointment as postmaster for Kokomo, March 1, 1914. He succeeded J. O. Henderson as managing editor of the Kokomo Daily Dispatch in 1890, on the election of Mr.

Henderson to the office of auditor of state. He never sought official position, and was recommended for appointment as postmaster for Kokomo by Congressman Martin A. Morrison at a time when Mr. Havens was earnestly advocating the selection of another Democrat for this position.

In 1880 Mr. Havens married Lou Ewing Coate of Paducah, Ky., who died four years later, the issue of the union being one daughter, now Mrs. Paul M. Gerhard of Kokomo. In 1886 he married Orpha D. McKinsey of Kokomo. There were born to them two children, a son who died at the age of five years, and a daughter, Mrs. George Carl Yearling of Kokomo. There are three grandchildren, by whom Postmaster Havens sets great store—Master Charles Logan Gerhard, Master Daniel Havens Gerhard and Mary Louise Yearling.

Mr. Havens devotes his entire time to his duties as postmaster and has been energetic in the promotion of the newer features of the postal service—the parcel post, the postal savings system and the organization of the Kokomo postoffice under the "two-division" plan in operation in offices of the larger cities.

THOMAS HAWKINS

A representative Indiana citizen of the higher type is Thomas Hawkins. Born on a farm, he has mounted steadily upward in business and political circles until he holds the highest office in the gift of the people of Shelbyville, and his administration proved the wisdom of voters who, normally Republican, swung away from party lines and placed him in office with a huge majority as an expression of their confidence.

Mr. Hawkins was born in 1859 in Washington township, Shelby county. Educated in the district schools, he longed for further insight into the rules which governed business, and attended commercial schools of Indianapolis. After finishing his course there he returned to his father's farm and for a few years turned his attention to tilling the soil. Later on he purchased a farm of his own, buying eighty acres in Washington township, and in 1882 married Ella M. Easley, one of the county's most popular young ladies. In 1893 Mr. Hawkins left the farm and moved to the town of Flat Rock, where he bought out a large store owned by Wesley Nading. After conducting this business for nine years, during which time he showed remarkable business ability, he sold out to O. R. Miller. In 1902 Mr. Hawkins was elected county auditor, and moved with his family to Shelbyville in 1903. He served four years in this position of trust and was elected county chairman in 1906 and 1908.

On November 3, 1909, the crowning act of confidence which the community felt in him was shown when he was elected mayor of the city of Shelbyville. Although Mr. Hawkins was a Democrat in a Republican community, he received a majority of 356 votes.

A man of pleasing personality, Mr. Hawkins makes friends quickly and, it may be said to his credit, holds them long. His business ability has been demonstrated in the manner in which he has conducted the affairs of the city since taking hold of the reins of government and it is not too much to say that no chief executive ever justified the confidence imposed in him more fully than has Mayor Hawkins. He is one of the solid citizens of the community in his home life, spending much time with his family, which numbers three, his wife, his son Perry, and his daughter Hazel.

BAILEY HAWKINS

The present representative to the legislature from Hamilton and Tipton counties is eminently fitted for the duties involved in this position of responsibility, having been in the service of the public for many years prior to the election of 1914.

Mr. Bailey Hawkins is a native of this state, his birth having occurred on the 22nd day of April, 1869, in Sullivan county. He attended the public schools of Sullivan county, later taking a course of study at the Indiana State Normal School of Terre Haute. In the year 1897 he assumed the duties of deputy auditor of Putnam county, and this position was retained until the beginning of 1905. On the 25th day of September, 1906, his marriage to Miss Alice W. Wilkinson was solemnized, and the following year they established their residence in Hamilton county, where Mr. Hawkins engaged in the pursuit of agriculture. In 1912 he was elected representative from Hamilton county. Besides his occupation as farmer he is also cashier of the Citizens' State Bank of Carmel.

GAINES HOMER HAZEN

Gaines Homer Hazen was born in Newburg, Indiana, on October 26, 1847. He was the eldest son of Albert and Eliza A. Hazen. He received a common school education. Graduated in the Wells & Kliner Commercial College of Evansville, Indiana, in 1866. Began reading law with Galen Spencer in Newburg in 1868. Entered the law office of Warren & Mattison of Evansville in 1869, and remained with them one year. Was admitted to the bar in Evansville in the spring of 1869. Entered the law school of the State University at Bloomington, Indiana, in October, 1870, and graduated with the degree of bachelor of laws in the class of 1871. Located in Bloomington and practiced law for two years.

Was united in marriage with Miss Emma J. Beatly, of Bloomington, on June 24, 1873. They then removed to Newburg, where he practiced law until November, 1880, when they removed to Boonville and he formed a law partnership with Hon. S. B. Hatfield on November 15, 1880. Mr. Hatfield withdrew from the firm on March 31, 1885. Mr. Hazen continued in the practice of law until July 10, 1893, when he purchased the Boonville Enquirer, withdrew from the law and devoted his whole time to its publication. Starting in life poor, he and his wife met many obstacles, but by push and energy they have succeeded fairly well.

He has held the following positions of trust: Treasurer of Newburg for one year; deputy prosecuting attorney twelve years, under the following prosecutors: E. R. Hatfield, two years; G. L. Rheinhardt, four years; S. B. Hatfield, four years, and William Land, two years. He was probate commissioner one term under G. L. Rheinhardt. Served seven years as county attorney for Warrick county and one year as attorney for the town of Boonville. He was the nominee of his party for prosecuting attorney of the Second Judicial District in 1888, on the Democratic ticket, but went down in defeat with his party.

He joined the Odd Fellows and the Encampment in Bloomington in 1871, passed through the chairs and represented both branches in the Grand Lodge.

Joined the Knights of Pythias in Newburg in 1874, passed through the chairs and represented his lodge in the Grand Lodge. Served one year as member of committee of subordinate lodge returns and one year on committee on the state of the order. Served one term each in the offices of grand inner guard, grand master at arms and grand prelate.

Joined Boonville Court No. 59, Tribe of Ben-Hur, on February 14, 1896, and was made past chief on the institution of the lodge. He was elected representative from the State of Indiana to the Supreme Lodge in January, 1900.

He was appointed a member of the executive committee of the Supreme Tribe on August 16, 1901, and has been re-elected by the Supreme Lodge three times since.

He joined Boonville District Court No. 519, Court of Honor, on November 3, 1897, and passed through the chairs of that lodge.

He joined Evansville Lodge No. 116, B. P. O. Elks, on March 9, 1904, and at this time is a member in good standing in all of the above orders.

His marriage to Miss Emma J. Beatly was blessed with one child, a daughter, Nellie A., born October 25, 1874. She received a common school education, graduated in the Boonville High School and later attended college at St. Mary's, Terre Haute, Ind.

She was united in marriage with Mr. Eugene H. Gough on May 10, 1900. This union was blessed with three sons—Harold Hazen, born April 10, 1901; Eugene LeRoy, born January 9, 1904, and Gaines Homer, born May 31, 1912.

HORACE H. HELLER

Among the leaders in the Democratic organization of Parke county is Horace H. Heller, of Rockville.

Mr. Heller is a native of the state of Illinois, born in the city of Quincy on the 2nd day of June, 1871. He attended the schools of this city and later, accompanying his parents to Springfield, completed his schooling, graduating from the high school with the class of 1885.

After leaving school, he went west and was interested in the cattle business in the state of Kansas; but when his father passed from this life, in 1888, Mr. Heller returned to his home in Illinois and learned the trade of a miller, and in this work has continued with marked success until the present time. In this capacity he became connected with the firm of Rohm Bros. of Parke county in the year 1902, and in this locality his interests have since centered. He is now a member of this firm which holds interests in various parts of Parke county, doing an extensive milling and grain business.

On the 2nd day of June, 1905, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Grace M. Hatfield, and she has since been the presiding genius of their home in Rockville and dispensed its hospitality.

Since attaining his majority he has been an active worker for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy and holds a high position in the councils of the party. During the campaign of 1914 he was vice-chairman of the county committee, and has been a member of the executive committee for the past twenty years.

Fraternally, he is allied with the Free and Accepted Masons, Royal Arch Masons and the I. O. O. F. Encampment.

FRANKLIN J. HELLER

Franklin J. Heller, a Buckeye by birth, came to Indiana with his parents, Hamilton and Lovina Heller, when a small boy, and grew to manhood in Jay county. After graduating from the Pennville schools he taught for five years. He graduated from the University of Valparaiso in the scientific course in 1889 and from the law department in 1891. He immediately began his chosen profession at Columbia City and has been successful as a lawyer.

In 1898 he was elected joint senator for the counties of Huntington and Whitley, then a Republican stronghold, by a majority of 143. He served as county attorney for many years and also as a member of the school board for his city.

He is widely known as a fraternalist, especially as a Knight of Pythias, and was their Grand Chancellor for Indiana in 1917-18.

He was always a staunch Democrat and at all times faithful to William J. Bryan. He was a faithful and regular attendant at his party's conventions, county, state and national, giving counsel and assistance in promulgating the principles of Democracy.

He was born February 14, 1865, and was married June 3, 1891, to Miss Florence Pence of Columbia City, and she has been the presiding genius of the home then established. Three daughters have blessed their home, Kate, Grace and Lois. Kate graduated from the University of Chicago in 1918 and has been a successful teacher of English in the high schools of Fort Wayne and Pueblo, Colorado. Grace is married and is living in Aberdeen, South Dakota, and Lois is at home and in the high school.

JOHN HERBERT HELLER

The present managing editor of the Decatur Daily Democrat, John Herbert Heller, is widely known throughout the State as a staunch Democrat and active party worker, but also as a newspaper man of unusual intelligence and ability, who has made his paper a real power in the community. He was born on the 4th day of May, 1873, and attended the schools of Decatur, graduating from the high school of that city in June, 1890, continuing his studies in the Indianapolis Law School, Indiana University, graduating therefrom in May, 1897. On the 29th day of November, 1899, his marriage to Miss Martha A. Peterson was solemnized, and in the same year he became connected with the paper which he now controls.

Since attaining his majority he has taken an active interest in the various movements of the Democratic party, in this respect following in the footsteps of his father, Judge D. D. Heller. In the year 1910 he was appointed assistant secretary of the Democratic state convention, and in 1912 and 1914 he served as secretary of these gatherings. In 1912, also, he served as alternate delegate to the national convention at Baltimore. Despite his interest in the doings of the party, however, the only political position which he has ever held has been that of file clerk in the legislature of 1909. He is at present the Eighth District member of the managing committee of the Democratic Editorial Association, and holds an influential position among the newspaper men of the State.

PHILIP BERNARD HEMMIG

Philip Bernard Hemmig was born on a farm one mile west of Radnor, Carroll county, Indiana, January 4, 1873. He lived there with his father, brother and grandmother until 1894, when he moved to Ockley, Ind. He completed the common school course and attended the C. N. C. College. He completed the scientific and law courses.

At eighteen Mr. Hemmig began teaching school. In 1903 he was elected county superintendent of schools and has twice since been re-elected.

As soon as he became of age he took an active interest in politics and under his management Madison township gave the largest majorities for the Democratic ticket.

He is a member of the Red Men, I. O. O. F., Knights of Pythias lodges, also of all the Masonic bodies. In 1900 he was married to Nora Joy, a native of Indiana. They have a family of six children: Eva, Floyd, Melvin, Dortha, Dora and Arline.

He has been remarkably successful as scholar, school officer, musician and politician. In politics he has always been considered a true-blue Democrat.

JOSEPH P. HEMPHILL

Having served the commonwealth for sixteen years in the capacity of county auditor, and having held other positions of responsibility within the gift of the people, Joseph P. Hemphill is too well known in southeastern Indiana to need an introduction.

Mr. Hemphill was born near the scene of his present home on the 2nd day of September, 1853, and his schooling was received in the schools of Rising Sun. Later, however, a commercial course was taken in Cincinnati. Returning to his home in Rising Sun, he became identified with the business life of the place, reading law under the late Judge A. C. Downey, and soon thereafter became a prominent factor in political affairs. He was elected for four terms of four years each as auditor of Ohio county and three terms as city treasurer of Rising Sun. He has also served the Democratic party as county chairman, and was for years a member of the county central committee. In the fall of 1914 he was elected joint senator to represent the counties of Dearborn, Franklin and Ohio, and in the assembly of 1915 was a prominent member. His political activities are well recognized throughout southeastern Indiana. Aside from his political connections, he has been prominent in business, for 25 years the leading druggist of his city and at all times identified with the uplift of Rising Sun and the promotion of her business interests and the well-doing of her people.

EB. HENDERSON

One of the most interesting members of the Indiana Democracy is Eb. Henderson, a pioneer of Morgan county, born June 2, 1833, on a farm northeast of Martinsville, and, after four score years of residence in the county, still living in the old homestead. His wife, formerly Ann E. Hunt, to whom he was married in October, 1856, is still his faithful companion, now seventy-seven years of age.

Following his graduation from the country schools of the county he attended Indiana University three years, taking a scientific course. In 1854, a year before leaving college, he drove from Bloomington to Martinsville to cast his first Democratic vote, making the trip in one day. In 1860 he was elected county treasurer for a two-year term, the only Democrat elected in the county. In 1868 he was elected joint senator from Johnson and Morgan counties, and in the following assembly was one of two Democrats detailed to stay and register a protest against the enfranchisement of the negro, all other Democratic members resigning. He was returned also to the legislature of 1871, and in 1874 was elected auditor of state over seven other candidates for nomination, including Hon. John B. Stoll, and in this capacity served two terms. During Cleveland's first administration he held the post of assistant commissioner of internal revenue; and in 1910 was elected county assessor, being nominated fifty years to a day after his first nomination to the position of county treasurer. He is perhaps better remembered by the present living Democracy of Indiana as chairman of the state central committee in the Cleveland and Blaine campaign of 1884.

JOSEPH E. HENSLEY

Joseph E. Hensley, treasurer of Monroe county, has won and maintained his position by virtue of his sterling qualities and energetic methods of work.

Mr. Hensley was born in Monroe county, Indiana, February 24, 1869. After his graduation from the common schools of Bloomington he took a course at the Central Normal College at Danville.

On the 22nd day of April, 1894, Mr. Hensley was united in marriage to Miss Rhoda J. Jacobs, and to her he attributes a great share of his business success. Before he attained his majority he entered the educational field, engaging in teaching and farming, and is now the owner of two fine farms and a handsome home; also the father of two charming daughters, of whom he is naturally proud.

In the year 1910 Mr. Hensley was nominated for county commissioner, but he was defeated by 37 votes in a Republican stronghold. Two years later he was unanimously nominated for county treasurer and was elected by a majority of 666. In 1914 he was again nominated without opposition and was elected for a second term.

Mr. Hensley has been an active worker in the party ranks, serving eight years as township committeeman and otherwise rendering valued service. Fraternally, he is allied with the order of Red Men.

WILLIAM B. HENRY

A representative citizen and successful farmer of Pulaski county is William B. Henry; and as a public official and leader in the ranks of Democracy, his record is most creditable.

Mr. Henry was born in Boone county, Ind., on a farm, on the ninth day of January, 1865. He attended the common schools of his district, and later pursued his studies at Central Normal College of Danville. A course was also taken at the State Normal School of Terre Haute. Following his graduation he entered the educational field, and later engaged in the mercantile business in Lebanon. Here he remained for eleven years, at the expiration of which he came to Pulaski county for residence, where he soon became identified with the business and political life of the community. In 1908 he was elected to the position of county recorder, and in 1912 was re-elected.

Mrs. Henry, to whom he was married at Paris, Illinois, in the year 1884, was formerly Miss Emma A. Harper; and she has proved a worthy helpmate throughout his career.

CHARLES R. HERTENSTEIN

The incumbent of the position of superintendent of schools of Ripley county, Charles R. Hertenstein, is eminently fitted by education, by experience and by his natural qualifications for the position which he occupies.

He is a native of Indiana, born on the 15th day of March, 1879. He attended the common schools of Ripley county, and at an early age entered the educational field, teaching in the schools of the county. In the year 1899 he entered the State Normal School at Terre Haute for a course of study in the higher branches and in pedagogy, and following his graduation, in 1909, he was the superintendent of the commissioned high school at Amo, Indiana, two years and then returned to Ripley county for further work in his chosen field.

In the year 1911 he was chosen for the responsibilities of county superintendent, and in this capacity he has since served, placing the schools in his care upon a high plane.

Mrs. Hertenstein, to whom he was married in the year 1909, was formerly Miss Grace Evans, of Terre Haute.

Mr. Hertenstein and family now reside in Versailles, Ind.

JOEL WILLIS HIATT

The subject of this sketch was born in Hamilton county, Indiana, June 10, 1850. He is the son of Harmon and Mary (Harris) Hiatt. He is of unbroken anti-Revolution, Quaker lineage. At eight years of age he moved to Crawfordsville, Indiana, where he was educated in the public schools and at Wabash college. He was graduated from that institution in 1873, with the degree of A. B. Subsequently he was a student at Harvard Divinity School. In 1873 he moved to Mount Vernon, Indiana, where he was principal of the high school and later was superintendent of the schools at New Harmony.

In 1885 he was appointed document clerk of the U. S. House of Representatives, through the influence of Hon. John J. Kleiner. He held this position until 1895, with the exception of the two years of the 50th congress, which was Republican, and went out of office in December, 1895, with his party. In 1889, fifteen years after graduation, he was given the degree of A. M. by Wabash College on account of the reputation which he had gained for knowledge of public documents.

He has been secretary and chairman of the Democratic central committee of Posey county and, since 13 years of age, has been an unwavering Democrat. He is interested in farming, and has concerned himself with the public parks of New Harmony and its public library. For the latter, which embraces about 20,000 volumes, he succeeded in securing an up-to-date organization and management.

DAVID A. HIGGINS

The gentleman whose name appears above is a native and lifelong resident of Hendricks county, and has, since attaining his majority, been prominently identified with the business and political affairs of the community.

David A. Higgins was born in Marion township, Hendricks county, on the 30th of June, 1850. He attended the public schools of the county and later continued his studies at Hopkins Academy, Ladoga.

On December 1, 1881, Mr. Higgins was united in marriage to Miss Angeline Hunt and established his home in Danville.

Mr. Higgins served his party as county chairman for ten consecutive years, beginning this work in the year 1904. Appointed deputy oil inspector for the state of Indiana, this position he now holds. Mr. Higgins is a lifelong Democrat and has attended many conventions as delegate since casting his first vote in 1872. He is a member of the Indiana Democratic Club, the Masonic order and the Christian church of Danville.

WRIGHT J. HINKLE

Wright J. Hinkle, one of the most zealous workers in the ranks of Indiana Democracy, was born on a farm in Jasper county, on the 15th day of October, 1863. When he was but two years of age his parents moved to White county and in the schools of that locality his education was received.

On December 23, 1884, Mr. Hinkle was united in marriage to Miss Emma E. Horner, and to this union have been born three daughters.

Mr. Hinkle is a successful farmer and stock raiser and the proprietor of a furniture and undertaking establishment in Monon, his home town. He is descended from a long line of Democratic ancestors, and he himself is a most zealous worker for the cause, though refusing to accept office. For twenty years, however, he has served the party as committeeman. He is affiliated with the orders of Knights of Pythias and Red Men and has a wide acquaintance throughout the state.

JOHN HIPSKIND

John Hipskind, a prominent citizen of Wabash, and native of Bavaria, Germany, was born on the 17th day of November, 1850. In 1854 he accompanied his parents to America, the family locating in Wabash. There he attended school, and early became a building contractor, erecting most of the prominent buildings in that city between 1874 and 1907. Since the latter date he has been engaged in the heating and plumbing business.

In 1888 Mr. Hipskind was elected a member of the city council for a two-year term, and again, in 1909, he was elected to membership in that body for a term of four years. He was also a member of the Democratic county central committee for twenty years, beginning in 1884.

Fraternally, Mr. Hipskind is allied with the Catholic Knights of America, the Knights of Columbus and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He has been treasurer of the Home Telephone Company since its organization, treasurer of a building and loan association for sixteen years and of the county central committee for eight years.

On May 28, 1873, Mr. Hipskind was united in marriage to Miss Barbara S. Fleck.

JOSEPH M. HIRSCH

One of the most successful business men in Perry county, Joseph M. Hirsch is a native of Germany and a self-made man. He was born on the 6th day of August, 1875, and attended the schools of Amberg, Nuremberg, Munich and Heidelberg, Germany. At the age of twenty years, however, he came to America, arriving here without funds, but managed to continue his studies at St. Meinrad, Indiana.

On the 22nd day of November, 1900, Mr. Hirsch was united in marriage to Miss Katie B. Snyder and established his home in Cannelton, where he has since remained and where his business interests have centered.

Mr. Hirsch is an extensive holder of real estate in Cannelton and a stockholder in the Cannelton National Bank, of which he is assistant cashier. He is also one of the incorporators of the Cannelton Sewer Pipe Company, one of the largest concerns of the kind in the state.

Politically, Mr. Hirsch is a staunch Democrat, having allied himself with this party soon after his arrival in this country, and he has contributed valuable service to the local organizations. In the fall of 1914 he was nominated for joint senator from Perry, Crawford and DuBois counties and served in the assembly of 1915 with much credit to himself and his constituency.

Mr. Hirsch is an active member of the Knights of Columbus, its state treasurer, and the only fourth degree member of that organization in Perry county. He is also affiliated with the Loyal Order of Moose.

PETER L. HIRSCH

The gentleman whose name appears at the head of this article is a native of Ohio, his birth having occurred on the 10th day of December, 1876; but in his childhood he was brought to the city of Cedar Grove, Indiana, where he has since remained. He attended the schools of Cincinnati for a time and later continued his studies in Cedar Grove. During the years from 1900 to 1904 he was engaged in the grocery business in Cincinnati, but at the expiration of this period resumed his residence in Cedar Grove and became the proprietor of a saloon. He was united in marriage to Miss Katherine Werstefeld. Both are communicants of the Catholic church.

Mr. Hirsch is a member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles and of the Catholic Order of Foresters and enjoys a wide acquaintance throughout the county of Franklin. Since attaining his majority he has uniformly voted the Democratic ticket and is known as a loyal party worker.

SAMUEL V. HITE

Samuel V. Hite, surveyor of Huntington county, was born in Fairfield county, Ohio, on the 16th day of August, 1866. He attended the public schools of his district and later continued his studies at the Fairfield Union Academy and the National Normal University. Then followed a term in the Northwestern Business University, which he left to assume the duties connected with his mother's farm in Huntington county. Two years later, on the 3rd day of January, he was married to Miss Ella L. Broyles, of Fairfield county.

For twelve years Mr. Hite was engaged in managing various oil properties for large foreign corporations, retiring from this field to accept the position of county surveyor, to which he was nominated without his knowledge or consent and elected in 1912. In 1914 he was renominated by acclamation and again elected.

Mr. Hite is an active member of the Huntington Commercial Club and has passed through all of the chairs in the local lodge of the order of Knights of Pythias.

JOSEPH O. HOFFMAN

The juvenile court in its methods and results differs from all other courts, seeking primarily to accomplish constructive work in bringing together the warring elements of home life which work to the detriment of children. In this work peculiar characteristics are demanded of the attaches of the court; and in the present prosecutor we find a man eminently fitted for the position.

Joseph O. Hoffman was born in Indiana on the 7th day of November, 1889. He attended the local schools of his home district, continued his studies at St. Mary's College, Kansas, and then took a course at Georgetown University, from the legal department of which he was graduated. Soon afterward he was admitted to the bar of Marion county and entered into the active practice of law in Indianapolis. In this work he has evinced conscientious zeal and loyalty to his clients. On the 14th day of June, 1914, he assumed the position of prosecutor for the juvenile court of Indianapolis.

Politically, Mr. Hoffman has been a staunch and loyal Democrat, rendering efficient service to the local organizations and in every possible way contributing to the success of the party.

EDWARD GEORGE HOFFMAN

Edward George Hoffman, Democratic national committee-man for Indiana for several years from 1916, was born in this state, October 1, 1878. His early education was secured through the public schools and included a course in the Harlan high school. After his graduation there he took a course at Valparaiso College and then entered the law department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, from which institution he was graduated with the class of 1903. Taking up his residence in Fort Wayne, he began the practice of his profession and soon took a high rank at the bar, becoming a member of the well-known firm of Barrett, Morris and Hoffman. This firm was engaged in much of the most important litigation of northeastern Indiana.

Interested from his earliest manhood in politics, Mr. Hoffman became active in the organization work of the Democratic party at an early age and in 1906 served as county chairman in Allen county. Two years later he was made a member of the state committee for the twelfth congressional district, and such was the energy and ability he displayed in this connection that he was re-elected in 1910, 1912 and 1914. From 1909 to 1914 he served the commonwealth as county attorney.

In the senatorial contest of 1909, when Senator Shively was the caucus nominee, Mr. Hoffman, then but thirty-one years of age, was presented as the candidate of the 12th district, and the dignified manner in which his candidacy was urged made a favorable impression on the state and served to fix his status in Indiana politics.

In 1916, on the retirement of Senator Thomas Taggart from the national committee, Mr. Hoffman was unanimously elected as his successor, and he carried to his new position the zeal which characterized him in all the positions he ever held. In 1918 he was appointed by the national alien property custodian the attorney for Indiana, a position in which he served the government without compensation.

A 33rd degree Mason, an Elk, and a Knight of Pythias, Mr. Hoffman also is a member of the Fort Wayne University club, Country club and Chamber of Commerce and of the Indiana Democratic club of Indianapolis. He is actively engaged in business enterprises and is vice-president of the Tri-State Trust Company and secretary-treasurer of the Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette Company, also secretary and treasurer of the Deister Machine Company.

Mr. Hoffman's wife was Miss Emily R. Hoffman, of Fort Wayne, their marriage having been solemnized on the 7th of May, 1912, and in her he has found a worthy second in the various responsibilities and undertakings which came to him.

PETER HOLZER

In the hands of the newspaper editor lie great responsibilities to the community in which he lives and works, and the influence wielded by a man of sterling qualities in this position is great. Appreciating this fact, the subject of this article, Peter Holzer, has been a great force for good in Ripley county and vicinity.

Mr. Holzer is a true product of Ripley county, born in Shelby township on the 4th day of September, 1870. He attended the public schools of his district and later pursued his studies at the Indiana State Normal School at Terre Haute.

On the 12th day of November, 1899, he was united in marriage to Miss Adda Adams, and their home was established in Batesville.

In the state general assembly of 1911 he held the position of journal clerk, and in this work formed many friendships with noted persons. Since the year 1905 Mr. Holzer has held the position of editor of the Democratic Herald of Batesville, a paper whose principles are declared by its name. In February, 1908, a corporation was formed including Mr. Charles V. Hert and Mrs. Adda Holzer, and it is now being published under this management.

The father of Mr. Holzer, now nearing the age of three score years and ten, is also a lifelong Democrat. The son, Peter Holzer, has been a frequent attendant of county, district and state conventions and in 1914 was precinct committeeman. He is affiliated with the order of Masons at Batesville; also a member of the Eastern Star, Red Men and Fraternal Order of Eagles.

ISAAC HOLTON

Isaac Holton, a well known hotel proprietor of the city of Plainfield, Indiana, and prominently identified with the business interests of the town, was born in the state of Ohio on the 12th day of October, 1853—on a farm—and received his education in the public schools of that state, coming to his present home in his youth. On the 7th day of October, 1875, he was united in marriage to Miss Christiana Trichler of Bloomington, and she has since been his faithful companion. Following his removal to Plainfield he engaged in the hotel business, and in this field he has continued until the present time, being the proprietor of the Commercial Hotel. He also served as postmaster of the city during President Cleveland's last administration. He has been an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party, serving many times as delegate to congressional and state conventions; and was also alternate delegate to the national convention at Denver in 1908.

THOMAS M. HONAN

Born in Seymour, Indiana. After graduating at Indiana University he entered into the practice of law in his native city. Was appointed city attorney, elected three times to the office of prosecuting attorney in the judicial district comprising Jackson, Washington and Orange counties. Afterwards he was three times the representative of Jackson county, serving as speaker of the 66th General Assembly of the State of Indiana. Attorney-general of the State of Indiana from 1911 to 1914 inclusive. Is now practicing law at Seymour, Indiana.

FRANK ASBURY HORNER

Frank Asbury Horner was born in Washington county, Indiana, in the town of Fredericksburg, April 18, 1849. He was the son of Dr. Jacob S. Horner. He graduated from the University at Greencastle in the class of 1870, and began the practice of law at New Albany. He moved to Brazil in 1871 and made that his permanent home.

He was a member of the Democratic state central committee as chairman of the fifth congressional district from 1896 to 1900. From 1898 to 1902 he was a member of the State senate. In 1890 he was elected prosecuting attorney of Clay county, serving for four years, at the same time being county chairman in the party organization.

He was a candidate of his party for Congress and was defeated in the election. His opponent was Attorney Holliday, his law partner for eighteen years.

WILLIAM O. HORTON

William O. Horton not only has always been one of the liveliest Democratic workers in Hamilton county, but when in public office he was both popular and efficient. He served many years as a member of different political committees and as a delegate to conventions, but was not a candidate for any office until 1912, when he was chosen auditor of the county. He was re-elected in recognition of his efficient service.

Mr. Horton was born and reared on the farm, receiving most of his education in the neighboring schools, and spent most of his successful life as a farmer and in buying and selling live stock, doing the largest business in the county in this line. His farm is one of the models, not only of the county, but of the state. His success in both business and politics has been far above the average.

Mr. Horton was married to Miss Elizabeth Sumner on September 14, 1881.

JUDGE MILTON B. HOTTEL

Recognized throughout the state as an authority in the legal profession, now a resident of Indianapolis and one of her prominent citizens, Judge Milton B. Hottel is best known in Washington county, where most of his life has been spent, and which locality, to him, is "home."

Judge Hottel was born in Harrison county, Indiana, May 1, 1860. During his boyhood he accompanied his parents to Washington county, where the family located. Following his graduation from the high school of Salem, he became engaged in educational work, teaching school for a year. Later he matriculated at Indiana University and in 1882 was graduated from that institution. He spent the following two years in a store with his father, in Salem, and then entered the law office of John A. Zearing for the purpose of reading law. A year later he was admitted to the bar of Washington county and formed a partnership with his preceptor, under the firm name of Zearing & Hottel, an association which continued until the death of the senior member of the firm in 1898. These years Judge Hottel has always regarded as valued years of growth and development in his profession. From this time forward his rise in the legal profession was rapid, and his abilities as an attorney were soon recognized beyond his home community.

In the year 1910 Judge Hottel was elected to the position of judge of the Appellate court of Indiana for a term of six years, and upon assuming the duties of this office he located in Indianapolis, establishing his residence in Woodruff Place, a beautiful and exclusive residence district of the capital. Judge Hottel's administration of the affairs in his charge evidenced efficiency and conscientious zeal, and his decisions from the bench were characterized by just discrimination and fairness to the various parties in litigation. Renominated by his party, he was elected for a further term of six years, and in this capacity is still serving.

On January 17, 1888, Judge Hottel was united in marriage to Miss Cora H. Harris, who has been a worthy second in her husband's labors. Five children born to this union are living to add inspiration to their home life, and two have been called from the family circle by death.

Notwithstanding his success in the legal profession and in the social world, Judge Hottel has found time to engage in farming upon a large scale, and his large apple orchard and persimmon orchard of three thousand trees bear evidence, in their close and successful culture, that a master hand controls the estate near Salem, in Washington county.

During his years in college Judge Hottel became affiliated with the Greek letter fraternity, Phi Gamma Delta. He also is an active member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. Politically, he has consistently adhered to the principles promulgated by Jefferson, and his influence and service have been highly valued, in the counsels of the local and state organizations of the Democratic party.

E. M. HOWARD

The gentleman named above was the first white child born in the town of Oxford, Benton county, Indiana, this event occurring on the 24th of April, 1848. He attended the common schools of Benton county, but entered the army at the early age of sixteen years, enlisting in the 155th Indiana Volunteers. For the past forty-seven years he has been in the employ of the Pennsylvania Railroad, holding the position of claim agent on the Logansport Division for fourteen years. His father was a prominent Democrat of Benton county, serving as county clerk for three terms, also as auditor, treasurer and recorder. Mr. Howard is a member of the G. A. R. He has always been active in the counsels of the Democratic party, serving as chairman of the county committee for two years, and for many years a delegate to county and state conventions and a visitor to all Democratic national conventions.

WILLIAM F. HOWAT, M. D.

A native of Prince Edward Island, Canada, born in that province on the 2nd day of June, 1869, and educated in its schools, Dr. Howat is none the less a loyal Hoosier and a valued citizen of the city of Hammond.

Following his graduation from the Prince of Wales College, Canada, he entered upon the study of the medical profession at the University of Pennsylvania, graduating from this institution in the year 1892. The same year he located in Packerton, Kosciusko county, and for three years engaged in the active practice of medicine. In this year, also, he was united in marriage to Miss Alice A. Webb, who has since been the presiding genius of his home.

In 1895 they came to Hammond, and here their social and business interests have since centered.

In 1896 he was candidate for coroner. Later he became a member of the school board of Lake county and for more than six years devoted his efforts to the upbuilding of the school system. He has also been a member of the library board since its organization in 1904. During the years 1911-12 he served as president of the state medical society, marked evidence of his high standing in the medical profession of the State. He was a candidate for mayor in the primaries of 1913.

Dr. Howat is affiliated with the Masonic order (32nd degree and Knights Templar) and is a member of the Mystic Shrine.

JAMES H. HUMPHREYS

James H. Humphreys was born in Greene county, Indiana, July 22, 1853, being a member of one of the oldest and best known families in the county. His father, Andrew Humphreys, settled in Greene county in 1842 and was one of the best known public men in Southern Indiana, having served more times, either as a representative or a senator in the general assembly, and voted for more United States senators, than perhaps any other man of his day. He served his first session in 1849 and his last session in 1897. In addition to his long service as a legislator, he was Indian agent for the territory of Utah under President Buchanan's administration and was elected and served as a member of Congress to fill the unexpired term of James D. Williams, who was elected as governor of Indiana before his term as congressman expired.

The subject of this sketch, James H. Humphreys, was twice married. His first wife was Miss Mattie Jackson, to whom he was married in 1877. Mrs. Humphreys died in the spring of 1879. His second wife was Miss Eva Schloot, to whom he was married in 1883. He has six children, four sons and two daughters.

Mr. Humphreys, like his father, has always been an old-time Jeffersonian Democrat, believing always in the principles of the Democratic party and in the perpetuity of the same. He was born and reared on a farm, taught school in his early days, was in the mercantile business for several years, and was cashier of the Linton bank for seventeen years.

He has never held but one political office, and that is the one he now holds, a member of the senate of Indiana, being elected for the counties of Greene, Owen and Monroe, on the third day of November, 1914.

LORENZO B. HUMPHRIES

Having been an active worker in the party ranks since his youth and for many years the incumbent of various positions of responsibility and trust in the public service, Lorenzo B. Humphries is well known to the citizens of Parke county.

Mr. Humphries was born in Virginia on October 6, 1853. He attended the county schools of his home district and at the age of nineteen years came to Indiana, an orphan seeking employment. The following year, on the 12th day of October, he was united in marriage to Miss Rachel E. Lambert, and she has been a faithful second in all his efforts for advancement.

Since he attained his majority Mr. Humphries has taken an active part in the activities of the Democratic party in Owen county and in 1892 was county chairman. During President Cleveland's administration he held the position of postmaster of the city of Rockville throughout the term of four years, and in 1908 was elected township trustee. During this campaign he was forced on the ticket to fill it up, the township being a Republican stronghold, but he was elected by a majority of 78 and in this position remained until March 15, 1914. On this date he received his appointment from President Wilson to the postmastership of Rockville, and to this work his energies are now devoted.

Mr. Humphries has served the party as delegate to many state and congressional conventions, and was for four terms chairman of the county organization. Fraternally, he is allied with the order of Knights of Pythias, among the membership of which order he has a wide acquaintance and is held in high esteem.

CHARLES EDGAR HUDSON

The city of Connersville is the home of many citizens in whom it takes just pride, men of progressive ideas and methods who labor zealously for the public good. To this element belonged Charles Edgar Hudson.

This gentleman was a native of Franklin county, his birth having occurred at Fairfield on the 17th day of July, 1870. His education was received in the public schools of that county. His wife was Miss Lola Murray of Matamora.

Mr. Hudson, since his youth, had been an energetic worker for the success of the Democratic party, and in the fall of 1913 was nominated by that party for the position of city treasurer of Connersville, and, being elected, assumed the duties of office January 5, 1914.

Mr. Hudson died on July 13, 1918.

BURDGE H. HURD

Burdge H. Hurd has won distinction as a leading attorney of Huntington county and also in the educational field in Iowa and Indiana.

He was born in Coesse, Whitley county, Indiana, on the 26th day of August, 1864, and attended the schools of this locality until he completed the high school course, when he accompanied his parents to Iowa and entered Tilford Academy at Vinton. Following his graduation here in 1886 he studied at Cornell College, Mt. Vernon, Iowa, and finally graduated from the law department of Ann Arbor University in 1890. A period of ten years in South Dakota followed his graduation, and here he was married to Miss Alice Penney of Parker, on the 6th day of March, 1892. Here he engaged in the practice of law, and was for four years postmaster of the city of Parker.

In 1902 Mr. Hurd came to Huntington and continued his legal work; and in 1910 was appointed president of the board of education of Huntington for a term of three years. In 1914 he assumed the duties of county attorney, which position he still holds with great credit. He is affiliated with the I. O. O. F., the State A. O. U. W. and the National Union.

Mr. Hurd was county chairman of the Democratic county central committee in 1903, is a staunch and loyal Democratic worker, and is one of the leaders of that party in the county; has attended every state convention, as a delegate, since his location in Huntington county. No Democrat in the state is more loyal to the true principles of Democracy than he, and he is a tireless worker for their advancement.

OSCAR JAY

A true son of Elkhart county, born and reared within its confines and recognized throughout the community as a representative citizen and the incumbent of various positions of responsibility and trust in the service of the public, is the present prosecuting attorney, Oscar Jay, of Elkhart.

Mr. Jay was born on October 5, 1871, and his childhood was spent near the little town of Wakarusa. He received his early schooling in the public schools of his home district, later taking up the study of law, and was admitted to the bar of Elkhart county.

On July 16, 1902, Mr. Jay was united in marriage to Miss Viola R. Hess, who died on November 24, 1908.

In January, 1911, Mr. Jay assumed the duties of deputy prosecuting attorney for the 34th judicial circuit, and devoted a year zealously to this work. Retiring to private practice for a season, he again entered the public service as prosecuting attorney for the same district, assuming the duties of this office on January 1, 1914.

Politically, Mr. Jay has been a consistent adherent to the principles of Democracy, giving freely of his time during the various campaigns through which he has passed for the furtherance of the cause.

URIAH STOKES JACKSON

Uriah Stokes Jackson was born in Vernon township, Hancock county, Indiana, July 6, 1846. He was educated in the public schools of his native county and resided in the county continuously until his death, June 22, 1912.

On March 8, 1864, he was married to Mary J. Thomas, who died in 1910. To them were born seven children, four of whom survive him: Earl and Omer S. Jackson, and Mrs. Horace Boyd and Mrs. Ora Myers, all of Greenfield, Indiana.

In 1911 Mr. Jackson was united in marriage with Grace Gardner.

In early life Mr. Jackson engaged in farming and the buying and selling of live stock. In 1889 he began the practice of law in Greenfield, in partnership with Edward W. Felt, at present one of the judges of the appellate court.

He continued in the practice of his profession and was for many years in partnership with Robert L. Mason, until the latter became circuit judge in 1906. He then formed a partnership with Earl Sample (now the judge of said court) which continued until 1911.

In 1876, Mr. Jackson was elected township trustee of his native township and was re-elected in 1878 and served two terms.

He was elected sheriff of Hancock county in 1884, and re-elected in 1886, when the rest of the Democratic ticket was defeated. In 1888 he was elected county chairman of the Democratic organization and was continued through three successful campaigns.

He was elected chairman of the Sixth congressional district and served as a member of the Democratic state committee through three campaigns.

In 1908 he was chosen chairman of the Democratic state central committee and was re-elected in 1910. He was also the nominee of his party for congress in 1904 and made a good race in the days when no Democrat could win in the Sixth District.

On January 8, 1911, he was elected to the office of sergeant-at-arms of the National House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., which position he continued to hold to the time of his death.

Mr. Jackson was from his early manhood a leader of men. He had a passion for politics and whether in defeat or success never suffered his zeal for the cause of Democracy to abate. He worked incessantly, and in the campaigns of 1908 and 1910 led his party to victory in the State after many years of defeat.

Mr. Jackson was a strong personality and a lovable character. He had an intuitive knowledge of men which served him well in both politics and business. He was a hard fighter and a worthy antagonist. He kept his face turned toward the future and cherished no ill will toward his fellow men on account of things said or done in the many contests in which he was a leading figure.

When he could not trust a man he quietly let him alone, but he clung tenaciously to his many tried and true friends and associates.

He never gave up. To him a defeat only marked the beginning of another contest.

He had a host of friends in his native county and was one of the best and most favorably known Democrats in Indiana. He was a delegate to several national Democratic conventions and had the confidence and esteem of many of the most prominent men in national affairs. For many years he never missed a district, state or national convention. He believed in the principles of Democracy and strove earnestly all his life to place Democrats in public office to carry those principles into effect.

He richly earned all the honors that came to him, and his many friends in his own and other parties rejoiced in the recognition of his loyalty and ability when the National House of Representatives honored him with the position he held at the time of his death.

His untimely death was mourned by many loyal friends, who sincerely regretted that he could not continue to live in the enjoyment of the high office to which he had so worthily attained.

WM. B. JENNINGS

The name of William B. Jennings is a familiar one to the citizens of Johnson county, as he has for a number of years been the holder of positions of responsibility in administering the affairs of the commonwealth.

Mr. Jennings is a native of Johnson county, his birth having occurred in White River township on the fourth day of January, 1852. He attended the public schools and later continued his studies at Hanover College. In the year 1895 his marriage to Miss Claudia B. Cutsinger was solemnized and their home established in Franklin.

For eight years, beginning with 1879, he served as auditor of Franklin county, and in the year 1896 he was elected county treasurer, in which capacity he served for four years. Then followed another term of four years as auditor, after which he retired from public life. His father, William H. Jennings, also was a prominent citizen of Johnson county, having served as sheriff, county treasurer, joint senator from Johnson and Morgan counties, and finally as mayor of Franklin, which position he held until his death.

FREDERICK H. JESSUP

Since the beginning of its political history, Howard county has been noted as a Republican stronghold, and few indeed have been the official positions held by Democrats; so it is a matter of no small moment and a cause for congratulation when the important position of prosecuting attorney of the county is held by a young Democratic worker. Frederick K. Jessup, of Kokomo, is perhaps the first Democratic incumbent of this position, and is justly proud of the honor. He assumed the duties of the office on the 1st day of January, 1913.

Mr. Jessup was born in the village of Greentown, Howard county, and attended the schools of his home town. Later he took a full law course at the law school of Indiana University at Bloomington. On January 20, 1912, he was united in marriage to Miss Ina Velaer.

Since attaining his majority Mr. Jessup has taken an unusual interest in political and municipal affairs, and is deeply interested in the various movements for the growth and development of the community in which he lives. During the various campaign activities he has given freely of his time and services for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy, and is recognized as a coming factor in the councils of the party organization in Howard county.

JOSEPH L. JOHANNIE

Joseph L. Johannie, a prominent citizen of Laporte county and a well-known public official, is a true son of northern Indiana and devoted to the interests of his community.

Mr. Johannie was born in Indiana on March 31, 1873, and here his boyhood was spent. He attended the schools of his home district, and at an early age mastered the principles of agriculture and engaged in its pursuit. Since then Mr. Johannie has found his greatest pleasure in tilling the soil, and even when engaged in the greater responsibilities of public life maintained his interest in agricultural affairs and takes pride in the fact that he has "split more rails than Abraham Lincoln."

In the year 1902 Mr. Johannie assumed the duties of township assessor, serving in that capacity for four years, at the expiration of which period he was elected township trustee for a further term of four years, this period of service ending in 1910. In the fall of the following year he was elected county treasurer for a two-year term, assuming the duties of office on January 1, 1912. At the close of this period he was re-elected to this position to serve until January 1, 1916.

On September 9, 1909, Mr. Johannie was united in marriage to Miss Grace E. Ward.

JOHN W. JOHNSON

The present treasurer of Greene county has, since his youth, evinced remarkable energy and ability to accomplish an unusual amount of profitable work for himself and for the community in which he resides.

This gentleman, Mr. John W. Johnson, is a native of Greene county, having been born within its confines on the 20th day of May, 1854. Here, also, his education was received, in the common schools of his district and later at the Bloomfield Normal School. Following his graduation from this latter institution he engaged in educational work, teaching school in the winter and farming in summer; nor was this double labor all of the accomplishment of this young man, for, out of the fifteen years thus employed, six years, from 1880 to 1887, were devoted also to the performance of the duties of township assessor of Cass township.

On the 6th day of December, 1890, his marriage to Miss Caroline Blackmore was solemnized.

In the fall of 1912 he was elected treasurer of Greene county, assuming the duties of his position on the first day of January, 1913.

Throughout his life, Mr. Johnson has been a consistent Democrat, voting the ticket and laboring zealously for the furtherance of the interests of the party.

BENJAMIN B. JOHNSON

Perhaps no man in the state could be found who is better equipped for the position of private secretary to the governor than is the incumbent of this position, Benjamin B. Johnson.

Mr. Johnson was born on a farm near Marlboro, Stark county, Ohio, but at the age of fourteen years accompanied his parents to Kokomo, where he completed his schooling in the high school of that city. In the year 1875 he was united in marriage to Miss Clara C. Albaugh, and to them have been born two children, Miss Edna and Fred Bates Johnson.

During their residence in Kokomo Mr. Johnson served for three and one-half years as deputy postmaster, and for six years as bookkeeper of the First National Bank. For six years, also, he discharged the duties of deputy and county treasurer, and was editor and proprietor of the Kokomo Tribune for over two years. In the year 1891 he assumed control of the Richmond Item and for eight years was editor of this paper. He was also a member of the Richmond board of works for three and one-half years and president of the commercial club of that city. He became affiliated with Indiana Democracy in 1900, opposing high tariff and imperialism; and in January, 1913, was appointed private secretary to Governor Ralston.

MCCLEAN JOHNSON

McClellan Johnson was born in Putnam county, Indiana, September 12, 1864. While still a small boy, his father, Oliver B. Johnson, moved to Clay county, where he resided the rest of his life.

McClellan attended the public school. He was a bright, apt pupil and learned readily. He later attended the Indiana State Normal at Terre Haute, fitting himself for teaching, which profession he followed from the time he was sixteen years old until within five years of his death.

When a mere boy of eight years he acquired a fondness for politics and a political career by often making the trip to Bowling Green with his father, who was then county commissioner, and loitering around the various rooms of the old court house. He often attended the various sessions of court and intently listened to the men and their discussions of political situations.

He was married to Margaret L. Boyd in 1886. To this union three girls were born, only one of which is now living. In 1888 he settled on a farm adjoining his father's, where he lived, managing the farm, and teaching during the winter until 1910, at which time he moved to Brazil to assume his official duties.

During his entire life he was a loyal, staunch Democrat and a hard worker for the party of his choice. For years he was precinct committeeman and certainly watched everything carefully. In 1907 he made the race for recorder, but was defeated in the primary, only to rise above it and be elected county treasurer in 1910 by an overwhelming majority. He was re-elected treasurer in 1912 with a still larger majority.

He died December 3, 1915, of angina pectoris. He had finished his day's work and lacked just four weeks of having completed his second term as county treasurer. By his death the county lost a good citizen, active in civic and political affairs and always supporting those things which were honorable and upright. He was a progressive man and one of high ideals and sterling worth.

WILL H. JOHNSTON

For many years a prominent attorney of Montgomery county and known throughout the legal profession of the state as jurist and legislator, the name of Will H. Johnston is held in high esteem by the citizens of his home county.

Mr. Johnston is a native of this state, born on the 9th day of June, 1858, in Putnam county. He attended the common schools of his district and the academy of Darlington. Later a special course and a course in law was taken at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, from which he graduated in 1881. In the same year he was admitted to the bar of Montgomery county and entered into the active practice of his profession at Crawfordsville. His firm has acted as county attorney continuously since 1907. To this work he brought unflinching energy, keen insight into complicated questions and conscientious loyalty to his clients, which soon placed him in the front rank of the profession.

In the year 1886, on the 20th day of January, he was united in marriage to Miss Ella May McMullen, and their home, then established in Crawfordsville, has since extended hospitality to many devoted friends.

Politically, Mr. Johnston has, since his boyhood, been a staunch adherent of the cause of Democracy, and has loyally devoted his time and energies to the promulgation of the principles taught by Jefferson. He has served the party, at various times, as precinct committeeman, as chairman of the county committee (from 1890 to 1892); and in the campaigns of 1896 and 1898 was a member of the state central committee. In the year 1900 he was elected state senator from Montgomery and Putnam counties and in the assemblies of 1901 and 1903 was an active participant, rendering efficient service. He is an exceptionally fluent speaker, and both as politician and jurist ranks as a leader. Indeed, he is known as the leading Democrat of Montgomery county. January 5, 1916, Mr. Johnston was appointed postmaster for the city of Crawfordsville, Indiana, which position he still holds.

JOHN F. JOYCE

Few adherents to the cause of Democracy have contributed more largely toward its advancement in Vigo county in past years than has John F. Joyce, clerk of the county.

Mr. Joyce's life has been spent in his present environment. Born in Vigo county, December 20, 1863, his education was received in St. Joseph's parochial school at Terre Haute. On June 1, 1891, he was united in marriage to Miss May Levan.

In the fall of 1906 Mr. Joyce was elected to represent Vigo county in the state legislature, and in the assembly which followed and in the special session of 1908 he was an active participant, introducing more bills which became enacted into laws than any other member, notwithstanding the fact that it was a Republican body. He was also a member of the sub-committee which drew up the public depository law. In November, 1908, he was elected clerk of the county, and after four years of service in this capacity was elected for a further term of four years. He enjoys the distinction of being the first Democratic incumbent of this office in sixteen years.

During the past twenty years Mr. Joyce has been a delegate to nearly every state convention of the party, and has at all times labored diligently for the furtherance of the cause throughout his district. Fraternally, he is allied with the orders of Knights of Columbus and Red Men. He is a member of the Catholic church.

JOHN P. KEMP

John P. Kemp, son of David and Mary A. (Price) Kemp, was born in Jefferson township, Tipton county, December 14, 1854. He had the advantage of being reared on a farm, attended the neighboring schools, later going to DePauw and the Normal College at Valparaiso, from which later institution he was graduated in 1878. After teaching school five terms he located at Tipton, where he began the study of law under Judge Dan Waugh, and was admitted to the bar in 1880, from which time he has continued in the practice of his profession.

On April 11, 1882, Mr. Kemp was married to Miss Belle Cox, a sister of Judge J. E. Cox of Peru and of Judge Charles E. Cox of Indianapolis, justice of the Supreme Court. To this union have been born three children—Charles, Walter J. and Ralph.

Mr. Kemp has been a director of the Citizens National Bank of Tipton since its organization. He is a member of Austin Lodge No. 128, F. & A. M.; Kempton Lodge No. 482, I. O. O. F., and of the Elks, and is a staunch Democrat.

HORACE MILTON KEAN

Horace Milton Kean, son of Milton W. and Virginia C. Kean, was born at Ireland, Dubois county, Indiana, on April 29, 1868. He was educated in the public schools and taught school in Dubois county for nine years.

He read law during his spare time while he taught and in 1899 graduated from the Chicago Correspondence School of Law, and practiced his profession in Jasper, Indiana, until December 1, 1914.

He served for 10 months as county assessor of Dubois county. For twelve years he was deputy prosecuting attorney of that county. He was elected joint representative for the counties of Dubois and Pike for one term and served in the 1905 session of the general assembly of Indiana. He was grand master of the Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows of Indiana in 1908-1909, and was grand representative to the Sovereign Grand Lodge of the World.

He was married June 14, 1908, to Lula B. Miller (nee Bretz) of Huntington, Indiana. They have one son, Horace M. Kean, Jr., who was born October 12, 1913. Mrs. Kean was president of the Rebekah Assembly (I. O. O. F.) of Indiana, 1910-1911, and was a delegate to the Association of Rebekah Assemblies at Winnipeg, Canada, in 1912.

Mr. Kean was appointed assistant attorney-general of Indiana January 1, 1915, by Richard M. Milburn, attorney-general. Upon the death of Mr. Milburn he was retained in said position by Hon. Evan B. Stotsenburg, who was appointed to succeed Mr. Milburn.

SENATOR JOHN WORTH KERN

The story of John Worth Kern is necessarily the history of the Indiana Democracy for at least seventeen years; also of the first administration of President Wilson, during which he was leader of the United States Senate. To even skim the surface of such a crowded life in less than a volume is impossible. His early life and struggles and triumphs in Howard county, where he was born, his commanding position at the bar first in the county of his nativity and later at Indianapolis, his brilliantly promising political activities in early manhood must be dismissed with a mere mention. In 1884 he first became a state figure when he was elected reporter of the supreme court, in which capacity he served for four years, and the seventeen volumes of the reports bearing his name are a monument to this period of his life. Even this early he was marked for leadership. Thomas A. Hendricks about this time predicted a future of distinction predicated upon the young man's eloquence, courage, political acumen, and ardent attachment to the principles of his party. On the termination of his term he formed a law partnership with Leon O. Bailey and resumed the practice of law in Indianapolis. In 1892 he was elected to the state senate; where his commanding political capacity was instantly conceded and where he especially distinguished himself in the fight for the employer's liability law. On the election of Mayor Taggart he was appointed corporation counsel, in which capacity he was called upon to deal with many knotty problems and enhanced his reputation as a lawyer by the manner in which he met them. This closes the first or preparatory period of his great career—a period rich in historical incidents that cannot be touched upon in an ordinary sketch.

In 1900 Mr. Kern reluctantly consented to make the race for governor at a time when there was little hope of carrying the state. He was easily nominated and immediately plunged into the campaign with characteristic vigor and enthusiasm, stumping the state from lake to river, and, while suffering defeat along with the rest of the ticket, running ahead of the national ticket. In 1904 there was another practically unanimous demand that he head the ticket in Indiana. He steadfastly adhered to his determination to fight in the ranks until Alton B. Parker, the nominee for President, summoned him to New York and made an urgent personal appeal on the ground that no other man would add so much strength to the party in Indiana. Again he consented to the sacrifice. In 1908 he was nominated at Denver for Vice-President on the ticket with Mr. Bryan and in that campaign he covered the country in a speaking tour which made him friends and admirers who were to serve him later. From that year, and some time before, he came to be accepted as Mr. Bryan's chief lieutenant in Indiana and as one of the Nebraskan's principal champions in the nation.

In 1910, at a time when he had firmly determined, for financial reasons, to retire from politics, and notwithstanding his positive declination personally expressed twice to the convention, he was nominated for the United States Senate. In response to the urgent pleas of all the candidates voted for in the convention he again, with reluctance, resumed his old position as the head of the ticket; and in a campaign brilliantly contested by Senator Beveridge, his opponent, was elected. This marked the beginning of his career as one of the nation's leaders.

No other man has ever attained so soon the commanding position that was instantly accorded Senator Kern in the senate. He became immediately the nucleus around which all progressive movements within the party in the senate gathered. Within a week he was leading the fight against the then reactionary organization of the party, and, while he failed this time by a narrow margin, he forced a personal recognition in his selection as one of the members of the steering committee charged with the duty of determining party policies and plans. During the first congress in which he served he particularly distinguished himself as the leader in the long-drawn-out battle to unseat Lorimer, planning the uncovering of the evidence of corruption, acting as leading cross-examiner of witnesses, preparing in large part the minority report, and in a three-days' speech summing up the evidence with such mastery that no other speeches were made and Lorimer was expelled.

He carried the prestige thus won to the Baltimore convention, where he was to play a dramatic and important part as chairman of the committee on platform and as Mr. Bryan's candidate for temporary chairman. He became one of the potential forces working for progressive principles and a progressive ticket, and when the inner story of that remarkable convention is finally written it will be found that no man played a more important part in the result.

At the beginning of his third year in the senate he was elected without any effort on his part to lead the Democratic majority—a meagre majority, upon which rested the heavy responsibility of enacting the Woodrow Wilson policies into law. The next four years of his life were years of ceaseless, life-sapping activity, and the story of these years is the history of the greatest constructive administration in the life of the republic. But for his diplomacy, tact, patience, tireless energy, sleepless vigilance, genius at conciliation, many of the Wilson measures now indelibly stamped upon the country would have failed of passage. Upon no man in public life did the President lean more heavily, to none did he turn more frequently, and the senator's nights as well as days were given ungrudgingly to the public service. The story of the part he played during these four years in the nature of things was not given to the public, but time will disclose the intimacy of his connection with the phenomenal success of the first Wilson administration. It was he to whom the President turned to pilot the child-labor law through the senate, and upon him that the President depended for the management of the eight-hour law, which prevented the most disastrous railroad strike in history. His greatest personal, as differentiated from party, triumph during these four years was his successful fight for an investigation into the unthinkable brutal conditions in the coal mining district of West Virginia—the first signal triumph ever scored by labor in the senate when all the powerful interests were aggressively arrayed upon the other side. In six years he made a record in actual achievement surpassing that of many who have served a generation.

But he paid the penalty in a physical breakdown which came upon him a little before the campaign of 1916, when he came up for re-election. He went through the fight in a sadly broken condition and was defeated along with the rest of the ticket in Indiana.

Broken in health, his voice almost gone, he returned to Washington for the short session beginning in December with the intention of resigning the leadership, but upon the insistence of his colleagues and the president he retained his post and fought the good fight through to the expiration of his term, leaving the senate with the affectionate admiration and respect of his colleagues on both sides the chamber.

Although impressed with the necessity of giving up all labors and recovering his health, his restless nature would not acquiesce, and in May he started out to deliver a patriotic war message in a lecture given on thirty-one consecutive nights in eight southern states. This was followed by a collapse from which he never recovered. He died at Asheville, North Carolina, in August, 1917, and his body was taken to his country home in the foothills of the Blue Ridge mountains in Virginia, where he had hoped to spend his closing years in the seclusion of "Kerncliffe." On the edge of a cliff, the termination of his favorite walk, he was buried with simple and impressive services, just as the sun dropped behind the mountains.

Of all the leaders of the Indiana Democracy since the Civil war, Senator Kern was the only one who occupied the position of leadership in the national congress when his party carried the responsibility of power in every branch of the government, with the exception of Voorhees during the disastrous last Cleveland administration. Where Voorhees failed, Kern succeeded. That this was not due to mere accident but to his personal qualities of leadership will be disclosed in due time when the historian pushes back the curtains for the truth.

JOSEPH C. KIMMELL

A prominent citizen of Noble county, a loyal worker in the ranks of the party and a trusted official in the service of the commonwealth is Joseph C. Kimmell of Ligonier.

Mr. Kimmell is a native of this state, born on the 28th day of April, 1872. He attended the common schools of Noble county and later entered the Tri-State Normal College of Angola for work in the higher branches and along educational lines.

On the 18th day of May, 1893, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Lena A. Keehn of Ligonier, and she has since presided over his home and extended its hospitality to the many friends which they have drawn about them.

In the year 1906 he was elected representative from Noble county to the legislature of the State and served in the following assembly, and also in the special session of 1908. In 1911 he assumed the duties of county auditor, having been elected to this position for a term of four years.

Mr. Kimmell has maintained his interest in the pursuit of agriculture and is the owner of a quarter-section of fine land near Ligonier, the cultivation of which he personally superintends.

FRANK H. KIRKHOFF

Frank H. Kirkhoff, an active worker for the furtherance of the interests of the Democratic party, was born in Hancock county on the 18th day of March, 1863. He attended the schools of his home district and later pursued his studies at the German Science School. On June 20, 1886, he married Miss Annie Eagan of Cambridge City, and established his home in the city of Indianapolis, where he became engaged in business as a steamfitter. In this work he has been quite successful, building up a lucrative business and establishing a reputation as an expert in his line. In the year 1914 he was appointed engineer of the state house, a position requiring real ability.

Mr. Kirkhoff is a member of the Indiana Democratic club and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen. His entire family are staunch Democrats.

JUDGE LEX J. KIRKPATRICK

"A just judge" is a term truly applicable to the subject of this article, this reputation having been won by the fairness of his decisions from the bench.

Judge Lex J. Kirkpatrick was born in Rush county on the 6th day of September, 1853, but was brought to Howard county when but three months of age, his parents settling upon a farm near Greentown. In 1871 he came to Kokomo. He attended the common schools of the county and Howard College, later pursuing his studies at the College of Oskaloosa, Iowa, and finally graduating from the Central Law School of Indianapolis in 1875. In the year 1881 was solemnized his marriage to Miss Emma Palmer of Holloway, Michigan. In 1890 he was elected circuit judge of the Thirty-sixth Judicial Circuit, composed of Howard and Tipton counties, serving in this capacity for six years. In 1909 a new court was established in this circuit, Howard county being made the Sixty-second Judicial Circuit, and he was appointed judge of the new circuit by Governor Marshall, serving for two years, since which time he has practiced law, a member of the firm of Bell, Kirkpatrick and Voorhis.

MATTHIAS KIRSCH

Matthias Kirsch was born on the 17th day of August, 1856, in the village of Dossenheim, near Heidelberg, Germany. At the age of twelve years he was brought by his father to this country and settled with the family in Adams county, Indiana, where his education was continued. October 6, 1878, he was married to Miss Amanda Langenbacher, and, though not a holder of political office, has since been closely identified with the business life of the county. He is now president of the firm of Kirsch, Sellemeyer & Sons Company, dealers in lumber and building material; cashier of the People's Loan and Trust Company; treasurer of the Ward Manufacturing Company; president of the German Building and Loan Association; member of the county council, and holds numerous other offices of trust for the county and for the German Reformed church of Decatur, of which he is a member.

CHARLES E. KISER

Widely known as a successful farmer of Whitley county and honored as a public official for integrity and zeal is Charles E. Kiser, former auditor of the county.

Mr. Kiser is a native Hoosier, born on the 25th day of December, 1867. His schooling was received in the public schools of Whitley county and later at the Valparaiso Normal School, from which he was graduated. He married Miss Mittie L. Livensparger and established his home at Columbia City.

In the fall of 1910 Mr. Kiser was nominated for the position of county auditor and was elected. During the four years which followed he devoted himself to the service of the commonwealth with conscientious zeal. Politically, he has stood firmly for the Democratic party and its principles, and his influence during the various campaigns has been a factor in the success of the local organization.

EDWARD S. KITCH

For many years a well-known citizen of Marshall county, and having served the commonwealth as a trusted official in various capacities in the past, the name of Edward S. Kitch is a familiar one to the residents of Plymouth and vicinity.

Mr. Kitch was born in northern Indiana on the 6th day of February, 1868. He attended the public schools of his district, and later continued his studies at the Valparaiso Normal School.

On the 18th day of December, 1892, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Della E. Bates, and the home then established by them has extended hospitality to a wide circle of friends.

In the year 1894, Mr. Kitch assumed the duties of town clerk of Bremen, and in this capacity served for two years. Later he was elected justice of the peace for German township, and the duties of this position were faithfully and conscientiously discharged for a term of ten years. In the fall of 1910, he was elected clerk of the circuit court, and he assumed the administration of affairs connected with this position on the first day of January, 1912, this term of service to expire on the first day of the year 1916; and the record which Mr. Kitch is daily establishing for progressive methods and conscientious service is testified to by a wide circle of acquaintances.

THOMAS F. KNOTTS

The first mayor of Gary, Ind., Thomas F. Knotts, has been so closely identified with the city that to many people mention of Gary suggests Mayor Knotts; and it would be impossible to consider the history of Gary, either as a municipality or as a business center, without reference to that enterprising and far-sighted citizen who about ten years ago stood in the midst of sand barrens and scrub oaks and helped plan and plat the lines along which the city has since grown.

Born in Highland county, Ohio, son of F. D. and Margaret K., who in 1866 by team and wagon left Ohio and established a new home on farm four miles from Laporte and later in Medaryville, Ind. Thos. F. Knotts received a common school education in Indiana and taught eight terms in this state and four years was superintendent of Indian school of Dakota territory; superintendent high schools at De Smets, Dakota territory. 1879 to 1884 Mr. Knotts studied at Valparaiso University and completed work in commercial, teachers' and scientific courses. Was a successful teacher, that work, like all his undertakings, being pursued with a thorough energy and ability to get results which is characteristic of him.

In 1891 he became identified with Lake county, when he went to Hammond and engaged in real estate and fire insurance business. While in Hammond he was on police force and also police commissioner. He was one of the first on the ground after plans had been formulated for establishment of a great industrial center at Gary. Resigning his position as police commissioner at Hammond he established his home at Gary. On May 4, 1906, his brother A. F. Knotts, who was connected with the steel corporation, opened the first real estate office and bought the first land outside that acquired by the steel corporation, and in July, 1906, Mr. Knotts was appointed the first postmaster of Gary, then fourth-class, serving only a few dozen patrons. Held this for over three years, being in the meantime otherwise honored. Elected member first town board, July, 1906; president of the board, till November, 1906, when was elected mayor of the new city corporation. Was repeatedly honored with the office until 1915. Head of Knotts-McRoberts Real Estate & Insurance Co., oldest of the kind at Gary and one of the largest.

JACOB C. KOLSEM

Jacob C. Kolsem, prominent in business circles of Terre Haute, Vigo county, and known throughout the State as an efficient and progressive legislator, is a native of Cologne, Germany. Here he was born on the 24th day of July, 1849, but when he reached the age of four years, was brought by his parents to America. They settled in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., where he received his education in the public and German schools of that city. While still in his boyhood, he obtained employment driving a mule in an adjacent coal mine, and later worked in the iron nail mills of that city. In the year 1868 he came to Greencastle, Ind., and here, also, he worked in the nail mills, going later to Terre Haute, which has since remained his home.

In 1878 he entered the employ of a firm of clothiers and four years later was manager of the When Clothing Store of Terre Haute, Ind., later known as Pixley & Co., Clothiers. In this position he continued for a period of twelve years. Meanwhile he had taken an active interest in municipal affairs and in 1881 was elected to membership in the common council of Terre Haute. Two years later he was re-elected for a further term. In 1885 the high honor of being elected Mayor of the city was conferred upon him, and after two years' incumbency of this office, he was re-elected. Following his retirement from this position in 1889, he was appointed chairman of the metropolitan police board by Governor Matthews, and for four years he discharged the duties of this office with characteristic diligence. Then followed his appointment to a commission to revise and codify the mining laws of the State; and these laws, arranged during the incumbency of Governor Durbin, are still in effect.

In the year 1890 he was elected president of the Terre Haute Water Works Co., and for two or three years he discharged the duties in connection with this position. Later, while still manager of the Pixley & Co. store, he invested a small amount of money in the coal business, and at a reorganization of the company in 1894 was elected secretary and treasurer and general manager of the Jackson Hill Coal and Coke Co., a corporation organized about 1890 and incorporated for $500,000, paid-up capital. This position of great responsibility he has since held, administering the company's affairs in such manner as to promote a healthy, steady growth and increase in the business of the company.

For ten years, also, he served as president of the Indiana Bituminous Coal Operators' Association, but at the expiration of that period refused to continue in the office. During this time he presided over several international conventions of operators and miners, and at these times succeeded in maintaining harmony among the members and achieving satisfactory results. He has been a strong advocate of union labor and the mutual carrying out of all contracts entered into.

In the fall of 1912 he was elected to represent Vigo county in the State Senate, and in the assemblies of 1913 and 1915 his work was noteworthy. In the former session he was chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and was the author of a bill to protect the lives and property of workmen engaged in the mining industries. This bill was known as the "Kolssem Bill." He was also the author of a bill passed for the improvement of roadways from the city limits to the township line. He also was the author of a bill in the State Senate authorizing the Governor to appoint a commission of four men, two who are familiar with the mining industry from an operators' standpoint, and two who are familiar with the mining industry from a miners' standpoint, to re-codify the present mining laws to fit the improved and modern methods of mining of the present day, which was passed and signed by the Governor. He was otherwise active in forwarding party measures.

Mrs. Kolssem, to whom he was married May 18, 1874, was formerly Miss Mary F. Stakemann, and she has since been the presiding genius of his home.

JUDGE JOHANNES KOPELKE

Judge Johannes Kopelke, a prominent citizen of Crown Point and holding high rank in the legal profession of northern Indiana, is a native of Germany. He was born in the province of Pomerania on the 14th day of June, 1854. Here his youth was spent and his schooling received. At the age of seventeen, however, having nearly completed a course in college, he emigrated to America and completed his collegiate work in the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, taking the full course in the law department.

Following his graduation, in 1876, he located in Crown Point and entered into the active practice of the law, and soon demonstrated marked ability in his chosen profession. In the year 1884 he was chosen presidential elector from his district and in the fall of 1890 was elected state senator from Lake and Porter counties, serving with conscientious zeal in the assemblies of 1891 and 1893, taking an active part in the deliberations and work of this body. In 1898, he was a candidate on the Democratic state ticket for judge of the appellate court. On the 23rd day of February, 1911, he was appointed by Governor Marshall a judge of the superior court of Lake county, and at the expiration of his term of service, in November, 1914, was a candidate for election as circuit judge on the Democratic ticket.

Politically, Judge Kopelke has been a staunch adherent to the principles of the Jeffersonian party and has given valuable service to the local and state organization.

BERNARD KORBLY

When Bernard Korbly left Madison, Indiana, in 1895, making the move to Indianapolis with his father, Charles A. Korbly, who had formed a law partnership with Alonzo Green Smith, it was for Bernard Korbly the beginning of the building of one of the best legal businesses enjoyed by any attorney in the state, and at the same time the start of one of the most active and continuous Democratic political workers in Indiana.

He had no sooner landed in Indianapolis than he became precinct committeeman. He served in this capacity in two different wards in which he located during the campaigns when Thomas Taggart was three times candidate for mayor of the city, each time being elected by a larger majority than the campaign preceding.

After five years' service as precinct committeeman, Mr. Korbly became ward committeeman, where he served another five years, becoming chairman of the district and a member of the state central committee from 1906 to 1910, after that time succeeding Joseph Fanning as Democratic state chairman. He served through the three campaigns of 1912, 1914 and 1916 as chairman of the state central committee, all being most interesting campaigns, the first two resulting in the success of the Democratic ticket and the last being a close race in results against the largest campaign fund which was ever spent in the state, the Republicans officially reporting a campaign fund of approximately a quarter of a million dollars.

Because it was impossible for Mr. Korbly to give his attention longer to the state chairmanship, on account of his extensive legal practice, he resigned as head of the Democratic state committee in July, 1917, being succeeded by Charles A. Greathouse.

When the elder Korbly associated with Alonzo Green Smith as a legal firm, under the style of Smith & Korbly, Bernard Korbly took a position in the office, remaining in these same offices through several reorganizations for more than a quarter of a century. At the time of his father's death in 1900, the firm name remained the same, Bernard Korbly becoming the junior partner. This same association continued until a short time before the death of Mr. Smith in 1907.

After this time and until 1909, Mr. Korbly carried on the practice by himself, at this time forming a partnership with Judge Willard New in order to take care of the increasing business. From that time the firm of Korbly & New became and continued one of the best known and most successful in the entire state.

When Mr. Korbly first moved to Indianapolis he was very proficient in stenography, as his father had been, appreciating the advantage of this accomplishment in the practice of the legal profession.

Mr. Korbly has attended most of the national conventions as a state delegate since his first entrance into politics. He is one of the most efficient organizers and directors of political campaigns in the state which has produced the greatest of political generals. In his capacity as delegate to national conventions he was associated with Thomas Taggart, who has always been one of the most influential factors in such gatherings in the line of shaping policies and selecting the candidates.

STANLEY MICHAEL KRIEG

Stanley Michael Krieg, a prominent attorney of Petersburg and an honored official in the service of the commonwealth, is a native of Pike county, his birth having occurred within its confines on the 16th day of July, 1872. He is, however, of German parentage, his father having come to this country in the year 1851 and his mother in 1839. He attended the schools of his district until he was nineteen years of age. Later he entered the Central Normal College of Danville, where he remained three years, and after completing the law course was admitted to the bar of Pike county and entered into the active practice of his profession. Here he has since remained, building for himself a lucrative practice and establishing a reputation for honesty, ability and sterling worth.

On the 30th day of November, 1904, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Effa Tislow, who has since presided over his home and dispensed its hospitality.

On the 3rd of November, 1914, he was elected to the position of prosecuting attorney for the 57th Judicial Circuit for a term of two years. He has been an active party worker, connected with the county organization since 1896.

Fraternally, he is allied with the Modern Woodmen of America and Improved Order of Red Men; in religion he is a member of the Presbyterian church.

DR. EDWARD HERMAN KRUSE

The name of Dr. Edward Herman Kruse is well known throughout Allen county and to the medical profession of the state, being that of a leading physician and surgeon of Ft. Wayne and an honored official in the service of the county.

Dr. Kruse is a native Hoosier, born on the 15th day of June, 1884. He attended Concordia College, Ft. Wayne. In the year 1902 he entered the Indiana Medical College at Indianapolis for a course in medical science, and after his graduation from this institution pursued his studies abroad, attending medical colleges of Berlin and Vienna. This course was completed in the year 1907 and in the same year he entered into the active practice of his profession in the city of Ft. Wayne. Here a lucrative practice soon came to him and a reputation was established for skill and conscientious service.

In the fall of 1912 he was elected to the position of coroner of the county, his term of service to expire in 1916. In this work also he has maintained the reputation established in his private practice, serving the public with conscientious diligence.

Politically, he is an adherent of the tenets of Jefferson, voting and working for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy.

His marriage to Miss Geneva Maxfield, of Angola, Ind., was solemnized in the year 1912, and together they have drawn about them a circle of charming friends.

PETER J. KRUYER

Peter J. Kruyer is a native of Indiana, born in Plymouth, March 27, 1861. After receiving a common school education he took a commercial course. For 22 years Mr. Kruyer was connected with the Hon. Daniel McDonald in the printing business in Plymouth. Mr. Kruyer was twice elected city clerk and once to the city council. In 1884 was nominated without opposition for clerk of the circuit court in Marshall county on the Democratic ticket. At the election there was a Republican landslide and Mr. Kruyer was defeated as was the entire ticket. Mr. Kruyer served as a jury commissioner in Marshall county for fourteen years.

On January 19, 1914, Mr. Kruyer received from President Wilson the appointment of internal revenue collector for the sixth district of Indiana, and has the distinction of being the first federal appointee in the history of the nation who was confirmed by the Senate within fifteen minutes after the nomination was reported.

Mr. Kruyer was married in Plymouth May 2, 1882, to Jennie M. Schoner. There were born to Mr. and Mrs. Kruyer seven children, four of whom survive—one daughter, Loretta, and three sons, Cletus H., Wilfred and Walter. Mr. Kruyer with his family resides at 615 Portage avenue, South Bend.

JOHN W. KURTZ

John W. Kurtz, who is prominently identified with municipal and business affairs in the town of Knox, was born in the state of Ohio on December 2, 1862; but was brought by his parents in infancy to Starke county. His early schooling was received in the public schools of that county and he later pursued a college course.

In the year 1901 Mr. Kurtz assumed the duties of auditor of Starke county, and in this capacity served until 1904. The following year he became connected with the Farmers' State Bank of Knox, holding the position of cashier of that institution, and in this capacity has since served.

In 1890 Mr. Kurtz was united in marriage to Miss Mary Eigenmann.

MOSES B. LAIRY

Judge Moses B. Lairy, formerly of Logansport, now a resident of Indianapolis, is a man of extended education and broad experience and has marked the imprint of his influence upon his surroundings and upon the legal profession throughout the state.

Judge Lairy was born in this state on the 13th day of August, 1859, and spent his childhood upon a farm, attending the district schools and laying the foundation for that clearness of vision and soundness of judgment which has characterized his decisions from the bench. Following a course at the normal school at Valparaiso he taught school for a period of ten years, beginning in 1878, during which time his vacations were spent largely in the law office of Judge Dudley H. Chase of Logansport, reading law, and in June, 1889, he was enabled to graduate from the law department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. The ensuing six years were spent in the practice of law at Logansport and so rapidly did he advance in his chosen profession that in 1895 he was appointed by Governor Matthews to fill the unexpired term of Judge D. B. McConnell, retiring in 1896. The succeeding fourteen years were spent in active practice, in partnership with M. F. Mahoney, a part of which time he served as county attorney of Cass county.

In the year 1910 Judge Lairy was elected to the Indiana appellate bench for the second district.

During his tenure of office Judge Lairy devoted his time conscientiously and diligently to the duties of the bench, giving to each case his best thought and unbiased judgment, bringing to his work a singleness of purpose and withal a dignity of conduct which raised him to a high plane in the estimation of the profession and of the people at large. Therefore, in 1914, it was no occasion for surprise to his friends when he received the nomination and was subsequently elected to the position of judge of the supreme court.

Although Judge Lairy has been honored with positions of great responsibility, he has still found time to take an active interest in all movements tending to the betterment of the community at large; and in this connection it may be noted that he is a member of the Commercial Club of Indianapolis. The feeling of brotherhood which is inspired by the associations of the fraternal organization has also made its appeal to him, and he has taken an active part in the affairs of the Masonic order, and of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

In all these various relations, we find him to be a man of culture, honor and integrity, keenly alive to his opportunities and his responsibilities, performing to the best of his ability the duties that fall to him in the various phases of his life and work.

SAMUEL A. LAMBERT

Samuel A. Lambert, for many years an active and enthusiastic worker in the ranks of the Democratic party in Laporte county, is also widely known as a successful contractor and builder.

Mr. Lambert is a native of this state, born on the 13th day of August, 1857. His education was received in the public schools of Fulton county. Later he located in Laporte county and there engaged in business, ever since taking an active interest in the business life of the community and enlarging his own interests as the years have passed. In the year 1886 he married Miss Lydia Parker.

In the year 1898 Mr. Lambert was elected city councilman for a term of two years, and in this capacity served with much credit to himself and his constituents. In the fall of 1910 he was elected to the still greater responsibilities of county commissioner, and assumed the duties of the office on the first day of the following January.

GEORGE L. LANEY

George L. Laney enjoys the political distinction of being the first Democratic clerk elected in Parke county for 65 years, and receiving the largest vote ever cast for a Democrat for a Parke county office. He was born in Illinois, April 8, 1863, and received his education in the common schools of Parke county, finishing at the Central Normal at Ladoga in 1884. He then taught in the county schools for eight years, worked in the coal mines at Rosedale, Ind., for five years, and then became a builder and contractor. After this he became supervisor of agencies for the Meridian Life Insurance Company of Indianapolis from 1900 to 1904. Was elected township (Florida) trustee in 1904, and at the same time ran a small farm. He resigned as township trustee to run for clerk of Parke county, being elected by the largest vote ever given a Democrat in this county. He refused a renomination for clerk, in 1912. He was elected clerk and treasurer of the town of Rockville in 1913, to serve from January, 1914, to 1916.

Mr. Laney has a strong and pleasing personality, and enjoys the fullest confidence of a large circle of friends and acquaintances, being one of the promoters and builders of the Rockville opera house, and has been secretary of the company since its organization. He might be aptly termed a "jiner," which may have had something to do with his popularity, for he is an active member of Parke Lodge No. 8, F. & A. M.; Parke Chapter No. 37, Indianapolis Consistory A. and A. Rite; 32nd degree member Murat Temple Nobles Mystic Shrine, Indianapolis; I. O. O. F., Rockville Encampment; Knights of Pythias, and the Pythian Sisters and Rebekahs.

Mr. Laney married Miss Rosanna Parker October 9, 1888. He is at present engaged extensively in the lumber industry, owning and operating a saw and planing mill, and is a large operator in Northern Michigan and Southern States timber. He is thoroughly in tune with the high principles of his party and ever ready to give it his best aid financially and otherwise.

JOHN B. LAWLER

The gentleman whose photo appears herewith is well known in the city of Madison, having been for a number of years an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party in Jefferson county, and having held various positions of responsibility in the service of the public.

Mr. John B. Lawler was born on the 22nd day of March, 1864, at Kent, Jefferson county, Ind. He attended the common schools of Jefferson county and later continued his studies at the Independent Normal School at Lexington, Ind. On the 3rd day of October, 1900, he was united in marriage to Miss Jennie Mershon, but eight years later death claimed her and she passed away on the 29th day of July, 1908.

Mr. Lawler has devoted much time to the service of the Democratic party, and from 1908 to 1914, inclusive, he filled the position of county chairman for Jefferson county. He was also a member of the city board of health for several years, and served as jury commissioner for the county for two or three years. In the year 1911 he assumed the duties of deputy state oil inspector, and in this field he was engaged until April 1, 1914, at which time he resigned to assume the duties of postmaster of the city of Madison, a position to which he was appointed by President Wilson, March 27, 1914. In addition to these political positions he has been engaged in the mattress and upholstering business at Madison for a number of years.

B. W. LEADER

The position of county sheriff is one of great responsibility, requiring of its incumbent the combined qualities of firmness of character and humane attitude toward the unfortunate. In the person of B. W. Leader the citizens of Elkhart county have found a man eminently qualified to assume the responsibilities involved in this important position.

Mr. Leader was born in this state on the 25th day of August, 1869, and attended the public schools of Elkhart county. In the year 1896 he was united in marriage to Miss Carrie Brindley, since which time their home has been established in the city of Elkhart, where they have a wide circle of friends.

In the fall of 1910 Mr. Leader was elected to the office of sheriff of Elkhart county, and on the first day of the following January he took up the duties of his position and labored zealously in the service of the people who had thus honored him.

Mr. Leader has, for many years, worked diligently for the success of the Jeffersonian party in his community, giving liberally of his time as well as his means to further the principles to which he has himself so strictly adhered.

ANDERSON B. LEE

During the past twenty years Anderson B. Lee has been one of the most active party workers in Madison county, serving as secretary of township and city organizations, precinct committeeman several times, chairman of township committee and delegate to county, district and state conventions. He was born on a farm in Madison county, December 24, 1867, and there he was reared and received his early schooling. Later he pursued a course of study at Fairmount Academy. In 1894 he entered the livery business in Alexandria, and this he successfully conducted for thirteen years, later dealing extensively in live stock. Then he became the proprietor of a buggy and implement concern, and in this business remained until June 25, 1914, at which time he assumed the duties of postmaster of the city of Alexandria.

On November 12, 1891, Mr. Lee was united in marriage to Miss Minerva Jeanette Vinson of Alexandria. He is affiliated with the orders of Knights of Pythias and Elks, and is actively allied with Alexandria commercial organizations.

CHARLES C. LEISURE

Charles C. Leisure, a well-known citizen of Earl Park, Indiana, was born December 10, 1867, in the state of Indiana. He attended the public schools of Grant county, but later emigrated to Benton county, where his permanent home was established. On the 28th day of June, 1911, he was united in marriage with Miss Mellie Flinn. For a number of years he was a successful dealer in hardware, but in June, 1913, he was appointed to the position of postmaster of Earl Park, assuming the duties of his office on the 18th day of the month. He has been an active worker for the success of the Democratic party, and is at present secretary of the township committee.

CHARLES LIEB

The old saying, "It is hard to keep a good man down," seems peculiarly applicable to the subject of this article, Mr. Charles Lieb, of Rockport, a gentleman whose career in America began as a lonely immigrant of fourteen years, and continued to the seat of a leader in the Congress of the United States and a highly honored guest of the President.

Mr. Lieb is a native of Germany, born in Fleminggen on the 20th day of May, 1852. Here his childhood was spent and here the foundation of his education was laid. Hearing of the opportunities for advancement in the new world, however, and seeing the rose-hued visions of enthusiastic youth, he started at the age of fourteen years for the shores of America and entered the United States alone. Coming directly to the state of Indiana he found employment and continued his education. After completing the course in the public schools he entered Rockport Collegiate Institute and graduated from this institution in the year 1872.

In the year 1877 his marriage to Miss Katherine Mohr was solemnized and their home was established in Rockport. Here they have since remained, gathering about them a wide circle of friends, and becoming substantial and influential members of the community. Mr. Lieb has one daughter, Mrs. Archibald C. Stevenson.

In his early youth, he became a firm adherent to the principles promulgated by Thomas Jefferson, and from the time when he attained his majority his vote was cast and his influence thrown for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy. For more than forty years he has been an influential factor in the organization of Spencer county and the First Congressional District, giving freely of his time and energy during the various campaigns and working zealously and loyally for the cause.

In the fall of 1906 he was elected representative from Spencer county to the legislature of the state, and in the deliberations of the assembly of 1907 and of the special session of 1908 was an active participant. In 1910 also he was elected to this office, and in the legislature of 1911 held the position of Democratic caucus chairman. During this term of service, he was elected to the still higher responsibilities of congressman from the First District of Indiana. At the time of this election, in November, 1912, he received the largest plurality ever given a candidate for Congress in his district; and his services in the 63rd Congress were marked by such loyalty and zeal that he was returned to the 64th Congress with an increased vote. In both of these elections he carried every county in his district, and his labors in Washington have amply justified the confidence reposed in him by his constituents and fellow citizens. At the conclusion of his first term in Congress, he was called to the White House and personally thanked by President Wilson for his unflinching support of the administration in its fundamental policies.

As a business man, also, he has evinced marked capabilities, and is the holder of extensive manufacturing and farming interests in Spencer county. His interest in the pursuit of agriculture is intense, and in the various movements which have arisen for the development of the farming community he has been an active leader. He also holds the position of president of the Farmers' Bank of Rockport, a concern noted for its sound business policies and conservative methods. Other business enterprises in the community, also, have felt the impetus of his investment and influence. A 32nd Degree Mason, he is affiliated with the Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias and Elks, and is a member of the Lutheran church.

JOHN A. LINKE

John A. Linke, federal agent for vocational agricultural education, was born March 6, 1871, in Bartholomew county, Indiana. He graduated from Indiana University in 1903 and received his master degree in 1904. He taught school for a number of years and was superintendent of schools at North Salem, Brownstown and Seymour, afterwards entering Purdue University, receiving his B. S. A. in 1915. After his graduation he was employed in the agricultural extension service for two years in Indiana.

In October, 1917, he was appointed federal agent for vocational agricultural education for the states of Indiana, Ohio, West Virginia, Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Kentucky, Iowa, Missouri and Minnesota, these states comprising the greatest and richest agricultural area of the world. This position is one of the most important in the gift of the Federal Vocational Educational Board, and he was appointed for his special abilities more than for any political consideration, although he happened to be one of the liveliest Democrats in the state of Indiana, along with his unusual ability in business lines.

NEHEMIAH LITTLEFIELD

Mr. Littlefield has served as postmaster of the city of Rensselaer and has been since his infancy a resident of Jasper county, and is closely identified with the business and political life of the locality.

Nehemiah Littlefield was born in LaSalle county, Illinois, on the 23rd day of July, 1866, but at the age of two years accompanied his parents to Jasper county, Indiana, where he received his schooling, attending the public schools. On the 31st day of December, 1894, his marriage to Miss Gertrude Erwin was solemnized, and their home established in Rensselaer.

For many years he has been engaged in the real estate business, and has taken a deep interest in the various movements for the progress and development of the community. He has also been an active worker for the success of Democracy in Jasper county, and during the period from 1908 to 1914 served the party as county chairman. On the first day of November, 1913, he assumed the duties of postmaster of the city, and to the administration of the affairs of this office all his energies have been devoted, giving to the public the same whole-hearted service which has been characteristic of his private undertakings.

FRED C. LOCKWOOD

In summing up the career of Fred C. Lockwood, his whole life-story is told when you state that he is a self-made young man. His education was perfected in the schools of Jennings county, supplemented with a special course in journalism.

In 1892 he was given a position on the North Vernon Republican in the capacity of "devil" and cub reporter. Later he was employed on the Vernon Journal under the supervision of James N. Culp. When that paper was merged with the North Vernon Sun in 1905 with Mr. Culp as its editor, he joined the editorial staff as a feature writer for the Sun, and has been continuously associated with that paper since 1905, with the exception of four years in the confectionery business at Vernon and one year on the Caruthersville Republican and the Caruthersville Argus, at Caruthersville, Missouri.

When James N. Culp was appointed postmaster at North Vernon, in June of 1913, Mr. Lockwood was recalled from Missouri to take charge of the editorial management of the North Vernon Sun, and he has edited the paper since that time.

Mr. Lockwood is twenty-four years of age and the youngest editor the Sun has ever had since it was launched, forty-three years ago.

J. FRANCIS LOCHARD

J. Francis Lochard is a member of a prominent Democratic family, himself, his father and four brothers consistently voting the ticket and laboring for the furtherance of the cause.

He was born in Decatur county, eight miles south of Greensburg, and here attended the common schools. Later a course was pursued at the Ripley County Normal School and he finally entered the State Normal at Terre Haute.

On the 11th day of June, 1903, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Ida R. Spencer, who has proved a worthy helpmate in all his undertakings, and the presiding genius of their home in Versailles.

In the year 1910 he was elected auditor of Ripley county, and in the fall of 1914 was re-elected. He has been an attendant at county, congressional and state conventions, and is affiliated with the fraternal orders of Masons and Knights of Pythias. He is also a member of the Baptist church.

HON. HIRAM M. LOGSDON

Hon. Hiram M. Logsdon, a native of Indiana, a descendant of one of that type of sturdy pioneer families which have placed this state in the front rank of the nation, was born in Spencer county about 60 years ago. He was the oldest of the several children of Samuel and Cyrene Osborn Logsdon.

He finished his education at the Indiana State University, graduating in the class of 1875, attaining a high standing in his class and in the University. He commenced the practice of law at Rockport, Indiana, in 1877; entering into partnership with the late Hon. Henry Kramer, he continued the practice there until 1891. By reason of his earnest devotion to his profession, his recognized ability and integrity, his merit and power as an advocate, he, during that time, won a fine practice and became one of the leading members of the profession in that part of the state. In 1885 he made an extended European tour over the countries of the continent, and in England, Scotland and Ireland, interesting accounts of which were given in letters published in his home papers.

In May, 1891, he married Miss Kate Hyland, daughter of Wilmer Hyland, a leading merchant of Rockport, Ind., and they removed to Chattanooga, Tenn., where he practiced law for over two years. Returning to the state of his nativity, they located at Evansville, Ind., where he continued in the successful practice of his profession until January, 1913, when he was appointed judge of the probate court of Vanderburg county, Indiana, which office he still occupies, discharging his duties therein with great ability, painstaking, and marked success.

Politically, Mr. Logsdon has always been a Democrat, a firm believer in Democratic principles, and an enthusiastic supporter of his party. His father was an ardent and uncompromising Democrat, and during the Civil war, the time "that tried men's souls," who were of the Democratic faith, so outspoken was he in his espousal of his political creed that he was arrested, as were many other Democrats in Indiana, and was tried by court-martial at Indianapolis, an account of which was given in a book published soon afterwards, entitled "The Arbitrary Arrests of Indiana." The son has always been as ardent politically as his father, but it has never yet been charged against him as a crime. Attention was invited to him early in his professional career on account of his ability and good judgment of men and affairs; and by reason of his being gifted in speech and powers of persuasive argument—so much so that he was called the silvery-tongued orator of his county, and his services on the rostrum and otherwise were soon in demand by his party; and he ever responded to its call, ready and willing for every emergency.

In 1886 he was elected to the legislature of Indiana as state senator from Spencer and Warrick counties, on the Democratic ticket, and in this his popularity was evidenced, as he was thus elected over Dr. Samuel F. Johnson of Spencer county, a former captain in the Union army, an experienced Republican, politician, and a strong and popular candidate, although the remainder of the Democratic ticket in both counties went down in defeat. It is interesting to note here the great results that sometimes may flow from apparently small causes. It was during Mr. Logsdon's first session that almost the entire session of the legislature was occupied in the fierce contest for the United States Senate between the cohorts of Benjamin Harrison and David Turpie, those intellectual giants of their day, and favorite gladiators of their respective parties, in which finally Senator Turpie was elected by only a bare majority. Had Dr. Johnson defeated Mr. Logsdon in their race, it is probable that General Harrison would have been elected to succeed himself in the United States Senate, of which he was then a member, and in that event his party would hardly have nominated him for President, as Isaac P. Gray, a Democrat, was then the Governor of Indiana, and in case of a vacancy in the U. S. Senatorship he would have appointed a Democrat in Senator Harrison's place. So it would seem that except for the election of Mr. Logsdon to the state senate Benjamin Harrison would not have become President of the United States.

By reason of his first experience in the legislature in this protracted election of United States Senator, Mr. Logsdon, being progressive and alert, and recognizing the necessity of such reform, introduced during that session, and procured its passage by the Indiana senate, a concurrent resolution favoring an amendment to the constitution of the United States providing for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people. This is said to be the first time such resolution ever passed a legislative body. His foresight and wisdom in this has been since vindicated by such an amendment of the constitution, and this wholesome provision is now the law of the land, and legislatures may now devote themselves to the business for which they are designed.

Mr. Logsdon also participated actively in other important legislation during his term of office, among which might be mentioned the bill to repeal the so-called intimidation act, the school book law, the Australian ballot law, etc.

Both before and since his occupancy of the bench, Mr. Logsdon has on numerous occasions been called upon to serve as special judge and judge pro tem in both the circuit and superior courts of Vanderburg county, and in other courts, where his courteous bearing, his legal learning, his judicial temperament, his fair and impartial disposition, his cool head and warm heart have made him signally successful, and won the praise of the observing, and a high place among the judiciary of the state.

He is a member of the Sigma Chi fraternity, and also of the Masonic order, the Knights of Pythias and Elks.

Though now in the prime of his life, Mr. Logsdon is still young, and his life gives promise of yet rendering valuable services to his party and state, and of his being still useful to his fellow-men.

GEORGE W. LONG

George W. Long, a prominent attorney of Brown county, was born on November 20, 1877, at Edinburg, Johnson county, Indiana. In the year 1880 his parents moved to Brown county, and settled upon a farm four miles west of Nashville. George received his elementary education in the schools of the latter county and remained on the farm until he reached the age of eighteen years. In 1901 he was graduated from the law department of Indiana University. He served as deputy prosecuting attorney from August 23, 1902, to January 1, 1907; and was elected state senator for the term 1909 to 1911. He was Democratic county chairman for Brown county from 1906 to 1914, and was many times elected as delegate to various Democratic conventions.

Mr. and Mrs. Long are both members of old-line Democratic families, and were married on June 14, 1903. Two sons and a daughter have come to them. Mr. Long is a member of the Masons, Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Modern Woodmen. He has always been an active Democratic worker.

GROVER C. LONG

The present surveyor of Carroll county was born and reared in that county, his birth having occurred on the 9th day of June, 1885, in the town of Cutler, where his boyhood was spent, and in the schools of which place his education was largely received. After graduating from the high school in 1902, he attended Purdue University for two and a half terms. While but a boy he learned the carpenter's trade, and later engaged in the contracting and building business. His wife was formerly Miss Olga Trobaugh, and they have drawn about them a wide circle of friends.

Fraternally, Mr. Long is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having gone through all the chairs; belongs to the Uniform Rank of Knights of Pythias and is a Royal Arch Mason.

RALPH H. LONGFIELD

Ralph H. Longfield, superintendent of schools for St. Joseph county, is a staunch Democrat, but is much better known as an educator than as a politician.

Mr. Longfield was born in Madison township, St. Joseph county, Indiana, March 18, 1886, and was educated in the common schools, the high school at Bremen, Indiana, and the state normal school at Terre Haute. He taught in both common and high schools, and was teaching a district school when the office of superintendent of schools for St. Joseph county became vacant, in 1909. Young as he was, he had already taken out a superintendent's license, and his record as a teacher was so high that the board elected him to fill the vacancy. His ability and energy in the management of the schools of the county and the affairs of his office speedily became the best endorsement of the board's action, and in 1911 he was re-elected by unanimous vote.

Mr. Longfield is an ardent, though not obtrusive Democrat, and is highly popular, not only because of his splendid success as school superintendent, but because of his character and fine personality. He married Anna Rush, a member of one of the oldest families in America, a family that traces its ancestry direct to Benjamin Rush, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

WILLIAM EDWARD LONGLEY

William Edward Longley was the first man to fill the position of fire marshal of the state of Indiana, being named for the place by Governor Samuel M. Ralston in March, 1913, when the law first went into effect. This is one of the most useful and beneficial positions in the state government, having been created by a Democratic legislature in response to the demand of the insurance companies as well as the people who are insured, but, far ahead of any of these considerations, for the people generally. It extends protection to lives and property by insuring preventive measures that are effective.

Under Marshal Longley the department was organized in a first-class business manner that at once accomplished efficiency. In connection with the actual workings of the department he established a department of information and publicity, which kept the people informed through all the newspapers of the state on the things required and the things that were being accomplished. In the working out of the legal provisions, safety appliances were provided to cover cases where large numbers of people were employed and where any considerable number of people were housed together. The efficiency of the department was on a par with the efficiency and thoroughness with which Mr. Longley had always conducted his own successful business affairs.

William Edward Longley was born in Noblesville, Indiana, September 26, 1854. He was reared and educated at the same place, later attending Ladoga Academy and entering the office of the Hamilton County Register as an apprentice, with a view of remaining in the newspaper field. At the end of three years he retired, however, to accept a place as clerk in a furniture store, but in 1875 went to Indianapolis, where he remained for three years. It was while in Indianapolis he married Miss Clara V. Wright of that city, and one of their sons, William R. Longley, after graduation, accepted the position of professor of mathematics at Yale.

After his marriage Mr. Longley returned to Noblesville and opened a hardware store of his own, remaining in the business for thirty years and building up one of the most substantial business houses in Hamilton county. Mr. Longley was also a director in the Indiana Loan Association and for many years president of the American National Bank of Noblesville.

He was always prominent in Democratic politics in his county and in the state. For a number of years he was chairman of the ninth congressional district Democratic committee, was vice-chairman of the Democratic state central committee and was delegate to the Democratic national convention in 1904. In 1912 he was the personal representative of Samuel M. Ralston as his campaign manager, and it was after the election of Governor Ralston that he was made state fire marshal.

Fraternally, Mr. Longley is a member of the Odd Fellows, being the treasurer of the state Odd Fellows' home at Greencastle for several years. He also is a 32nd degree Mason and a member of the Knights of Pythias and Red Men.

CLYDE R. LOTTICK

The gentleman whose photo appears herewith is a prominent member of the bar of Harrison county and has for many years been closely and prominently identified with legal affairs of that section of the state.

Clyde R. Lottick was born in this state on the 20th day of March, 1880; and, after graduating from the public schools of his district, attended the Central Normal College of Danville, taking the scientific and law courses of that institution. After his graduation he entered the active practice of law, and has distinguished himself by energetic work and clear-sighted understanding of legal problems involved in his work. In the year 1908 he was elected to the position of prosecuting attorney for the Third Judicial District of Indiana, composed of the counties of Harrison, Crawford and Perry, and he assumed the duties of this office on the first day of the following January, serving for the ensuing four years.

At the present time he is engaged in private practice, a member of the firm of Zenor & Lottick, of Corydon.

In fraternal circles of his district he is well known and highly esteemed, acting as present consul of the local camp of Modern Woodmen of America. He is also a member of the R. & S. fraternity of Central Normal College and president of the Presbyterian Brotherhood of Corydon.

Throughout his career he has consistently labored for the promulgation of Democratic principles, and is active in the counsels of the party, being at this time secretary of the Democratic central committee of Harrison county.

In whatever capacity we view him, Mr. Lottick stands as a conscientious worker, deeply interested in the welfare of the community at large.

WALTER J. LOTZ

A valued member of the legal profession of Indiana and an active worker for the success of the Democratic party since he attained his majority, the name of Walter J. Lotz is a familiar one throughout Lake and Delaware counties.

He was born in the city of Muncie on the 17th day of March, 1880, and here his schooling was received. Following his graduation from the high school with the class of 1899, he entered the Indiana Law School at Indianapolis, receiving his diploma from this institution in 1901. The same year he was admitted to the bar of Delaware county and entered into the active practice of his profession. In 1910, however, he went to Hammond, and there he has continued to advance in the ranks of prominent attorneys of the state.

During the campaigns of 1906 and 1908 he was the Democratic nominee for attorney-general. Mr. Lotz has always been an adherent of the Democratic party, having been taught its principles in youth by his father, Judge O. J. Lotz, ex-judge of the Delaware circuit court, and formerly a member of the appellate court.

Mrs. Lotz, to whom he was married August 25, 1903, was Miss Bessie Bunch, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Robert Bunch, and sister of Mayor Rollin H. Bunch, all of Muncie.

ALBERT LUEDTKE

Mr. Luedtke has served as auditor of Jackson county and has been for many years a leading contractor and builder of southern Indiana, and many buildings and bridges bear evidence of his handiwork.

Albert Luedtke was born on the 29th day of August, 1848. He received his schooling in the schools of his native land, and at the age of seventeen left its shores in a sailing vessel and for seven weeks journeyed westward to America. After his arrival in this country he made his way to the city of Chicago, and here he learned the trade of stone-cutter. In the year 1870 he came to Jackson county and this locality has been the center of his interests.

In the year 1900 he was elected trustee of Carr township, and he discharged the duties of the office with conscientious zeal. In 1912 he was elected auditor of Jackson county, in which capacity, also, he has served the public faithfully and well, his term of office to expire with the close of 1916.

Mrs. Luedtke, to whom he was married in 1869, was formerly Miss Caroline Wright of Indianapolis.

CORNELIUS LUMAREE

The present postmaster of the city of Wabash, Cornelius Lumaree, has been for many years closely identified with the business life of the community, and has come to his present position well qualified for the duties and responsibilities which devolve upon him.

Mr. Lumaree is a native of Wabash county, born in the city of Wabash on the 28th day of September, 1854. On May 16, 1899, he was united in marriage to Miss Lida Leroy and their home was established at Wabash.

For fifteen years Mr. Lumaree was known as a prominent banker of Wabash, and in the past seventeen years he has been in the real estate, loan and insurance business. On March 24, 1914, he assumed the duties of postmaster, and in this work has continued to the present time. He is affiliated with Wabash Commandery No. 37, Knights Templar.

PETER THOMAS LUTHER

Peter Thomas Luther, Brazil, Clay county, Indiana, was born in the state of Indiana, October 18, 1844, on a farm in Harrison township, Clay county, Indiana. Farmed and taught school until twenty-four years old. Married August 29, 1867, to Mary Elizabeth Crist, who was born March 7, 1847, in Lewis township, Clay county. Was educated principally in the common schools of Clay county; attended State University at Bloomington, but did not graduate. Was elected county surveyor of Clay county in October, 1866; served as such two years. Was elected recorder of Clay county in October, 1868; served as such four years. Was nominated in 1872 by the Democrats for clerk of the Clay Circuit Court; with Greeley on the Democrats' back was defeated with the rest of the Democratic ticket. Served as deputy clerk one year, from the fall of 1877 to the fall of 1878, and deputy sheriff two years, from October, 1878, to October, 1880. Lawyer by profession; a member of the law firm of Luther & Luther (Peter T. Luther and William P. Luther, father and son). Lived in Clay county all his life. Has three children living: Mrs. Minnie Luther Barton, of Indianapolis, Indiana; William Pitt Luther and Nellie Luther Weinfeld, both of Brazil, Indiana. Was a delegate to the Democratic state convention from Harrison township, Clay county, January 8, 1868 (and has attended the Democratic state conventions ever since, with very few exceptions), and assisted to nominate Thomas A. Hendricks for governor. Edited the Brazil Weekly Echo, a Democratic newspaper in Brazil, from April, 1875, to the fall of 1877; used the paper in 1876 in support of Tilden and Hendricks for President and Vice-President. Voted the Democratic ticket all his life.

PHILIP LUTZ, JR.

Though still a young man, Philip Lutz, Jr., is well known in Warrick county as one of the leading attorneys at the Boonville bar.

Mr. Lutz is a native of the Hoosier state, born in Boonville on the 28th day of August, 1888. He attended the common and high schools of Boonville, graduating from the latter in 1907. In the same year he entered Indiana University, completing both the literary and law courses, and graduating in 1912. Having been previously admitted to the bar in his home city, Mr. Lutz began the active practice of his profession immediately following graduation with Judge Roscoe Kiper. In 1914 he formed a partnership known as Lutz & Youngblood for the practice of law, which has been highly successful. In his work, Mr. Lutz is known as a man of progressive ideas and unbounded energy, and he possesses a keen insight into complicated questions such as usually come before attorneys for attention.

On the 17th day of June, 1914, his marriage to Miss Lois Vane Ryse, of Decatur county, was solemnized as result of a college romance. In the same year Mr. Lutz was nominated and elected representative to the general assembly from Warrick county, leading the state and local tickets.

While in college and in his home town, Mr. Lutz has taken an active interest in political affairs and social movements. He holds membership in various college clubs, including Delta Sigma Rho, Gamma Eta Gamma, Press Club and others. He is a member of Scottish Rite Masons, Elks, Woodmen of World and Owls.

MARK W. LYDAY

To those who have kept in touch with the career of the brilliant young representative from Vermillion county nothing seems impossible of achievement by him.

He is a native of this county, born on the 14th day of November, 1889. He attended the public schools of Clinton. After completing the common school grades it seemed that his education must stop, but with characteristic energy he set about to earn his way, and by selling papers and shining shoes on the streets of Clinton he was enabled to help defray his expenses through high school, from which he graduated in 1908. The following year he entered Indiana University Law School, but soon left this institution and pursued his legal studies at the Cincinnati Law School.

In the year 1910 he was admitted to the bar of Vermillion county, but it was not until the following year that he entered actively into the practice of the law. In the year 1911 he was appointed deputy prosecuting attorney of the county, and in this capacity served until December 31, 1913, in the meantime being admitted to practice in the supreme and federal courts. In the year 1912 he was elected representative to the state legislature, where he rendered brilliant service in the assembly of 1913. In the fall of 1914 he was re-elected to this position, and again in the assembly of 1915 his activities were notable.

In the year 1914 he was elected city attorney for a term of four years.

In 1913 he was chairman of the city committee, and has at all times been in close touch with the various local organizations. He is also an active member of the Phi Alpha Delta law fraternity; the F. & A. M., Royal Arch Masons, Indianapolis A. & A. Scottish Rite, 32d Degree; Murat Temple, Nobles Mystic Shrine; the I. O. O. F. and B. P. O. Elks.

Mrs. Lyday, to whom he was married December 18, 1912, was formerly Miss HulDAH Tursher.

DR. FRANK P. LYONS

Descended from a line of Democratic ancestors, Dr. Frank P. Lyons has been true to family traditions and is recognized as a party leader in his home town, Flora. He was born October 26, 1852, in Fayette county, and received his early schooling in the schools of Fayette, Henry and Howard counties, later entering Valparaiso University. In 1876 he was married to Miss Julia Billings.

After reading medicine in Kokomo for a time Dr. Lyons attended the Medical College of Indiana and was graduated in 1881. The following year he moved to his present home at Flora, in Carroll county, where he has since held a lucrative medical practice. He was county coroner from 1894 to 1898, and has several times been a member of the school board and town board; is now a member of the Democratic executive committee and county committee, and has often served as delegate to the various conventions of the party. Dr. Lyons is the owner of two farms, director in the First National Bank, an active Mason and is interested in the contracting business.

J. E. MCARDLE, M. D.

J. E. McArdle, M. D., was born in Monroe township, Allen county, Indiana, and has always been a resident of that county. He prepared himself for college at the Monroeville high school, after which he entered the medical department of Indiana University and was graduated with the degree of M. D. from this university in the class of 1907. After graduating, Dr. McArdle spent two years in the hospitals of Ft. Wayne, acquiring practical experience, and then became associated in the practice of medicine with the celebrated Dr. L. P. Drayer. During the years 1912, 1913 and 1914 he served as deputy coroner under Dr. Edward H. Krucz.

Dr. McArdle has taken an active part in Democratic affairs in Allen county and was nominated for county coroner at the Democratic primary, April 3, 1914, his majority being a very flattering one. He was successful in the November election and served two years as coroner of Allen county. He is a member of the Elks, Moose, and the Jefferson club. His father, Peter McArdle, has long been an ardent and faithful Democratic worker in Allen county.

FRANK R. McCARTER

A leader among the workers in the Democratic party in Fulton county is Frank R. McCarter, a native of the county and for many years identified with business and political life of the place.

He was born on the 16th of February, 1872, and received his education in the common schools of Rochester, where he still resides. October 15, 1893, his marriage to Miss Anna M. Gregson was solemnized and their residence established in the home of his childhood.

In the fall of 1910 he was elected treasurer of the county and assumed the duties of this office on the first of the following January, serving for a term of four years. He has for a number of years been an active party worker, serving at one time as county chairman. He is now connected with the First National Bank of Rochester and is widely known among the business element of the city.

PATRICK M. McCARTY

Patrick M. McCarty of Huntington is a man of wide experience with men and affairs and fitted by temperament and training for the high positions which he has held.

Mr. McCarty was born in Huntington on the 22nd day of July, 1862, of Irish parentage, his father and mother having emigrated from County Wexford, Ireland, in the year 1850 and settling in Huntington, which remained their home until death claimed them. The son attended the Catholic schools of Huntington and in 1880 and 1881 completed his studies with the Brothers of the Holy Cross at Lafayette. In 1888 he was elected city marshal and served in that capacity for a term of four years. In 1902 he was elected sheriff of Huntington county for a term of two years. The following year he entered the employ of the Erie Railway Company in the capacity of captain of their detective department, his work being between Chicago and Marion, Ohio. At the expiration of four years in this service he again assumed the duties of sheriff and served another term of two years.

During the session of the Indiana general assembly of 1913 Mr. McCarty was appointed assistant doorkeeper of the senate; and in the fall of the same year he was elected to the highest office within the gift of the people of Huntington, mayor of his home city.

Throughout his career Mr. McCarty has never ceased to labor for the success of the Democratic party and for many years has been influential in the counsels of the organization, acting as county chairman in 1912. He is affiliated with the Knights of Columbus, the Modern Woodmen of America and the B. P. O. Elks; and is an active member of the Commercial Club of Huntington.

On June 26, 1894, Mr. McCarty was united in marriage to Miss Margaret Gorman, of Logansport.

RALPH W. McCONNELL

The gentleman whose name appears at the head of this review is well known in the town of Oxford, Benton county, where he resides, as an active attorney and a broadminded citizen. He is a native of the Hoosier state and was born on the 20th day of November, 1876. In his youth he was married to Miss Lela E. Baum, also a native of Indiana. Mr. McConnell received his education in the schools of his home district, later attending the University of Indiana at Bloomington and finally graduating from the Indiana Law School. He is not an aspirant for political position, but has been for fifteen years a diligent worker in the cause of true Democracy.

ELAM M. McCORD

Elam M. McCord, son of Rev. Elam McCord, a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, and Jane Free-land McCord, was born in Wayne county, Indiana. Afterwards his parents removed to western Indiana and settled in Putnam county; later to Bloomington, where he graduated from the State University. Taught school three years, returned and graduated from the law school. Located in Martinsville. Was elected prosecutor for the Fifteenth judicial circuit in 1884; was again elected for same circuit in 1908; renominated and elected in 1910; again renominated for same office in 1914.

CHESTER ARTHUR McCORMICK

Chester Arthur McCormick has served as state senator from the counties of Jasper, Newton, Starke and White, son of William G. and Mary E. McCormick, was born in Hamlet, Starke county, Indiana, June 29, 1884. He attended the common schools of Starke county, high school (Knox) and normal school, after which he taught several years. He made his own way through school by selling newspapers and acting as local correspondent for several Chicago and Indianapolis papers. While a high school student he wrote and published a book dealing with the history of Starke county. He has also devoted some attention to literary work, some of his contributions having appeared in some of the leading newspapers and magazines.

At the age of 17 he was the author of a poem on the "Hoosier School Master," which was accepted for publication in a large volume on "Indiana Writers." Mr. McCormick served two terms as clerk of North Judson, one year as deputy clerk of the Starke Circuit Court and two terms as secretary of the Democratic county central committee. For the past eight years he has been editor and publisher of the North Judson News, one of the leading weeklies of northern Indiana.

In the fall of 1914 he was elected joint senator from the counties of Jasper, Newton, Starke and White, being the first Democrat to represent that district in a regular session of the legislature, carrying the district by nearly 700, whereas it is normally from 1,800 to 2,800 Republican. Although the youngest member of the senate in the session of 1913, he was the only member to represent as many as four counties. He has the distinction of having carried his town, his township and his county by the highest vote ever accorded to anyone.

He belongs to the K. of P., I. O. O. F., M. W. of A., F. O. E., B. P. O. E., I. O. F. of A., Rebekahs and Royal Neighbors, and the National Editorial Association, Indiana Democratic Editorial Association and the Northern Indiana Editorial Association.

SHULER McCORMICK

Shuler McCormick of Vincennes is known to its citizens as a leading attorney at law and a man of unusual mental attainments.

He is a product of Knox county, having been born within its confines on the 6th day of February, 1886. He attended the public schools of the county, graduating from Vincennes University with the class of 1906. A three years' course in law was then completed in two years at the Cincinnati Law School under the able instruction of Honorable William H. Taft and Judson Harmon. Having received the degree of LL. B. from this institution, he returned to Vincennes to engage in the active practice of his chosen profession, and a lucrative practice was soon established. In the fall of 1910, at the age of twenty-four years, he was elected to the position of prosecuting attorney of the twelfth judicial district, and in this capacity he served from January, 1911, to January, 1913. During this period he established the record of but five felony cases lost out of fifty-six tried.

Since this time he has returned to his practice, and he is now the holder of an enviable position in the legal profession, with offices in the Hellert building.

On the 26th day of November, 1908, he was united in marriage to Miss Edythe Pinkstaff, and two sons have come to brighten their home and lend inspiration for new achievements. These are Charles Donald and Chester Lee.

Mr. McCormick has, since his boyhood, been a constant worker for the cause of Democracy, giving freely of his time during the various campaigns and at all times losing no opportunity to further the principles of the Jeffersonian party.

ERASTUS W. McDANIELS

The incumbent of various positions of responsibility in the public service and a resident of Shelby county since early childhood, Erastus W. McDaniels should be accorded a prominent place in the roster of Shelby county Democracy.

Mr. McDaniels was born in Jasper county, Illinois, on the 28th day of February, 1863; but at the age of four years was brought by his parents to Shelby county, where they located for permanent residence. He attended the common schools of his home district and later entered the Central Normal College of Danville for a full teacher's course, graduating from that institution in the year 1884. Following his graduation he entered the educational field, teaching for a time, and later took up the study of law as a profession.

Admitted to the bar of Shelby county and entering into the active practice of law, later Mr. McDaniels was appointed to the position of county attorney. In this capacity he served for five years, bringing to his work a conscientious zeal and loyalty which placed him high in the esteem of the community at large. He also served as assistant reporter of the supreme court of Indiana, with his office in Indianapolis.

Throughout his career Mr. McDaniels has taken an active interest in the various movements for the improvement of the community at large; and for five years served as secretary of the Shelby county fair association. He is now one of the prominent attorneys of Shelbyville, the senior member of the firm of McDaniels & Rass.

Fraternally, Mr. McDaniels is allied with the B. P. O. Elks, and has been through all the chairs of the I. O. O. F. He also ranks as major in the Patriarchs Militant.

Mrs. McDaniels was Miss Eva Lautz, also of Shelby county.

A. J. McDONALD

Dr. A. J. McDonald is of sturdy Scotch-Irish ancestry. His father was Logan McDonald and his mother Elizabeth Fitzpatrick.

Dr. McDonald was born at Orleans, Indiana, January 16, 1860, and moved with his family to Mitchell at the age of eighteen, where he graduated from the schools. He then taught for one year and entered Louisville Medical College, receiving his degree on March 22, 1882. While studying he won a gold medal for his researches in materia medica and therapeutics.

Dr. McDonald practiced for seven and a half years at Mitchell and in 1889 went to New York and took a post-graduate course at the Polyclinic Hospital. Upon the completion of this course, Dr. McDonald located in Bedford, where he has since practiced and where he is now in the front rank among medical men. He has been for a number of years surgeon for the Monon Railroad and is examiner for a number of life insurance companies. He is a close student and is highly regarded because of his attainments.

Dr. McDonald is a member of the Lawrence County Medical Association, member of the United States Board of Pension Examiners, Indiana State Medical Society and American Medical Association. He is an active supporter of the Democratic party, although he has never aspired for political honors. He is both a York Rite and Scottish Rite Mason and is also a Shriner and an Elk.

On June 26, 1886, Dr. McDonald was united in marriage to Hattie Overman of Mitchell.

MALCOLM A. McDONALD

For many years a pillar of the Democratic party and at one time one of the best-known railroad men in the state, Malcolm A. McDonald needs no introduction to most of our readers.

He was born in Crawfordsville on the 28th day of April, 1848, but during his childhood accompanied his parents to Indianapolis, where his schooling was received. Following his graduation from the high school of this place with the class of 1864 he entered Indiana University, leaving this institution at the close of his junior year, however, to accept a position with the engineering corps of the Indianapolis & St. Louis Railway Co. Later he held the position of traveling auditor for the Indianapolis, Bloomington & Western Railroad, running to Peoria, Illinois; and still later held similar positions with the Texas & Pacific and Wabash railways, after which he rose to the position of general manager of the Pittsburg & Western, the Champaign & Havana, and the Cairo, Vincennes & Chicago roads. In 1891 he retired to his farm near Williamsport, Ind., where he has since resided, making a specialty of Jersey cattle and standard-bred harness horses.

Mr. McDonald was a member of the state board of agriculture for four years, from 1893 to 1897, and also served as president of the Jersey Cattle Breeders' Association of Indiana. In 1903 he was appointed as one of the Indiana commissioners for the St. Louis World's Fair. He has been county chairman of Warren county for eight years. In his youth, also, he served as captain of the Hickory Sprouts, an organization of boys during the campaign of 1860. He is now affiliated with the West Lebanon Lodge, F. and A. M.; the Royal Arch and Knights Templar lodges of Danville, Ill., and the A. A. 32d Degree Chicago Consistory and Madina Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine.

Mr. McDonald has been twice married, his first wife, who was formerly Miss Jessie Scott, and to whom he was married March 31, 1874, having been called by death January 6, 1879. On the 30th day of November, 1881, his marriage to Miss Miriam Noble was solemnized, and she has since presided over his home.

His five sons and one daughter are all Democrats.

DR. MORDECAI M. McDOWELL

A physician of note, a distinguished legislator, a successful stock-breeder and agriculturist, father of the city's mayor, and withal a citizen of unusual worth was the gentleman whose name appears at the head of this article, Dr. Mordecai M. McDowell, of Vincennes.

He was born in Jefferson county, Ohio, on the 10th day of March, 1845, and accompanied his parents to Indiana in infancy. School facilities at that period being limited, he was deprived of early schooling, but with brave determination acquired for himself an education by studying at odd moments and at night. While but a boy he entered the army, in the year 1862, serving in Company G, 13th Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, and participating in several important engagements. He was at Appamattox Court House when Lee surrendered. The years following the war were spent in the study of medicine in the office of his father. In 1867 he entered the Medical College of Louisville and the following year received his degree from this institution and entered into the active practice of his profession.

In 1878 he graduated from the Hospital College of Medicine of Louisville.

In the year 1887 he was appointed to fill the unexpired term of the county sheriff, whom death had called; the following year was elected to this office for a two-year term and re-elected in 1890. In 1906 he was elected state senator from Knox and Sullivan counties, and in the assemblies which followed rendered distinguished service, being chairman of several important committees and active in the general affairs of the body.

He was an extensive landowner, holding nearly nine hundred acres of fine Knox county ground, stocked with fine stock, notably light harness horses, his reputation as a breeder of these animals being national.

Fraternally, he was allied with the Free and Accepted Masons, Royal Arch Masons, Knights Templar, B. P. O. Elks, the Knox County Medical Society and the Indiana State Medical Association.

Mrs. McDowell was formerly Miss Sarah B. McConnell, to whom he was married September 29, 1870, and she was an able second in all his undertakings. On the 8th day of November, 1913, death called him, but many friends are left to revere his memory. His son, Dr. James D. McDowell, was mayor of the city of Vincennes from 1910 to 1914.

JOHN A. MCFARLAND

John A. McFarland, proprietor of a leading grocery of Rensselaer, is well known also as a prominent worker in the ranks of the Democratic party. He was born in the State of Kentucky on the 25th day of March, 1852, but at the age of ten years accompanied his mother to Indiana (his father having enlisted in the Union army), settling in Parke county. Here he remained until the year 1884, at which time he came to Jasper county.

His education was received during his boyhood in the public schools of his district, and later continued at Wabash College, and finally a course was taken at the Central Normal College of Danville.

On the 8th day of September, 1881, he was united in marriage to Miss Mary A. Hendrix.

In the year 1887 he assumed the duties of trustee of Jordan township and continued in this capacity for a term of two years; and he has since that time served as treasurer of the Democratic central committee of the county and chairman of the city Democratic committee. He has also been a candidate for sheriff, clerk of the circuit court, mayor and alderman of the city of Rensselaer.

JOHN S. McFADDIN

John S. McFaddin, a prominent member of the legal profession of the state, is a product of Parke county, his birth having occurred at Rockville, May 21, 1869. He attended the schools of Rockville and graduated from the high school in 1887. Later his studies were pursued at Wabash College, from which he graduated in 1891, receiving the degree of B. S. and later the degree of M. A. February 3, 1892, he was admitted to the bar and entered upon the practice of law. In 1896 he was a candidate for prosecutor of the 47th circuit, and the following year was appointed county attorney, a position which he held until the year 1900. In 1904 he was the Democratic candidate for circuit judge for the 47th judicial circuit, but was defeated. Two years later he became a member of the Rockville school board and served until 1913, during which time the new high school building was erected and the present standard of the schools established. He is a member of the board of trustees of the State Tuberculosis Hospital, and in this work his interest and his sympathies are deeply enlisted.

Politically, he has been one of the most active workers in the ranks of Indiana Democracy. At the Democratic state conventions for the years 1906, 1908 and 1910 he was a member of the committees which drafted the state platforms, and in 1912 was delegate from the Fifth district to the national convention at Baltimore. In the year 1908 he was offered the appointment of judge of the Parke and Vermilion circuit courts, but this honor was declined, and recently on the creation of the new separate circuit for Parke county he declined to consider the appointment as judge.

On the 15th day of January, 1896, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Cora Mehurien, and their home has been blessed with three sons and a daughter.

Fraternally, he is allied with the I. O. O. F., Knights of Pythias, Modern Woodmen and different Masonic bodies, including the Knights Templar, Scottish Rite Masons and Mystic Shrine. He is president of the Indiana Alumni Association of the Phi Kappa Psi college fraternity.

THOMAS H. McGEORGE, JR.

One of the most widely known and most highly respected citizens of the city of Covington is Thomas H. McGeorge, Jr., not alone by virtue of the offices he has held, but because of his accomplishments in the business, fraternal and political affairs of the community and the active part he has taken in forwarding the various movements for the growth and development of his home city and of Fountain county.

Mr. McGeorge was born in Covington on the 19th day of August, 1868, and received his education in the public schools of that place. On the 30th day of December, 1891, he was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Slattery, and together they have won a large circle of friends.

In the year 1894 Mr. McGeorge was elected city clerk, which position he held until 1906. In the fall of 1909 he was elected mayor by a very large majority, his term of office expiring in 1913, at which time he was re-elected for a further term of four years. Since he attained his majority he has taken an active part in politics, and in 1914 was delegate to the state Democratic convention. He has for many years dealt in farm machinery, vehicles and harness, and holds the position of president of the Tri-State Implement and Vehicle Dealers' Association. He is also president of the Young Men's Commercial club and a director in the Covington Fair Association; and is affiliated with the I. O. O. F., Knights of Pythias, Order of Ben Hur and F. and A. M.

WILLIAM A. MCLVAINE

The career of William A. McIlvaine, who has occupied the position of superintendent of police of the city of Muncie, has been a varied one and his versatility has been thoroughly demonstrated.

He was born in Zanesville, Ohio, on the 14th day of February, 1852, and his education was received in the public schools of this place. Here, also, on the 3rd day of August, 1870, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Rosa Berry and their home established.

He came to Muncie in 1892 as a puddler in the Darnell rolling mill and was selected as a patrolman on the Muncie police force in 1893, and one year later was promoted to captain of police.

In 1914 he resigned from the force to enter in business for himself.

On February 1, 1910, he was again appointed captain of the police department, and on February 14, 1914, was promoted to the office of superintendent.

ANDREW V. MCKAMEY

A valued worker in the ranks of the Democracy of Putnam county is Andrew V. McKamey of Cloverdale.

Mr. McKamey is a native of the Hoosier state, born on a farm in Putnam county on the 4th day of December, 1863. He attended the common schools of his district, and later continued his studies at the normal school at Danville. Leaving this institution, however, he entered the normal at Ladoga, and here his studies were completed.

On the 16th day of September, 1886, his marriage to Miss Ida M. Hood of Cloverdale was solemnized, and their home was established on a farm three miles east of Cloverdale, where they resided until 1895, at which time they moved to Cloverdale.

In the year 1894 he was elected assessor of Cloverdale township, and in this capacity served for six years. On the 2nd day of February, 1914, he received from President Wilson the appointment to the position of postmaster of Cloverdale for a term of four years. Mr. McKamey is an old-line Democrat, and stanchly adheres to the principles of Jefferson.

BEN F. MCKEY

To the citizens of Boone county, the name of Mr. Ben F. McKey needs no introduction, being that of a life-long citizen of this community and the editor of the leading paper of Lebanon for many years.

Mr. McKey is a native Hoosier, born in Montgomery county, near the town of Darlington, on the 5th day of December, 1857. In his early childhood, however, he accompanied his parents to Boone county, where they located; and here his schooling was received in the common schools of the county.

Early in life he became interested in the newspaper field, and on the first day of January, 1889, assumed control of the Lebanon Pioneer, as editor and publisher. In the years which have since intervened, Mr. McKey has met with continued success in this work, and his paper has become known as one of clearly defined principles, conservative in expression and far removed from the theories of so-called "yellow journalism."

Politically, he has been a stanch adherent to the tenets of the Democratic party, and has been of highly valued service to the local organization in the various campaigns through which he has passed.

Mr. McKey has been twice married, his first wife, to whom he was married March 31, 1881, having been formerly Miss Jennie Dyson. On the 28th day of April, 1902, death deprived him of the companionship of this lady; and on the 14th day of July, 1904, was solemnized his marriage to Mrs. Phronia B. Shaw.

DANIEL E. MCKINZIE

A prominent worker in the Democratic party since he cast his first vote for Cleveland in 1882, Daniel F. McKinzie has won for himself a wide acquaintance and many friends throughout the community. His birth occurred on the 27th day of March, 1863, in Dearborn county, fourteen miles east of Aurora. His education was received in the schools of Center township and Aurora, and he has since been prominently identified with the business life of this city, engaging at various times in the livery, ice and restaurant business. In the year 1910 he was a candidate for sheriff, being defeated by the narrow margin of 98 votes; but in 1914 he was chosen for this responsible position with a majority of 738 at the primary, and at the general election in November he received the flattering majority of 976, having the distinction of leading his ticket.

He was married in 1886 to Miss Ella Cox and is affiliated with the order of Eagles and the Royal Arcanum.

HENRY DEWITT McLALLEN

A representative citizen of Whitley county, and one of her loyal Democratic workers, is Mr. Henry DeWitt McLallen.

He is a native Hoosier, born in Whitley county on the 3rd day of January, 1870. Here, in the public schools of his district, his schooling was received, his graduation from the High School of Columbia City occurring in the year 1887. A course of study was then pursued at the Indiana State University at Bloomington.

On the 2nd day of September, 1896, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Mabel Liggett, and she has since presided over his home and dispensed its hospitality.

For many years Mr. McLallen has been closely identified with the business life of Columbia City, and now holds the position of vice-president of the First National Bank and secretary of the Provident Trust Company of that place. He is also a director in several manufacturing corporations of importance in the twelfth district.

Although a staunch adherent to Democratic principles, and a loyal worker for the cause, Mr. McLallen has never asked or accepted any favors from the party.

J. C. McMULLAN

One of the most active party workers in Tipton county is J. C. McMullan, a leading undertaker and furniture dealer of Kempton.

Mr. McMullan was born August 21, 1860, on a farm one mile west of Arcadia, in Hamilton county. Here he attended common schools, and early in life engaged in the pursuit of agriculture. On the 11th day of January, 1890, however, he came to Kempton and engaged in his present business, and here he has been an active factor in the business life of the town.

On the 26th day of November, 1888, he was united in marriage to Miss Lula Rodenbeck, and she has since presided over his home and been his faithful assistant.

Politically, he has been an active Democratic worker, serving on the election board for more than twenty years, and acting as delegate to various conventions. He is allied with the fraternal orders of Masons, Odd Fellows and Modern Woodmen.

JAMES R. McREYNOLDS

James R. McReynolds, more familiarly known to the citizens of Kokomo as "Bob" McReynolds, has for many years been closely identified with the workings of the Democratic organization in that section. He was born in Tipton county on the 7th day of August, 1858. Upon leaving the common school he took a normal course. His first vote was cast in Tipton county. He later moved to Howard county, residing in Harrison township. In the year 1886 he was elected trustee of that township, a position which he filled with much credit to himself and his constituents. Later he made the race for county sheriff, and was defeated by the Republican nominee by only 850 votes, and this in strong Republican territory.

Mr. McReynolds married Miss Rachel S. Pence.

PHILIP L. MACKLIN

Philip Macklin was born in Adams county, Indiana, on the 2nd day of June, 1882. Here his childhood was spent, and his education was received largely in the schools of the county. After his graduation from the common schools, he attended the normal school at Valparaiso, Indiana. On the 12th day of September, 1904, he was married to Miss Lola Jackson. Later he became engaged in the clothing business in Decatur, and was soon prominently identified with the business life of the community. He has at all times been an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party, and on the first of January, 1913, he assumed the duties of county surveyor of Adams county.

GEORGE MACOMBER

George Macomber, superintendent of the Masonic Home at Franklin, is a native of the state of Pennsylvania, his birth having occurred in that state on the 2nd day of December, 1869. He attended the public schools of his home district, and later continued his studies at the State Normal School in Shippensburg, Pa. This was followed by a course at the State College, at Belfonte, Pa.

In the year 1894, after having engaged in educational work in his home state, Mr. Macomber came to Indiana to accept a position as instructor in the Indiana Boys' School at Plainfield, and in this work he remained for twelve years. During this period he was chosen superintendent of a state institution in Missouri.

In the year 1908 he returned to Indiana and was elected treasurer of Hendricks county, breaking into a Republican stronghold and being the first Democrat ever elected to this position in that community. So ably did he administer the affairs of the office and with such conscientious zeal did he labor that he was re-elected in 1912 with an increased majority for a further term of two years.

On November 2, 1899, Mr. Macomber was united in marriage to Miss Mattie E. York, of Hendricks county.

FRANCIS W. MACOUGHTRY

Few citizens of Fountain county are so well known as Francis W. Macoughtry, who for many years has occupied various positions of responsibility in the service of the commonwealth, and has served with distinction and credit to himself and his constituents in whatever capacity he has been found.

Mr. Macoughtry was born in what is now West Virginia, May 18, 1842. Bereft by death of his father in infancy he was brought to Indiana at the age of seven years by his mother, who married James Hamilton of Warren county, and their home was established in West Lebanon, where the boy Francis attended his first school. Later his studies were continued in the public schools at Waveland.

In the summer of 1862, Mr. Macoughtry enlisted in the 86th Indiana Volunteer Regiment, going to the front with Company E, from Warren county, and served in the army of the Cumberland under Generals Buell and Rosecrans. He received his discharge before the close of the war on account of ill health. On the 23rd of May, 1871, he was married to Miss Rachel Plowman, but death deprived him of his companion in January, 1901. On October 22, 1913, he married Miss Frances Petit, who is now the mistress of his home.

In 1882 Mr. Macoughtry was elected to the position of city councilman of Attica, and two years later became mayor of that city. In 1890 he was elected clerk of the Fountain circuit court, and was appointed postmaster of Attica, February 28, 1914. He has attended most of the county, state and national conventions since 1872, and served six times as county chairman of Fountain county Democracy. Mr. Macoughtry has been an active Mason since 1869.

BERNARD M. MADDEN

The lately retiring treasurer of the city of Alexandria has been for a number of years the incumbent of various positions of trust in the service of the community and also of the Democratic organization of the county.

Bernard M. Madden was born in Rushville on the 29th day of January, 1871. In the public and parochial schools he received his schooling, and at an early age learned the trade of marble cutting. This trade he followed in Rush county and later in Connersville, until the spring of 1897, when he located in Alexandria and entered into the grocery business with his father. Later he also conducted a meat market.

Since the days of his youth Mr. Madden has been active politically and has served the party as precinct committeeman and secretary of the township committee. In the year 1906 he was elected councilman-at-large and in that capacity served till 1910, when he assumed the duties of city clerk, for a four-year term. At the expiration of this period he was elected city treasurer, his term expiring in 1918. He is affiliated with the order of Elks.

H. A. MAKER

H. A. Maker was born in Hamilton county, Indiana, July 21, 1864. He was born in the same house in which his mother was born twenty-five years before, and still stands the same place as one of the interesting landmarks of the county. He is the son of Seth R. and Nancy J. (Hamble) Maker, and was reared on a farm, later attending Central Normal College, where he was a classmate of Governor Samuel M. Ralston, Judge Edward W. Felt, Thomas Duncan, E. E. Barrett and other good Democrats.

After leaving school Mr. Maker taught for a time and then returned to the farm, where he remained until the death of his father, removing to Noblesville in 1907. Mr. Maker is best known for his literary productions, especially the writing of poems of worth, and gave up the study of law to give most of his time to this work. He was a member of the Western Association of writers during the life of that organization. He for some time was secretary of the Hamilton County Historical Association and is generally regarded as the best informed man in the county on local history.

Mr. Maker delivered the closing exercise of the Western Association of Writers—the selection follows:

"OF THE MAKING OF BOOKS THERE IS NO END"

(To Charles Eugene Banks, President Western Association of Writers)

"Of the making of books there is no end;"

Since the very moment when time began

With a master hand to mix and blend

Material things as time but can,—

Wherever we search the infinite span,

The hand of nature the facts extend,

To clearly prove to the mind of man,

"Of the making of books there is no end."

"Of the making of books there is no end;"

The very hills with their strata lines,

And their deep ravines that downward wend

Through ragged shrubs and tangled vines,

Past stately oaks and slender pines,

With their tuneful birds, for aye contend

With an eloquence more than of great divines,

"Of the making of books there is no end."

"Of the making of books there is no end;"

As the soft sweet summer breezes blow,

Making the trees to wave and bend

And their shades on the green sward come and go,

Or their picture change in the lake below,—

Each several change doth a page append
 To the world of books, to clearly show
 "Of the making of books there is no end."

"Of the making of books there is no end;"
 When the frost king reigns, and the winter snows
 In their mighty majesties descend,
 And their mantle white o'er the whole scene throws,
 Bringing man and beast the train of woes
 That ever upon their wake attend,
 All reveal the truth, and the fact disclose,
 "Of the making of books there is no end."

"Of the making of books there is no end;"
 Each one that inhabits this earthly sphere,
 With a fervor he scarce can comprehend,
 As he lives through each succeeding year
 And adds new phases to his career,
 With his every act doth outward send
 The evidence proving, full and clear,
 "Of the making of books there is no end."

"Of the making of books there is no end;"
 As time elapses from age to age,
 And the eras that go in their turns append
 To history's bulk another page,
 Dispensing more light to savant and sage,—
 "To the ending doom" they ever bend
 Their tale to proclaim at every stage,
 "Of the making of books there is no end."

"Of the making of books there is no end;"
 And when we have passed to the end of time,
 To the place where our souls in *Akasa blend,
 Or enter oblivion's sphere sublime,
 Or wander athwart some ethereal clime,—
 Methinks some tone will there attend,
 And proclaim more loudly than this poor rhyme,
 "Of the making of books there is no end."

November 25th, 1904.

Akasa* is an untranslated and untranslatable Sanskrit word. Its nearest English equivalent is "ether." It differs from ether in the fact that ether is atomic, while Akasa is not.

R. H. MALONE

R. H. Malone has been for many years a resident of Alexandria and actively identified with the business and political affairs of the place. He served as city clerk—making a record for business administration.

He was born in Alexandria on the 13th day of October, 1885, and received his education in the public schools of his district. Early in life he entered the employ of the American Plate Glass Co., and here he remained for a number of years, later forming a connection with the Lippincott Glass Co. where he served as timekeeper for six years.

Since attaining his majority he has been an active worker for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy and was at various times delegate to the county conventions of the party. In the fall of 1913 he was elected city clerk of Alexandria, assuming the duties of office on the first day of the following January, his term of service to expire in 1918.

GOLDEN DAVID MANN

Golden David Mann, one of the active party workers of South Bend, is a native of that section of the state and was born on the 2nd day of July, 1884. He attended the public schools of South Bend and at an early age became an enthusiastic worker for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy. On March 31, 1904, he was united in marriage to Miss Blanche Norris and established his home in South Bend, where he since has resided.

Mr. Mann is the proprietor of a thriving cigar store and pocket billiard hall, and has a wide acquaintance in local business circles. He is an active worker in the ranks of the party and has rendered valued service to the local organization.

CURTIS MARSHALL

Curtis Marshall, former prosecuting attorney of the fifth judicial district and prominent attorney of Jefferson county, was born in the state of Kentucky on the 10th day of March, 1868. At the age of three years he was brought by his parents to Jefferson county, and here he was reared and his interests have centered. He attended the schools of his district, later continuing his studies at Paris Academy, from which he graduated in the year 1885. He taught school and in 1895 he was admitted to the bar and entered into the active practice of the law, and in this profession he has demonstrated marked capability.

Since attaining his majority he has labored zealously for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy in his section of the state, in 1902 serving as chairman of the county committee. In 1904 he held not only this position but that of chairman of the city committee of Madison as well. Throughout ten campaigns he was a member of the central committee, giving freely of his time and energy to further the work. During the period from June 1, 1897, to June 1, 1900, and again from May 15, 1907, to January 1, 1912, discharged the duties of school trustee of the city of Madison; then he became prosecuting attorney of the 5th judicial circuit, which position he continued to hold until his term of office expired, January 1, 1916. In the year 1914 he was nominated for judge of this district, but declined in the interest of party harmony to make the race.

On September 1, 1914, Mr. Marshall was happily married to Miss Daisy Ernst of Madison, and they live in a modest but beautiful little home on West Main street in that city.

JOHN MARSHALL

The element of youthful workers in the ranks of the Democratic party of Kokomo has found a valuable recruit in the person of John Marshall; for, when but three years out of college, he reached a position of influence in the party counsels and in 1914 was candidate for prosecuting attorney of Howard county.

Mr. Marshall was born in Cass county on the 8th of July, 1888, and in that locality received the foundation of his education, attending the public schools of his district and graduating from the high school in the year 1907. At the age of twenty-two he established his residence in Kokomo, at the same time attending the State University at Bloomington, from which he was graduated with the class of 1912. While there he became affiliated with the Gamma Eta Gamma fraternity.

Since his graduation Mr. Marshall has taken an active interest in political and municipal affairs, and is particularly zealous for the promotion of movements for the public good.

John Marshall, after graduating in law with the class of 1912 from the State University at Bloomington, Ind., entered into the practice of law at Montpelier, Ind., in the year 1912, under the firm name of Jump & Marshall. The firm of Jump & Marshall consists of Forrest E. Jump and John Marshall. They moved their law offices to the city of Kokomo in March, 1913, and John Marshall has since that time been engaged in the practice of law under this firm name until July, 1918, at which time he enlisted in the military service and was in France, a private in the 325th Field Artillery, 84th Division. He still retains his interest in the law firm of Jump & Marshall.

THOMAS RILEY MARSHALL

There have been other men elected to the office of Vice-President of the United States from Indiana, but Thomas Riley Marshall was the first native of the State to hold that position. His grandfather, Riley Marshall, was one of the early settlers and his father, Dr. Daniel M. Marshall, was born near Winchester, in Randolph county, March 5, 1823. The grandfather, Thomas Marshall, was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, and a cousin of Chief Justice Marshall. He came to Indiana from Greenbrier county, Virginia, and after some years' residence in Randolph county, located in Grant county, where he served as county clerk from 1832 to 1838.

After the usual course in the common schools, Daniel M. Marshall began reading medicine with Dr. J. S. Shively, of Marion, and then went to Rush Medical College, where he graduated in 1845. He entered the practice in Northern Indiana, and remained there with the exception of a brief sojourn in Missouri, before the Civil war. His anti-slavery views made him unpopular there, and he returned to his state, where he acquired an extensive practice in several counties. He finally located at Columbia City, where he died October 13, 1892, survived by the wife of his youth. Her maiden name was Martha E. Patterson, and she was a descendant of the Carrolls, of Carrollton.

Dr. and Mrs. Marshall had two children, a son and a daughter, the latter now deceased. The son, Thomas Riley, was born at North Manchester, Wabash county, March 14, 1854. He attended the public schools, and then entered Wabash College, from which he graduated in 1873, with the degree of B. A. He then located at Fort Wayne, and began reading law with Judge Walter Olds, later of the supreme bench of Indiana. He was admitted to the bar on his twenty-first birthday, and began practicing at Columbia City, being successful in the law from the start. He formed a partnership with W. F. McNagny and P. H. Clugston, and the firm of Marshall, McNagny & Clugston became known as one of the strongest in northern Indiana, Mr. Marshall attaining notable rank as a jury lawyer.

Mr. Marshall's appearance in public life was somewhat meteoric. He was a Democrat from principle, and always took an interest in politics, but without aspiration for office. In 1880 he was induced to take the nomination for prosecuting attorney in a hopelessly Republican district, and was defeated as a matter of course. He was in demand as a campaign speaker, and rendered material service in that way. From 1896 to 1898 he served as chairman of the Democratic committee for the 12th Congressional District. In 1908 the active candidates for the Democratic nomination for Governor were Samuel M. Ralston and L. Ert Slack. Mr. Marshall announced himself as a candidate, but made no active canvass for the nomination.

In the convention Ralston had the lead, but could not command enough votes to nominate; and after several ballots he withdrew, and his supporters went to Marshall, nominating him for Governor. The campaign which followed was exciting and peculiar, state issues having an unusual force in a presidential year. The Republicans nominated Congressman James E. Watson for Governor. The presidential candidates were Taft and Bryan. Taft carried the state by 348,993, to Bryan's 338,262; but Marshall defeated Watson by 348,849, to 334,040. The only other Democrats elected on the state ticket were J. Frank Hall for Lieutenant-Governor, with a plurality of 1,672, and Robert J. Aley for Superintendent of Public Instruction, with a plurality of 762. The Democrats carried the House of Representatives, but the Republicans had enough hold-over senators to make the Senate Republican.

This victory, after a long period of Republican rule, indicated a remarkable personal popularity for Governor Marshall; and his administration was apparently popular, for in 1910 the Democrats carried the state by more than 12,000, electing a legislature that was Democratic in both branches. By this time, Governor Marshall had become impressed with the necessity of amendments of the constitution of Indiana, and with the impossibility of amendment in the manner prescribed by it. There are a number of amendments that have been held to be in effect by the Supreme Court, but no one of them was adopted by "a majority of the electors of the state," as required by the constitution. They were sustained on the legal fiction that when voted on at a special election the court has no means of knowing that there were more voters in the state than voted at the election; and yet the court takes judicial notice of general elections, and at the general election preceding the "adoption" of each of these amendments there were more than twice as many votes cast as were cast for the amendment.

In 1911 there was a special complication arising from the fact that the court had held that when an amendment was submitted to the people, and was not rejected, but failed for lack of a constitutional majority, it was still "pending" and might be voted on at the next election. The constitution provided that when one or more amendments were "pending" no other amendment should be introduced; and at that time "the lawyers' amendment" had been voted on several times, and was still pending under this rule. But the Supreme Court had also said: "The people of the state may form an original constitution, or abrogate an old one and form a new one at any time, without any political restriction except the constitution of the United States." (State vs. Swift, 69 Ind. 505.) And this accords with the express declaration of the constitution itself, that "the people have, at all times, an indefeasible right to alter and reform their government."

As is generally understood, most constitutional provisions are not self-operating; and provision for their operation is a legislative function. For example, it is provided that "all elections shall be free and equal," but elections could not be held at all unless a law provided for their conduct. Governor Marshall adopted the idea of the legislature's submitting a new constitution to the people for adoption; and the legislature passed a law for that purpose. The reactionary forces of the state were at once aroused; and it must be apparent to anyone, by this time, that there are very strong influences in Indiana opposed to any change in the constitution that is beneficial to the public. An injunction was obtained to prevent the submission of the question to the people.

The Supreme Court sustained this ruling that the legislature could not submit to the people a question which the constitution provided the people alone could decide, and which they had at all times an indefeasible right to decide. (Ellingham vs. Dye, 178 Ind. 336.) Governor Marshall appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, on the ground that our Supreme Court was destroying our republican form of government by usurping and obstructing legislative powers. The Supreme Court of the United States did not decide the question, but dismissed the case on the ground that Governor Marshall appealed in his official capacity, and not as a private individual, who claimed that he had been injured by the decision. (Marshall, Governor, vs. Dye, 231 U. S. 250.)

The violence of the opposition to "the Tom Marshall constitution," as it was called, advertised Governor Marshall throughout the land, for it was denounced by the capitalistic press everywhere. But the denunciation was confined chiefly to the mode of submission, for although the real objection was to the proposed changes, they were of a character that made open criticism inadvisable. The chief one was for the purification of the suffrage. Indiana had been disgraced by election frauds for years, and Governor Marshall saw that the only remedy was in the qualification of voters. The constitution allows aliens to vote—even alien enemies. It has no restrictions of education or payment of taxes. It throws the door wide open to the purchasable class of voters; and the proposed changes corrected these evils.

But the violence of the opposition was a recommendation to intelligent and progressive voters everywhere; and it gave Governor Marshall a national standing as a broad-minded, progressive man, and a man of courage and originality. It was the chief factor in causing the Indiana Democracy to present his name as a candidate for the Presidency in 1912, and in causing the national convention of that year to select him as the running mate for Woodrow Wilson. Their triumphant election in that year, and re-election in 1916, as well as Mr. Marshall's thoroughly acceptable service as Vice-President are well known matters of national history.

On October 2, 1895, Mr. Marshall was married to Miss Lois I. Kimsey, of Angola, Ind., whose grace and tact have added greatly to his success in the social relations of official life. She, also, is of an old Indiana family. Her grandfather, Dr. Joseph C. Kimsey, was one of the earliest and most successful practitioners of northeastern Indiana. Her father, William E. Kimsey, was born in Allen county in 1851, and later removed to Angola, where he became one of the leading citizens of Steuben county, and served as clerk of the county from 1891 to 1895. Mr. and Mrs. Marshall have no children of their own, but are much devoted to an adopted child.

Vice-President Marshall is a consistent Presbyterian, and has served for years as a trustee of Wabash College. He has always retained his interest in the Phi Beta Kappa fraternity, and is a Scottish Rite Mason. He is a popular platform speaker, a great reader, and an agreeable conversationalist. His personal qualities have given him the successes that have placed him among the notable men of Indiana.

VALENTINE A. MATTERN

Valentine A. Mattern, a prominent citizen of Wabash, was born in Wabash county, Indiana, August 23, 1858, the son of a Bavarian who emigrated to America and settled in Indiana.

On the 18th day of October, 1880, Mr. Mattern was united in marriage to Miss Caroline Lauzer. Three years later he became connected with the general merchandise firm of J. W. Busick & Son, and at the expiration of four years entered the firm of Young & Herring, grocers. Later he became interested in the dry goods business and in 1894 became a member of the firm of Connor, Mattern & Connor, jewelers. Six years later this concern embarked in the dry goods business and eventually, the firm dissolving partnership, Mr. Mattern and his brother became the proprietors of the dry goods business. In 1905 Mr. Mattern became the sole proprietor and in 1913 his son, Cecil H. Mattern, became a partner and the name of the firm was changed to V. A. Mattern & Son.

Mr. Mattern was a member of the city hospital board for two years, for some time a member of the Wabash school board, and has served as precinct committeeman since 1902. He is a member of the orders of Elks, Knights of Pythias, Maccabees and Foresters. He is widely known throughout the county as a member of the firm of Mattern & Tomson, breeders of Chester White hogs.

THEODORE T. MARTIN

Mr. Martin served for a number of years as superintendent of schools of Hendricks county; is a man eminently fitted for the position, combining tact and culture with progressive ideas and a desire for the best methods in his work.

Theodore T. Martin was born in Orange county, August 25, 1882. He attended the public schools and graduated from the high school of Danville. His studies were later continued at the Central Normal College, and finally a course was taken at the state normal at Terre Haute, from which he graduated with the class of 1909. Since boyhood he has evinced an interest in educational affairs, and engaged in teaching for a number of years prior to his election, in June, 1911, to the responsibilities of his present office.

He is a life-long Democrat, having cast his first vote for William J. Bryan and has served as delegate to a number of state conventions. He is affiliated with the Masonic order and a member of the Methodist church.

His marriage to Miss Marie Osborn was solemnized in the year 1906.

EDGAR MAUCK

Edgar Mauck, a leading citizen of Gibson county, was born at Owensville on the 4th day of January, 1854. His forebears were of Irish-German, Revolutionary stock and settled in Indiana at Mauckport, Harrison county, in 1801.

His education was received in the public schools of Princeton until he completed the high school course, after which he attended the State Normal School at Terre Haute. Immediately thereafter he began his work in the educational field, teaching school in the winter and working on the farm in summer, continuing in this manner for fifteen years.

On the 4th day of April, 1883, he was united in marriage to Miss Angeline Fitzgerald, of Poseyville, Posey county, and she has remained his faithful helpmate. They have three children.

In 1908 he was elected county treasurer, and re-elected in 1910, being one of the few Democrats elected in twenty years in Gibson county. He is a member of the county fair association, director in Princeton commercial club and a member I. O. O. F. At present Mr. Mauck is chairman of the Gibson county Democratic central committee. He resides on a splendid farm five miles east of Princeton.

GEORGE ALVA MAXEY

George Alva Maxey is an old-line Democrat, descended from Democratic ancestors, and the son of a Union soldier, his father having fought four years in the Union army.

Mr. Maxey was born in Marshall county, Indiana, on the 8th day of November, 1854. His education was received in the common schools of Pulaski and Marshall counties, where his childhood was spent. In the year 1877 he located permanently in Marshall county, and here he has since remained and his business and social interests are centered.

On the 16th day of May, 1880, his marriage to Miss Rachel A. Barr was solemnized, and she has since been the presiding genius of his home.

Mr. Maxey has always taken a deep interest in affairs of the commonwealth, and has rendered valuable service to the Democratic party in his section by stanchly adhering to its tenets and endeavoring at all times to further its principles. In the fall of 1910 he was elected county treasurer on this ticket, and assumed the duties of office on the first day of January, 1912, being again elected in November of 1912, his second term expiring December 31, 1915.

THOMAS S. MEEKER

A prominent citizen of the city of Indianapolis and closely identified with its financial and political affairs, Thomas Meeker is also known as a loyal worker for the cause of Democracy.

Thomas S. Meeker was born in New Albany, Indiana, on the first day of June, 1880, and there his boyhood was spent, attending the public schools of the place. Later, however, he accompanied his parents to St. Louis and his education was continued in the high school there, from which he was graduated in the year 1898. Later he came to Indianapolis and here his friendships have since been largely formed and his business interests established. He is now the president of the Meeker Hotel Company and is a stockholder in the Continental National Bank of this city.

Mr. Meeker has been an adherent of Democratic principles since childhood, having come from a long line of prominent Democrats and having the tenets of Jefferson instilled into his mind from childhood. He is a nephew of James H. Rice and of former Treasurer of State James B. Ryan.

In the year 1910 Mr. Meeker organized the Old Hickory Club, of which he is now president, an organization which has contributed largely to the success of the party in this section. He is also an active member of the B. P. O. Elks, the Ancient Order of Hibernians and the Indianapolis Academy of Music.

On the 17th day of November, 1909, Mr. Meeker was united in marriage to Miss Nellie Jordan, and a little son, Thomas, Jr., is now an important member of the household.

WILLIAM MELCHIOR

Mr. Melchior was county superintendent of schools of Dubois county for a number of years, bringing to his work a broad-minded, progressive spirit, combined with learning, culture and a wide experience in the needs of the human mind.

William Melchior is a native of the Hoosier state, born on the 6th day of November, 1869. He attended the public schools of Jasper, his present home, and after graduating from the schools of this place, continued his studies at Indiana University, later taking a course at Purdue University. He taught for 14 years, in three different states. He traveled extensively and lived for four years on the Pacific coast.

On the 29th day of June, 1903, Mr. Melchior was united in marriage to Miss Nellie Beck, and they have since continued their residence in the home of his childhood, the town of Jasper. In the same year, he was elected county superintendent of schools of Dubois county, and since assuming the duties of his position, has worked zealously and conscientiously to give to the youthful minds of his community the best instruction to be obtained; continually seeking for improved methods and instilling within them the progressive spirit demanded by their time. His term of office expired in August, 1917.

During the years 1907 and 1909 he served as secretary and treasurer of the County Superintendents' Association of Indiana; and notwithstanding the arduous duties of his office, found time to serve the Democratic party as secretary of the Democratic county central committee in the years 1904, 1906 and 1908.

ALBERT E. MELCHING

The gentleman whose photo accompanies this article has been for nearly three score years a resident of the city of Fort Wayne, and is known and respected by a host of friends throughout the county. The birth of Mr. Melching occurred on the 17th day of March, 1885, in Mahoning county, Ohio; but while but a year old his parents came to Fort Wayne, then but a village, and here the son grew to manhood, being closely identified with the growth and business life of the place. His education was received in St. Paul's Lutheran school.

On the 17th day of November, 1878, he was united in marriage to Miss Carrie Engelking, and together they have drawn about them a circle of devoted friends.

Always a zealous worker in the ranks of the Democratic party, he was elected in 1896 to the position of sheriff of Allen county, serving in this capacity for a term of four years, administering the affairs of the position in a conscientious, conservative manner. He was also city chairman 1905-1909, and is at present committeeman of the 5th precinct, 2nd ward.

Mr. Melching has for fourteen years been engaged in the undertaking business, being the junior partner in the firm of Klaehn & Melching, the largest establishment in Northern Indiana. He has always shown a deep interest in the various movements for the welfare of the community, and has taken great pride in watching the growth and development of his home city. Being of German parentage he is popular with that class, holding membership in four different societies of Fort Wayne, and is also a member of the commercial club.

CORNELIUS S. MERCER

Cornelius S. Mercer, widely known among journalists throughout the state and a prominent citizen of the city of Seymour, is a native of the state of Ohio, having been born in Guernsey county on the 27th day of June, 1868. He received his education in the public schools of his native county, and there he learned the printers' trade at an early age. When but nineteen years of age he came to Brownstown, Indiana, to assume the publication of the Brownstown Banner, and notwithstanding his youth, he proved a successful editor.

On the first day of May, 1890, he was united in marriage to Miss Alice Borcharding, and their residence was later established in the state of Iowa, where Mr. Mercer held the position of editor of the Iowa State Press, of Iowa City. Here he remained for several years, returning to Indiana to assume control of the Seymour Daily Democrat. Later he engaged in the printing business and is now president of the C. S. Mercer Co.

Mr. Mercer is a life-long Democrat, has attended a number of county and state conventions, and has been a delegate to most of the national conventions since the year 1892. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church and is affiliated with the order of Knights of Pythias and the Masons, having become associated with the latter organization in 1892.

JUDGE ROBERT W. MIERS

The name of Robert W. Miers stands out distinctly among the members of the southern Indiana bar.

Born in Decatur county, January 27, 1848, son of Thomas S. and Mahala Braden Miers, Judge Miers received his early education in the schools of Decatur county, and was for five or six seasons a student at Hartsville College. In 1867 he entered Indiana University, graduating from the literary department in 1870 and from the law department in 1871. He then entered upon the practice of law, and of those who were admitted for practice at that time he is the only survivor. He has been engaged in active practice for forty-four years.

Judge Miers was appointed judge of the circuit court, serving two years, and then was elected to serve the full term of six years, and was again elected circuit judge in 1914, and is now judge of the tenth judicial circuit, thus holding this position fourteen years. From 1875 to 1879 he was prosecuting attorney. He has always stood high in his profession, having shown a profound knowledge of the law and a desire to apply it impartially. From 1896 to 1904 he represented his district in Congress. He was twice nominee for secretary of state, but each time met with defeat. From 1879 to 1891 he served on the board of Indiana University.

He is an Elk, also a member of Beta Theta Pi. On May 9, 1871, he was married to Belle Ryors. They have two children, Bertha, now the wife of Oscar Cravens, and Daniel K.

RICHARD M. MILBURN

Few members of the legal profession in the state have the depth of learning and the clear insight into legal problems which belonged to Richard M. Milburn; and his wide experience touching affairs of the commonwealth enabled him to grasp the various phases of legal problems which were in his care with remarkable skill and accuracy.

He was born on the 24th of September, 1866, and attended the common school of his district, later taking a course in the State Normal School at Terre Haute. This was followed by a course in law at the Cumberland University of Lebanon, Tennessee. He held the degree of master of arts from the Indiana University, in which institution he was for several years an instructor in the law department.

In the year 1903-1905 he represented Dubois and Daviess counties in the state senate, taking an active part in the deliberations of that body. In the year 1914 he was elected attorney-general for the state on the Democratic ticket.

Mr. Milburn was united in marriage to Miss Lizzie Fowler of Portersville, Ind., on the 25th day of December, 1887, and to their home came five children—Miss Norma Milburn, a teacher of English; Lieutenant Frank W., Raymond F., Donald S. and Harold R. He took great interest in fraternal affairs in his home town, Jasper, having been affiliated with the Royal League, Order of Ben-Hur, the B. P. O. Elks, and was a member of the grand tribunal of the Knights of Pythias of this State.

DICK MILLER

There are those whose peculiar fitness, combined with an earnest interest in public affairs, naturally forces them into a conspicuous place in the political world, no matter to what particular party they belong. This fact is especially true when the individual has been successful to an unusual degree in the world of business, and when the business achievements have been the result of personal force after surmounting obstacles at which others have stopped.

All of this may be applied to Dick Miller, one of the Democrats of Indiana who was always ready to fight for the faith that was in him. He would meet the hard contest in politics just as he confronted and overcame business opposition of any sort. He never balked at what appeared a hard job, no matter what. He liked it.

His birthplace happened to be in Parke county, but he would have been the same sort of business and political pusher no matter where he started. His education was in the public schools, Bloomingdale Academy, Indiana University and the Indiana Law School, for he started as a practicing lawyer and chose Terre Haute as his base of operation for four and a half years.

His entry into politics was as a candidate for member of the state legislature from Parke county in 1897, being the first Democrat to represent the county in sixty years. He did not win this success without showing the stuff that was in him, and the introduction which this gave him to men worth while in the State was an important element in his future successes as a man of affairs. The acquaintances and friends formed during that term as a legislator were not only helpful, but he never lost one of these friends.

He removed from Terre Haute to Indianapolis in 1901, and engaged in the business of buying and selling bonds, soon establishing one of the leading houses of the sort in the State. In this business especially did the friendships over the whole State prove their worth. He had established a reputation that was most valuable. His word was accepted, and those with whom he did business were there for the next call.

In 1917, having been busy as a working Democrat ever since he had been living at the capital, he became the candidate of his party for mayor of Indianapolis. He entered the race at the solicitation of men worth while not only in the Democratic party, but in the Republican party as well. Conditions for Democratic success were not looked upon as promising, even with the most popular of candidates, but he consented to make the race. It was especially recognized that before the Democratic candidate could start he must face the handicap of several thousands of colored voters, who would support the Republican ticket with no question or thought of comparative values.

In the brief campaign which followed Dick Miller added most materially to his already excellent reputation and especially multiplied favorable acquaintances and friends, and after his defeat, for he was not elected, he was one of the most conspicuous workers in all the war activities during the war with Germany. He was at the head of the list of speakers on all occasions, especially in the numerous drives for funds in the many calls which came and were met by the people of Indianapolis.

Following his political campaign Dick Miller became president and head of the City Trust Company, a new and immediately prosperous financial establishment, transferring his bond and securities business to that institution.

ANDREW S. MILLER

An active Democratic worker and leading citizen of Middletown, Henry county, is Andrew S. Miller. He is a native of the State of Virginia, born on the 18th day of December, 1856. He accompanied his parents to Indiana in infancy, however, and his schooling was received largely in this State. After graduating from the public schools a course was taken in the Normal School of Lebanon, Ohio. In the year 1882 he was united in marriage to Miss Virginia Moore, of Middletown, and their home has since been among the friends of her childhood. Mr. Miller has been for many years successfully engaged in the drug business and other interests, and has taken an active interest in municipal affairs. From 1882 to 1886 he served as township trustee, with much credit to himself and his constituents, and is now president of the town board. Politically he is a staunch Democrat, and has represented this party in state convention and also at the national convention at Chicago in 1894.

HON. FRED C. MILLER

Hon. Fred C. Miller is perhaps known to every citizen of Laporte county, having for many years been a prominent member of the community and holding the unique distinction of having held political elective position in the county for fifteen years and four months, consecutively. Needless to add that his reputation as a citizen of sterling worth has long since been established.

Mr. Miller is a native of Germany, born on the 28th day of August, 1866. At the age of six he accompanied his parents to America, locating in Northern Indiana. His education was received in the public schools of Michigan and the parochial schools of St. John's Lutheran church.

Early in life he took an active interest in political affairs, and in the year 1898 he was elected Democratic councilman of the third ward of Michigan City, and was re-elected for two more consecutive terms, serving as councilman up to the time that he assumed the duties as mayor of Michigan City, Indiana, being elected to this office with the highest majority ever received by any candidate.

Mr. Miller devoted his entire time to the office of mayor, and is considered today by the citizens, regardless of party politics, as one of the few men who successfully conducted the affairs of the city; and when Mr. Miller retired from office, January 5, 1914, he had served the people for seven years and four months as mayor, and had fulfilled his original promise to the people of Michigan City, that when he retired as mayor he would leave the city free from indebtedness.

GEORGE T. MILLER

George T. Miller is a native of Boone county, his birth having occurred on the 7th day of November, 1872. His wife was formerly Miss Lydia Etchison, and to her helpful companionship much of his success is no doubt largely due.

Mr. Miller received his education in the common schools of the county, and has identified himself closely with the growth and development of the community. Always a staunch Democrat, he has worked zealously at all times for the success of his party and the promulgation of its principles, but has not himself aspired to hold office within the gift of the public, politically or otherwise.

JAP MILLER

Jap Miller, the best known man in Morgan county and immortalized by James Whitcomb Riley in the well known poem "Jap Miller," was born on a farm in Shelby county, February 22, 1857. In the year 1876 he located in Martinsville, where he entered high school after but two winters of schooling in Shelby county. Though Mr. Miller has contributed valued service to the cause of Democracy he has not been an office seeker, devoting his energies rather to the furtherance of the cause of clean politics in his community. In 1890, however, he became a member of the city council, and in this work he rendered efficient service until 1892. After twenty years' residence in Martinsville he located in Brooklyn, where he has since conducted Jap Miller's Famous Store, dealing in hardware and general merchandise. He was also the proud possessor of the famous cat, "Mr. Tug," which once saved his store from burning and finally died of old age in May, 1914.

Mr. Miller's family consists of himself and his sister, Mrs. Eliza Dalton.

SAMUEL J. MILLER

An active member of the Marion county Democratic organization and favorably known throughout the state for the service he has rendered the cause, Samuel J. Miller is worthy of honorable mention.

Mr. Miller is essentially a product of Marion county, his birth having occurred within its confines on the 26th day of June, 1881. He attended the public schools of Indianapolis and was graduated from Shortridge High School. In the year 1904 he married Miss Katherine Light and established his home near the city of Indianapolis.

Mr. Miller is deeply interested in agricultural affairs and is one of an ever-increasing number of men who are raising this pursuit to the dignity of a profession by the practice of scientific and progressive methods.

In the fall of 1912 Mr. Miller was elected representative to the state assembly of 1913, and in this body took an active part. The following year he served as secretary of the Marion county Democratic committee and was the Democratic candidate for trustee of Wayne township. Fraternally, he is allied with the Modern Woodmen of America and the order of Eagles. He also is a member of the Indiana Democratic Club. He attended the national convention in Baltimore in 1912 and is a staunch adherent of the present administration.

MARVIN M. MINNICK

Marvin M. Minnick, a native of Cass county, was born near Walton, December 21, 1867, the son of Elizabeth and Elias A. Minnick. His youth was spent on the farm and his education received at the public schools and the American Normal College. He later entered Hall's Business College at Logansport, and upon his graduation taught school for a period of seventeen years. He became widely known in this profession, resigning to take position as cashier in a bank at Bunker Hill and later at Walton, which two positions he occupied for six years. In 1910, while a resident of Walton, he was Democratic candidate for county treasurer, and in the campaign which followed was elected. After an excellent administration of the affairs of this position he was again elected in 1912.

September 15, 1896, he was married to Miss Lavina H. Green of Walton, and they have three children—Dallas D., Dorothy L. and Dorris P.

Fraternally, Mr. Minnick is a Knight Templar, Knight of Pythias and Odd Fellow.

OSCAR C. MINOR

Among the enthusiastic and loyal workers in the ranks of the Democratic party in Indiana should be numbered Oscar C. Minor, a prominent attorney at law of Cannelton.

Mr. Minor was born in Peery county on the 6th day of April, 1872, and in this locality his youth was spent. He attended the public schools of his district and, after receiving a common school education, entered Central Normal College of Danville, Indiana, taking a complete law course and graduating in the year 1892. The same year he was admitted to the bar of Peery county and entered into the duties of his chosen profession with zeal.

Immediately after he attained his majority he launched into the political field, working zealously for the cause of Democracy; and in the fall of 1898 he was elected joint senator from the counties of Perry, Spencer and Crawford, and in the state legislatures of 1899 and 1901 he was an active member. During these sessions he established a reputation for zealous work and loyalty to his constituency and demonstrated his ability as a legislator.

On the 25th day of September, 1901, his marriage to Miss Margaret Conway of Cannelton, Ind., was solemnized, and their home was established in Cannelton. Here they have remained, drawing about them an ever-widening circle of devoted friends, many of whom have accepted the hospitality of their home.

Mr. Minor is affiliated with the James Lodge No. 100, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, among the members of which he is highly esteemed.

JOHN F. MITCHELL

The gentleman whose name heads this article has for many years been a prominent figure in the field of journalism in eastern Indiana, and has been largely responsible for the molding of the political opinion of the citizens of Hancock county.

John F. Mitchell, son of the late William Mitchell, a prominent journalist and worker in the ranks of Indiana Democracy, was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on the 11th day of April, 1853. When but three years of age, however, he was brought by his father to the city of Greenfield, where he has since remained. He attended the public schools in Greenfield and early in life became interested in the work of the Hancock Democrat, a paper established in 1859 by his father, and now enjoying the distinction of being the oldest Democratic newspaper in eastern Indiana and the property of the Mitchell family since its foundation. As Mr. Mitchell grew to manhood he gradually grew into the work of the newspaper office, and in the year 1899 assumed the editorship of the publication, a position which he has since held with credit. In this labor he has not lost sight of the great responsibility which lies in the hands of the editor, that of molding public opinion in large measure, and has conscientiously adhered to the principles which seemed to him just and right, those promulgated by Thomas Jefferson and carried out by the Democratic party.

The Democrat is owned by Mr. Mitchell, and in connection with it he has one of the largest printing and binding establishments in Indiana. His son, John F. Mitchell, Jr., is associate editor of the Democrat and also manager of this large printing plant. He attended the city schools, from which he graduated. He also graduated from Butler and Yale colleges, and will make newspaper work his life work. He has written several plays and has a number of them with some of the leading producers of the country now. When a small boy he had a full-page article appear in the Ladies' Home Journal.

Mrs. Mitchell, to whom he was married in the year 1879, was formerly Miss Minnie B. Alexander, a native of Mission Valley, Texas, now, however, a loyal Hoosier. She has a great literary taste and has written a number of short sketches, for which she has been complimented by some of the best literary talent of the country, James Whitcomb Riley being one of the many. Her stories are published in children's magazines.

CARL MISHLER

Carl Mishler, long a well-known citizen of Lagrange and at present holding a position of responsibility in the service of the commonwealth, was born in Indiana on the 23rd day of November, 1882. He attended the schools of Topeka and Shipshewana and completed a course in civil engineering.

On the 3rd day of July, 1910, Mr. Mishler was united in marriage to Miss Virginia Wolfe and established his home in Lagrange.

Mr. Mishler has taken a deep interest in the success of the Democratic party in his country and has given freely of his time for the furtherance of the cause.

On the first day of January, 1913, he assumed the duties of county surveyor.

EMMET C. MITCHELL

Though still a young man, Emmet C. Mitchell has won for himself a position of large influence throughout Washington and adjacent counties, being one of the best known attorneys in that section of the state, and had served the commonwealth with great credit as a public official.

Mr. Mitchell is a native Hoosier, born on the 4th day of April, 1883. He attended the public schools of his home district and was graduated from the Salem high school. His studies were continued at Indiana University and in the Indiana Law School at Indianapolis. In the year of his graduation from the latter he was admitted to the bar of Washington county and entered into the active practice of his profession. He now is a member of the law firm of Mitchell & Mitchell, Salem, Ind., and enjoys a large and lucrative practice.

Politically, Mr. Mitchell has been a staunch adherent of the Democratic party and an active worker for the furtherance of its principles in state and national affairs. In the fall of 1908 he was elected joint representative for the counties of Clark and Washington to the state legislature, and in the assembly of 1909 rendered such valued service to the party and his constituents that he was returned for the sessions of 1911 and 1913.

On November 26, 1914, Mr. Mitchell was united in marriage to Miss Edith B. Lewis. They have a son, Samuel Lewis Mitchell.

HENRY W. MOCK

The town of English has, perhaps, no citizen of wider experience and greater intelligence than the gentleman commemorated in this article. A native of the Hoosier state, Mr. Henry W. Mock was born in Crawford county on the 7th day of September, 1877. After completing his studies in the public schools of the county, he acquired a knowledge of business affairs and practical commercial work in the New Albany Business College. Then followed a course of study in the State Normal School at Terre Haute, from which he graduated in 1902, and finally a course in Indiana University at Bloomington. He was reared upon the farm, but left it in his youth to take up the work of a school teacher. In this manner he was employed for eleven years, continually advancing in his chosen profession. He was appointed superintendent of schools of Alton, Indiana, which position he held for two years, and later served the town of English in the same capacity for a period of six years. In 1910 he was elected county clerk of Crawford county for a term of four years; and before the expiration of the term was renominated for the same office without opposition and elected, the first clerk who had succeeded himself since 1887. December 31, 1903, he was married to Miss Emma Robertson.

He is affiliated with the Crawford Lodge No. 470, F. and A. M.; New Albany Chapter No. 17, Royal Arch Masons; Indiana Council No. 1, Royal and Select Masons; New Albany Commandery No. 5, Knights Templar; Indianapolis Consistory, 32d Degree, Scottish Rite, and English Chapter No. 387, Order of Eastern Star.

JUSTIN J. MOLONY

The Democracy of Indiana numbers in its ranks a legion of young men, bright, active and alert, who are as loyal to the principles promulgated by Jefferson and as energetic in the support of the party as were their forefathers; and to this element belongs Justin J. Molony, a well known attorney of Crawfordsville.

Mr. Molony is a native Hoosier, born in Montgomery county on the third day of October, 1886. He attended the public schools of Crawfordsville and graduated from the high school of this city with the class of 1907. Later his studies were continued at the University of Notre Dame, from the law department of which he graduated in June, 1911. In the following September, he was admitted to the bar of Montgomery county and entered upon the active practice of the legal profession at Crawfordsville. Here he has continued in his work, bringing to the service of his clients youthful enthusiasm, untiring diligence in research and a keen intelligence which reaches to the foundation and solution of intricate questions. These characteristics, combined with conscientious loyalty, have brought him the reward of success in his work and placed him in the forefront of the ranks of his profession in this locality.

Politically, he has, since attaining his majority, been a faithful adherent to the tenets of true Democracy, and has worked with zeal for the success of the party during the various campaigns through which he has passed.

JUDGE JAMES J. MORAN

Judge Moran was born in Adams county, Indiana, November 12, 1873. His common school education was supplemented by a course of training in Portland Normal College, Tri-State Normal, Angola, Ind., and University of Ada, Ohio. In May, 1896, he graduated from the Indiana Law School of Indianapolis, Ind. On June 28, 1898, he was married to Miss Elizabeth Somers of Pennville, Ind.

After graduating from law school he was admitted to the bar of Jay county. In November, 1910, he was elected judge of the Jay circuit court, serving in this capacity until appointed to the appellate bench. His decisions were characterized by the same breadth of vision and fair-minded policies he had evinced as a jurist. On February 11, 1914, he was appointed judge of the appellate court by Governor Ralston, and in this capacity still serves. He is known as a forceful speaker, both politically and legally, conservative in thought, but powerful in the expression of his convictions.

CHARLES R. MORRIS

Charles R. Morris needs no introduction to the people of Washington county, having been for many years a representative citizen of Salem and closely identified with the business, civil, political and fraternal life of this locality.

Mr. Morris was born in Washington county on the 8th day of July, 1874, and here he received his early schooling in the public schools of his home district. Following his graduation from the common schools he attended the Southern Indiana Normal College at Mitchell and later continued his studies at the Central Normal College at Danville, Indiana. A commercial course was then taken at the New Albany Business College, from which he was graduated in the year 1896.

On August 15, 1900, Mr. Morris was united in marriage to Miss Minnie E. Doyle and established his home in Salem.

In the year 1903 Mr. Morris assumed the duties of deputy auditor of Washington county and in that position continued until 1907. On April 6, 1914, he received from President Wilson the commission which appointed him postmaster of Salem, and on the 1st day of May following he assumed the duties of this office. He was re-commissioned September 5, 1918, for another term of four years. In this work he has demonstrated his efficiency in the public service.

Politically, Mr. Morris has been a zealous worker for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy, and as the editor of the Salem Democrat has performed valuable service in molding public opinion throughout the community. Mr. Morris was for four years vice-president and director of the Salem Building Loan Fund and Savings Association, and for the past ten years has served as secretary of the Salem Fair Association. He also is a member of the Salem Booster Club. Fraternally, he is allied with Salem Lodge No. 21, F. and A. M.; Chapter No. 38, Royal Arch Masons; Council No. 61, R. & S. M., and Salem Lodge No. 67, I. O. O. F.

WILLIAM Z. MORGAN

Descended from a line of Democratic ancestors extending back for many generations. it is small wonder that William Z. Morgan has, since attaining his majority, been closely allied with the doings of this party in Howard county and is an active factor in its councils.

Mr. Morgan was born on the 11th day of November, 1876, in Howard county, Indiana. He attended the public schools of his district, graduating from the high school in the year 1895, after which a course of study at Franklin College was taken.

In the year 1903 his marriage to Miss Estella B. Wright was solemnized and their permanent residence established in Kokomo. Mr. Morgan has for a number of years taken a prominent part in political affairs, acting as chairman of his home precinct, also as chairman of the Center township committee, and served as police commissioner during the years 1912 and 1913. For several years he acted as delegate to the various conventions of the party. His father, William B. Morgan, was a prominent Democratic worker also; and his great-grandfather was a cousin of Vice-President Hendricks, and, like him, a staunch adherent to the tenets of the Jeffersonian party. Mr. Morgan enjoys an extended acquaintance throughout the county, and is held in high esteem by a host of friends in and out of the Democratic party.

JUDGE DOUGLAS MORRIS

Judge Douglas Morris, a representative citizen and leading lawyer of Rush county, was born on a farm in Henry county, Indiana, on the 5th day of January, 1861. He is a son of John and Hannah Scovell Morris. His ancestors were of Revolutionary stock, and his grandfather Morris was one of the early Indiana pioneers who came to the unbroken forest and opened the way for the present civilization and culture of the state. The land then entered by him from the Government in 1833—and where the Judge was born—is still in the possession of Judge Morris, now a beautiful, productive farm in Henry county; and the high ideals and sterling qualities of the sturdy pioneer have descended in like manner to the grandson. His grandfather Scovell was a Rush county pioneer, and was active in its early industrial and political life.

Judge Morris attended the schools of his district, and graduated from the high school of Knightstown with the class of 1878. The following year he entered Asbury College, now DePauw University, in the sophomore class, and completed a three-year course in this institution, graduating in 1882. In the summer of the same year he entered the law office of Harrison, Hines & Miller of Indianapolis, and under their guidance completed a course in law. In 1883 he located in Knoxville, Tenn., engaging in the practice of his profession, but two years later decided to return to the Hoosier State, where, in the city of Rushville, he has since remained, building for himself a lucrative practice, won by the application of unbounded energy, conscientious zeal in the interests of his clients and an active intelligence and keen insight into intricate problems brought to him for solution.

In 1898 he was elected by a plurality of more than 2,000 to the position of judge of the Eighth judicial circuit, then embracing Decatur and Rush counties, and in this capacity served for one year.

In 1899, however, his circuit was changed to the Sixteenth, composed of Rush and Shelby counties, where he served the remainder of his six-year term. During this service, in 1902, his brother, John M. Morris, was elected judge of the circuit court of Henry county, thus producing a rare coincidence—two brothers serving at the same time as elected judges in adjoining circuits. In the year 1910 he was elected to the bench of the supreme court of Indiana.

During his career on the supreme court bench Judge Morris evinced the same industry and conscientious zeal in the service of the public that characterized his former labors as a jurist.

He is an adherent of the Democratic party. In 1884, while a resident of Knoxville, he made campaign speeches for Cleveland and Hendricks in the mountain counties of east Tennessee. In 1892 he was acting chairman of the Democratic central committee of Rush county. In 1888 he was the nominee of the Democratic party for congress in the then Republican stronghold of the Sixth, or old "Burnt" district.

His uncle, Isaac Morris, elected to the legislature of 1850, was the only Democrat serving in such capacity from Henry county prior to 1913.

During his years in college he became identified with the Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity, and in this organization he still takes a friendly interest. He is also an active member of the Presbyterian church of Rushville, where he and his family are held in high esteem.

On the 6th day of October, 1892, occurred his marriage to Miss Pamela A. Spann, daughter of Hon. Jesse J. Spann, state senator and distinguished lawyer. Their home life has stood for the highest ideals and refinements of thought. To them have been born a son and daughter, who have assisted in drawing about the family a wide circle of cultured friends and in dispensing the hospitalities of their charming home.

RALPH W. MOSS

During the first four years of the Woodrow Wilson administration, Ralph W. Moss was more closely identified with the progressive legislation advocated by the President, than any congressman from Indiana. In fact, there were few members of either the Congress or the Senate who were in closer touch with the views of the President, and assisted him more materially in promoting the passage of important bills, than was Congressman Moss.

In 1913 he was sent to Europe on a commission to secure data for drafting the Rural Credits Law, which was one of the most important bills passed during the first term of President Wilson. He was appointed member of the special committee which framed the present farm credit law and introduced the bill in the House. Following the passage of the bill he was consulted by the President in the appointments and in completing the organization of this very important feature of governmental work.

Mr. Moss was first elected to Congress in 1908, being re-elected for three more terms, serving four terms of eight years. He was a nominee of his party without opposition four terms following, when the Republican majority in the district was so large it was impossible even with a lead for him to overcome it.

Another important committee on which Congressman Moss was appointed, was that which investigated the Wiley scandals in the pure food controversy.

He was born in Sugar Ridge township, Clay county, April 21, 1862, spending his life in the same place. After completing the course in the local district schools he went two years to Purdue, after which he taught school for several terms. His entrance into politics was when he was nominated and elected into the State Senate in 1904 from Owen and Clay counties. That was in the famous Roosevelt year and there were but three other Democratic state senators elected in Indiana that year. In addition to his political work he was always most actively identified with farmers' organizations and became very much interested and active in that branch of vocational education undertaken under the Federal Government. In the campaign of 1918, he served as chairman and director of the Democratic League of Indiana which organized with several thousand members. He was well known throughout the state and popular as a campaigner.

CHARLES W. MOUCH

Charles W. Mouch of Newcastle is closely identified with the business and political life of the city and has a wide acquaintance throughout the county.

Mr. Mouch was born in the state of Ohio, July 6, 1863, and received his education in the schools of Wapakoneta. In his youth he was in the employ of the I. B. & W. Railway Company, and came to the town of Mooreland, Henry county, to assume the duties of station agent. In October, 1893, he was united in marriage to Miss Hattie F. Moore of Mooreland and that place was for many years their home. During the period from 1895 to 1899 he served as postmaster of the town; but later moved to the town of Newcastle. There he served in the city council from 1910 to 1914, and there also his business interests have centered. He is now president and manager of the Indiana Rolling Mill Co. and president of the Farmers' National Bank.

ALBERT R. MULKINS

Albert R. Mulkins, the present postmaster of the city of Edinburg, has been for many years a resident and well known citizen of that community.

Mr. Mulkins was born at West Point, Harlan county, Kentucky, September 28, 1871, and early in life accompanied his parents to the state of Illinois, where his schooling was largely received. He attended the public schools of his home district and the high school of Chrisman, Illinois. His studies were later continued at the technical school at Jacksonville, Illinois, and this was followed by a year at an academy. A course also was taken at Wabash College. At the age of nineteen years he came to Indiana for permanent abode, and later his marriage to Miss Catherine P. Warner, of Edinburg, was solemnized.

On April 14, 1914, Mr. Mulkins received his appointment to the position of postmaster of Edinburg, and he is still devoting his time to the duties involved.

Mr. Mulkins has taken a deep interest in Democratic affairs and has served on the county executive committee, representing Blue River township.

LEONIDAS H. MULL

In every locality we find a few citizens of sterling worth who are recognized as leaders in the various movements which arise from time to time for the betterment of the community at large, both in its physical features and in its moral uplift. To this class belongs the subject of this article, Leonidas H. Mull, a lifelong citizen of Rush county and closely identified with its business and social interests.

Mr. Mull was born in Manilla township, Rush county, on the 8th day of October, 1866, and in the wholesome environment of farm life his boyhood and youth were spent. He attended the public schools of Manilla and after his graduation from the common school entered the normal school at Lebanon for work in the higher branches and in pedagogy. A commercial course in an Indianapolis business college was also taken, and his work in this institution has since proved of great value in the transaction of his large business interests.

From his youth he has taken a deep interest in agricultural pursuits and is recognized as a progressive farmer and an authority in the breeding of fine live stock. He is now the holder of extensive farming interests and yearly markets fine stock in large quantities. In the development of the various branches of this work he has displayed unflagging zeal and characteristic energy, combined with intelligent method and efficient administration of his affairs.

He is also the holder of stock in the Manilla Bank, and has for a number of years held the responsible position of vice-president of this institution.

Mr. Mull is descended from a line of Democratic ancestors, and he has consistently followed in their footsteps, working loyally and zealously in the various campaigns through which he has passed for the furtherance of the cause. He has been prominently identified with the local organization for many years, serving as precinct committeeman and as delegate to the various conventions of the party, county, state and congressional.

In the year 1898 he was elected to represent Rush county in the state legislature, and in the assembly of 1899 his services were invaluable to the people of the state. During the fierce fight which occurred during that session for the cause of county reform Mr. Mull and one other, Sylvester Titus of Boone county, were the only Democrats who stood stanchly for the measure, and by their firm stand for what appeared to them the honest and just thing for the people the measure was carried. The nomination for this office came to him unsought, and his conduct as a legislator justified the confidence reposed in him.

Fraternally, Mr. Mull is allied with the orders of Free and Accepted Masons, in which he has passed through the thirty-second degree; the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias and the Red Men; and he is also an active member of the Indiana Democratic Club. In all of these various orders he is widely known and highly esteemed; and the reputation he has established, not only in Rush county, but throughout the state, as a citizen of sterling worth is an enviable one.

CHARLES B. MULVEY

One of the successful and popular practitioners of Blackford county is Dr. Charles B. Mulvey of Montpelier. He was born at Auburn, in the State of New York, July 21, 1868. Coming to Indiana in 1888 on a pleasure trip, he was so well pleased with the State and with the people he met that he remained to become a citizen of Indiana. Having graduated from the high school at Auburn, N. Y., he entered the Indiana Medical College in 1890 and graduated therefrom in 1894. Following this thorough medical course he formed a partnership with and began the practice of medicine with Dr. John Sellers at Montpelier.

Dr. Mulvey, in addition to careful attention to the duties of his profession, has taken an active interest in public affairs. He has adhered steadily to the principles of the Democratic party, and was elected coroner of Blackford county for 1896-98, being re-elected for 1900-1901. In addition he has been secretary of the city board of health since 1898, was elected to the city council in 1908 and served until his re-election in 1908 for a four-year term. He is also deputy health commissioner.

Dr. Mulvey was married on August 1, 1894, to Miss Mary A. Miller. He is a member of Camden Lodge No. 112, F. & A. M., of the Lodge of Perfection at Fort Wayne, of the Indianapolis Consistory, A. A. Scottish Rite No. 3290.

CHARLES J. MURPHY

The men in the trenches have been the real strength of the Democratic party in Indiana. This is true especially of those who have fought with that enthusiasm and earnestness born of faith in the party principles, minus first thought of personal reward in the emoluments of office.

Among these fighters, always working with an effect worth while, from before his twenty-first birthday, was Charles J. Murphy, of Brookston, or more properly, of the tenth congressional district.

Member of the Indiana house of representatives at twenty-four, this being in 1899, succeeding himself in 1901 and at this second session being chosen caucus chairman, he retired from office-holding to devote himself to his large farming interests and operations in White county.

Later he served six years as Democratic district chairman, retiring from this when Governor Ralston named him as a member of the first public service commission of Indiana. The election laws made it impossible for the holder of an appointive state office to serve as a part of any political organization.

As district chairman Mr. Murphy acquired the reputation of being one of the hardest workers and most efficient leaders in the state when it came to "bringing home the bacon." Both with his party and among workers of the opposition he was also and always reputed as "one of the fairest sort of political warriors."

As a public service commissioner his efficiency was of the same sort, characterized by hard work and results accomplished; seeking conscientiously in all that he did to treat fairly all parties in interest in his adjudications, and aiming never to forget that most concerned third party, the ultimate consumer. He always advocated adherence to the letter and spirit of the public service law.

In this service the cases that he adjudicated were so correctly adjusted that none of these have since been reviewed by the commission. He tried and worked out the first electric rate case worked out in Indiana, tried and adjudicated the first and only natural gas rate case ever heard in the United States, also the only municipal purchase case worked out in Indiana up to the date of his retirement.

Mr. Murphy retired from the public service commission in the midst of the discussion and settlement of the question of allowing one of the public utilities of the state to capitalize and issue securities with the stamp of state approval, and for amounts which Commissioner Murphy declared were some millions in excess of any values or investment of money actually shown.

As a member of the commission he insisted in all cases upon adherence to figures that he believed were justified by investment and values really existing. The letter and the spirit of the law, by his interpretation, so anticipated and dictated. He maintained that the utility or business that sought to go beyond this limit must suffer in the end, meaning that stockholders and security holders eventually must lose. He declared this to be of far more concern to the general public than the matter of tossing some temporary advantage in dollars and cents or stock control of public properties to some specially selected individuals.

Since the controversy at the particular time was one in which it appeared that the sincere and conscientious opposition of one member of the commission might modify or prevent the granting of the concessions asked, Mr. Murphy, insisting upon thorough inquiry into facts and values, retired from the commission. This was the direct result of his attitude on the point involved. He refused to recede in this or any adjustment from what he considered the right and equitable position, thus following one of his fixed business and political principles.

Mr. Murphy, upon leaving the commission, became the active vice-president of the State Savings and Trust Company of Indianapolis, as well as continuing ownership and personal direction of his large farming and manufacturing interests.

"Charlie" Murphy never "used" a friend nor did he ever betray a friend. No temptation could ever be strong enough to develop in his make-up the slightest trace of disloyalty or questionable dealing.

JOHN BERNARD NIEZER

John Bernard Niezer, now deceased, was throughout his life closely identified with the business and political growth of Allen county, and many years were spent in the service of the public.

He was born in Milan township, Allen county, on the 21st day of July, 1846, but in his early childhood his mother came to Ft. Wayne for residence and the boy's education was received in the schools of this city. Here he remained until the year 1865, at which time he engaged in the hardware business in the town of Monroeville, and this place was henceforward the scene of most of his business and political activities.

On the 28th day of April, 1868, he was united in marriage to Miss Sarah T. Eyanson at Ft. Wayne, and their home was established at Monroeville.

He was president of the Citizens' State Bank of Monroeville, the first banking institution in the county outside of Ft. Wayne, its organization taking place in the year 1892. He was also one of the incorporators of the German-American National Bank and German-American Trust Company of Ft. Wayne, and a director in both of these institutions from the date of their organization until his death.

In 1876 he was elected school trustee and treasurer of Monroeville, serving until 1879; and in 1880 was elected township trustee of Monroe township for a period of four years. In the year 1886 he assumed the duties of auditor of Allen county, serving in this capacity until 1890; and at the expiration of this period was again elected school trustee of Monroeville, this time serving for a period of eight years.

He was also organizer and president of the firm of Niezer & Co., conducting an extensive shipping business and operating grain elevators.

In the year 1908 he took up his residence in Ft. Wayne, retaining his business interests in Monroeville; and on September 15, 1912, occurred his death at his residence, 524 West Wayne street.

THOMAS L. NEAL

Among the younger element of the Democratic party in Indiana, perhaps none has accomplished more than the gentleman whose name heads this article. A native of Boone county, his birth occurred on the 19th day of June, 1884. He attended the schools of Lebanon, graduating from high school with the class of 1902; and followed this with a three-year course at Franklin College, graduating with the class of 1905. In the spring of 1906 he became assistant general superintendent of the K. of P. Life Insurance Company, covering the states of North and South Carolina and Virginia.

In the year 1908 he returned to Indiana, and, although but twenty-four years of age, assumed the position of general superintendent of the same company, which office he held until he was elected state senator in 1912. This has been his only venture into political affairs, but he proved an active worker during his term of office, and has won distinction as the author of the rural credits law in Indiana. He was also the first president of the local company organized under this statute, the company being capitalized at $1,000,000. He is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias and is a 32d Degree Mason.

DAVID J. NORRIS

For many years the holder of various positions of responsibility in the service of the public in Lagrange county, David J. Norris needs but little introduction to the citizens of this commonwealth.

He was born in Huntington, Pa., on the 1st day of February, 1847, and received his education in the public schools of his district. His early life was spent in the wholesome atmosphere of the farm, and when he came to Indiana in the year 1876 he continued in the pursuit of agriculture. In the year 1890 he assumed the duties of trustee of Clay township, in Lagrange county, serving in this capacity until 1895. Eight years later he was again elected to this position and served for a term of four years, retiring in 1907. In the fall of 1913 he was elected county commissioner, and this office he assumed on the 1st day of the following January, his term of service to expire January 1, 1917.

Mrs. Norris, to whom he was married on the 6th day of January, 1870, was formerly Miss Mary A. Heffner of Pennsylvania.

He has been a delegate to all state conventions of the party except the last for the past twenty-five years.

ELDER WILLIAM R. NOWELS

To the citizens of the city of Rensselaer the name of William R. Nowels is a familiar one; for his labors in the ministry in Jasper county have extended over a period of thirty-five years. He was born in this state on the 2nd day of August, 1846, near the site of his present home, and his interests have centered in this section of the state. He attended the public schools of his district, and later pursued his studies at the Battle Ground Seminary, from which he graduated with the class of 1866. He was so fortunate as to spend his childhood in the wholesome environment of the farm, and after his schooling was completed he returned to the farm, where he remained until the year 1904, cultivating the land and preaching in the Baptist church.

On the 14th day of March, 1867, he was united in marriage to Miss Emma A. Rock, and she has since presided over his home and been his faithful ally in the labors to which he has given his time. In later years, however, he has retired from active labor in the field and in the ministry, and for the past six years has found the time to take an active part in the counsels of the Democratic organization, to which he has been a devoted adherent since his youth. In the year 1914 he was candidate for township assessor.

JACOB L. O'BANNON

A true product of Harrison county, Jacob L. O'Bannon has, since his youth, been prominently identified with municipal, educational and legal affairs of Corydon and its surroundings. He is a native of the county, having been born near his present home on the 10th day of March, 1860. He attended the public schools of Corydon, and later his studies were continued at the normal schools of Corydon and Elizabeth. Since this time his life has been a singularly active one, filled with accomplishments along varied lines, demonstrating remarkable energy, intelligence and zeal for the public good.

For twenty years Mr. O'Bannon was actively engaged in educational affairs, teaching in the schools, and in the meantime reading and practicing law. For fifteen years, also, he held the position of general traveler for the Osborne division of the International Harvester Co., gaining in this work a broad experience of men and affairs.

In the years 1896 and 1898 he was elected representative to the state legislature from Harrison county, and was appointed by Governor Claude Matthews to act as delegate to the good roads convention at Nashville, Tenn. In the year 1912, also, he was elected county auditor for a term of four years, and to the administration of the affairs of this office he is devoting his best energies.

Mr. O'Bannon is a lifelong Democrat, and before he attained his majority began the practice of making campaign speeches, and this he has continued till the present time. He has been active in the counsels of the county organization and is now county chairman. He is also actively allied with the fraternal order of Ben-Hur.

Mrs. O'Bannon, to whom he was married December 30, 1885, was formerly Miss Carrie Fox. Together they have won an enviable social position.

LEW M. O'BANNON

Harrison county has produced few citizens with claims to distinction along such varied lines of work as the gentleman whose photo appears herewith.

Lew M. O'Bannon was born in this county on the 18th day of August, 1864, and his education was received in the public schools of his district. In the year 1887 he assumed the duties of county surveyor, serving in this capacity until the fall of 1890, at which time he was elected county recorder, this term of office expiring in 1894. During the years 1896 to 1898 he served the Democratic party as county chairman.

In 1897 occurred two important events in his career, the first his marriage to Miss Lillian Keller of Corydon, on the 27th day of October; and the second his assumption of the duties of private secretary to Congressman William T. Zenor. In this position he remained for ten years, at the expiration of which he took up the active practice of law and also became editor and proprietor of the Corydon Democrat. In connection with this enterprise he is the president of the Indiana Democratic Editorial Association. He is also a member of the orders of Knights of Pythias and Modern Woodmen of America and secretary and attorney for the Savings and Loan Association of Corydon.

WILLIAM H. O'BRIEN

Dearborn county, Indiana, is the most consistently and most persistently Democratic county in the State. It was ever so. William H. O'Brien, more than any other man, was responsible for this condition and for its perpetuity. When the great Liberty Loans, the Red Cross drives, the War Savings campaigns, the Y. M. C. A. funds and all the other moves for financing the war with Germany were on, Dearborn was the county that always went "over the top" quicker and bigger than any other of the ninety-two counties in Indiana. William H. O'Brien was in all instances the one man of the county that did it.

When men were called to fight the war with Germany the home of William H. O'Brien furnished four of the best young officers who went to the front, two sons and two sons-in-law, and of this one thing William H. O'Brien was prouder than of anything else he ever accomplished.

But to recite the things that William H. O'Brien did in his home county in a political, business or patriotic way would be hardly touching the surface in enumerating the things that should be said of him and what he accomplished. The head of a national bank in his native town of Lawrenceburg, recognized as one of the ablest and shrewdest financiers far beyond the limits of his own State, his reputation always fully sustained and justified in what he did working at the business, both as a public official and in his financial operations in the business world.

In politics always looked to as one of the cleverest men in the Democratic party anywhere, though this came far from being in any sense his business. He liked politics, and it was always simply one of the things in which, as a man of large affairs, he found diversion and real pleasurable recreation.

Born in the city of Lawrenceburg, he always lived there. In his younger days he was editor of the Lawrenceburg Register, a Democratic newspaper that he made successful, as he always did all other things that came under his direction. He served for six years as secretary and fourteen years as chairman of the Democratic county central committee of Dearborn county. For the next six years he was the member of the Democratic state central committee from his district and for eight years was a member of the executive committee of the Democratic state central committee. He was also chairman of the Democratic state central committee for six years, and in 1908 he served as treasurer of the Democratic national committee.

The people of Lawrenceburg made him mayor of the city, for in electing a man of his standing, while he was the Democratic candidate, the people did the work of providing the majority at election time. He also served his district as a member of the Indiana state senate, and for two terms he was auditor of state.

It was as auditor of state that William H. O'Brien became best known by his good works to the people of the whole State of Indiana. He accomplished more for the good of all the people, for the State at large, than any other man who ever occupied any office under the dome of the Capitol building. If governors got the credit for much that he accomplished by his unusual ability as a financier and sound business man, William H. O'Brien was the one man who really did it. It is not detracting from what others did, then, to state the facts.

When William H. O'Brien took office as auditor of state and as the head of the financial affairs of Indiana no man ever met with a more deplorable condition. It was at the end of the first two years of the term that Thomas R. Marshall was governor. Republicans had for some years been in charge of the State finances. It was not because he was a Democrat that William H. O'Brien was able to take charge of the condition which existed and put things on a sound basis. It was because he was a man of unusual ability in the handling of such things, and it was because the Democratic party had the good judgment to name such a man for the important office that he had the chance to do what he did.

The State was more than $3,000,000 in debt the day William H. O'Brien became auditor. The condition to the average politician of any party who might take charge under such circumstances would have not only appeared but would have been hopeless. On his desk were current bills amounting to about $300,000 and in the treasury was less than $10,000 with which to pay these bills and keep the state government going. The counties had all been drawn upon for all they could possibly raise for the State, and the State's resources of all kinds had been anticipated and spent for a year in advance.

The State was absolutely bankrupt, and the only thing that kept it out of the bankruptcy court was the fact that it was the State and not an ordinary business institution or corporation. Of course the first thing to do was to borrow some money to operate upon, and this was done, while the Republican partisan press set up an awful howl that the "first thing Democrats do when they get into office is to borrow money." Never a word, of course, of why the borrowing was made necessary. Nothing to tell the public what the Republicans had been doing to make borrowing a thing unavoidable and the only business thing to do.

But William H. O'Brien had been too smart to listen to such things as attacks from the partisan press, or to try to answer them save to keep his course and let the results tell the story when it was all over. So he set about at the job. There were institutions to be built for the better care of the State's dependents. There were three such state institutions that must be looked after at once. These were of the charitable class. Most of the others had been allowed to deteriorate to such an extent that repairs almost amounted to rebuilding. The unfortunates in the charitable institutions and hospitals for the insane and others were not properly housed, clothed or fed.

The schools of the State were not cared for as they should be. The legislature had been called upon for so much for "general purposes," which meant "taking care of the boys" of the party in control, that these more important things had been neglected.

One result had been that each time the legislature met the people of the State must witness the really disgraceful picture of the heads of the state educational institutions and the other boards and heads of the state charitable homes and hospitals pleading as lobbyists for some support. But these were no match for "the boys" who had made their living lobbying as politicians, and legitimate calls usually got what the politician machinists did not demand. In this Indiana was not different from other states.

The William H. O'Brien plan eliminated the necessity for the heads of all these institutions to become lobbyists. He calculated their needs and with the co-operation of other Democratic state officials, when he showed the way, ample provision was made for them all. It was done because it was right, because it was good business, because it was humane, because it was economical, because it was using the money of the taxpayers for the things for which it had always been intended, and to which it had not in the past been applied.

With the elimination of this lobby it might also be stated, incidentally, that the next Democratic legislature eliminated the other lobbyists also, in the same year when the national congress under Woodrow Wilson drove them from Washington.

Under the William H. O'Brien financial plans the institutions that were needed were built. The others were rebuilt or repaired and put in habitable shape. The State's dependents were properly housed and amply clothed and fed. The educational institutions were provided with the funds necessary to place them in a position in the nation second to none. The public schools of the State, so far as the State's end of the work was concerned, never lagged. In all these things, ascribed to the administrations of Governors Marshall and Ralston, the financial and business head and hard work of William H. O'Brien deserves all the credit, save what the others did by way of co-operation. The purpose of any history is to tell the facts, and this is the record here recorded.

But the conclusion of the whole matter. The result of the William H. O'Brien policy in its working out. He spent four years in the office of auditor of state. At the end of his second year, which was the end of his first term, he insisted upon the Democratic platform promising the accomplishment of certain results during the next two years. The planks upon which he insisted went into the platform. The people supported the platform and men. The governor and the members of the legislature kept the pledges and passed the laws making the redemption of the promise possible.

The one result which embraces all the others was the exhibit on the day when Governor Ralston left office and turned over the state government and finances to his successor. All the State institutions that had to be repaired, as already described, had been repaired or rebuilt. All the new institutions had been built and were occupied. The original debt of more than three millions of dollars had been fully paid. The State had ceased to anticipate and spend its resources a year or more in advance. There was no longer any talk of the State being bankrupt, for on the day when the Democratic governor stepped out of office there was in the treasury in round figures about five millions of dollars, with not a bill, not a debt, not a claim of even a penny against the State anywhere.

This is the record of the holding of one office by William H. O'Brien. His whole business life was shaped in the same sane and thorough fashion. Whatever he undertook he finished. He undertook nothing that was not worth finishing. He never quit till he got to the end of the job, and he traveled by the most direct, practical route.

From politics and business to domestic affairs. Mr. and Mrs. William H. O'Brien reared one of the finest families on earth. It was the model to which the people of Lawrenceburg, or anywhere else where they were known, referred to as exceptional. Three sons and three daughters. Cornelius O'Brien, associated with his father in business in Lawrenceburg. Major Robert E. O'Brien of the United States Army, in the war with Germany. Lieutenant-Commander William H. O'Brien of the United States Navy, in the war with Germany. Captain Calvin W. Verity, United States Army, a son-in-law, in the war with Germany. Lieutenant Daniel R. Ingwersen, Aviation Section, Signal Corps, United States Army, another son-in-law, in the war with Germany. The other daughter is Frances O'Brien.

The story of William H. O'Brien as a business man, as a politician, as a public official, as an individual, as the head of a family, all these are fairly illustrated in the few things that have been recited. Many others might be told, but they would be only repetitions of the same general principles, only differing in details. What is told serves only to show, in so far as recital can convey it, why his reputation for all that is good and right and substantial in the world of men and affairs has been on the good side of the ledger.

CORNELIUS O'BRIEN

Closely identified with the political, business and financial life of the place, Cornelius O'Brien is well known in his home city, Lawrenceburg, and throughout Dearborn county. He is a native of Indiana, born on the 12th day of February, 1883, and received the foundation of his education in the public schools of Lawrenceburg. Following this he attended Moores Hill College for two years and later spent one year in Purdue University. Since attaining his majority and casting his first vote, he has been a member of the Democratic county central committee, and is at present treasurer of that body. In business he is associated with A. D. Cook, manufacturer of deep well pumps, and is assistant cashier and director of the Peoples' National Bank, and a member of the Indiana State Board of Agriculture. On the 14th of April, 1909, he was united in marriage to Miss Anna Belle Cook, and to them has been born one daughter. Mr. O'Brien is past master of Lawrenceburg Lodge No. 4, F. & A. M., and past chancellor of Dearborn Lodge No. 49, K. of P.; member of Indiana Delta Chapter of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity.

VICTOR OBERTING

To the citizens of Dearborn county the name of Victor Oberting is a familiar one, as he has for a number of years been closely identified with the business, political and social life of the city of Lawrenceburg.

Mr. Oberting was born in the state of Indiana on the 2nd day of February, 1858, and most of his life has been spent in the home of his childhood, Lawrenceburg, and here his interests are centered. He attended its schools, and at the age of twenty-three years his name was linked with that of one of the leading families of the city, for on the 2nd day of August, 1881, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Anna Garnier, the daughter of John B. Garnier, the founder of the Garnier brewery. At this time Mr. Oberting was a trusted employe of this great plant, and for a number of years was book-keeper for Mr. Garnier. Following the death of this gentleman, Mr. Oberting assumed the management of the institution, and under his direction the business of the concern has tripled itself since the year 1897, truly a remarkable record. Shortly after he assumed control of the business, the manufacture of ice was added to their activities, and much valuable machinery was installed in both departments. An ice plant of 20 tons daily capacity at Aurora, Ind., was also added to their holdings, and the business has continued to expand and improve each year to the present time.

However, Mr. Oberting is not a man of but a single talent, but has developed capabilities in various directions. He has, throughout his career, taken an active interest in political affairs, being a staunch adherent of the Democratic party; and in the year 1905 he served as representative in the general assembly of the State for Dearborn county, being returned also in 1907 to 1909.

Mr. Oberting has also given freely of his time and money for the furtherance of the cause of Democracy, and has held a position of influence in the councils of the party.

His business activities have reached out in various directions, and his investments in real estate in Lawrenceburg and surrounding territory have been unusually successful and heavy. He is a stockholder in three banks, a director of a gas plant and of the county fair association, a member of the cemetery board and interested in a thriving carriage factory. In all of these undertakings he has proved himself a leader, a good commander and director and fearless in his transactions, evincing a progressive spirit and aggressive methods, which, combined with unflagging energy, inevitably make for success.

He has taken a deep interest in the various movements for the betterment of the community, and has taken an active interest in civil and municipal affairs, serving at the present time as chief of the fire department. He is also a liberal contributor to religious and charitable institutions and movements.

Mr. Oberting has traveled very extensively, both in his home country and abroad, having visited the chief places of interest in the United States and taken four extensive tours through the various countries of Europe. He is, as a result, cosmopolitan in his acquaintance, cultivated in his tastes and broad-minded in his judgments of others and in his dealings with his fellow men.

To the home of Mr. and Mrs. Oberting have come two sons and a daughter, aged respectively thirty-one, twenty-two and sixteen years, and the charm of youth, together with unbounded hospitality, has brought to their fireside a host of friends.

J. C. ODELL

John C. Odell was born in Carroll county, Indiana, December 6, 1838. He was the oldest son of the Hon. James Odell, who was one of the earliest pioneer settlers of Carroll county, and who, during a period of sixty years, was called to fill public office as follows: County commissioner, representative in the general assembly in 1848, state senator from Carroll and Clinton counties in 1860, and clerk of the Carroll circuit court from 1871 to 1879. He cast his first vote for General Jackson for his second term for President, and was a consistent Democrat all his life. His death occurred June 4, 1891.

John C. Odell was educated in the common schools, one year at the Battle Ground Collegiate Institute and two years at Asbury University (now DePauw). In 1863 and 1864 he published the Delphi Times, the Democratic organ of the county. He was engaged for several years in teaching public schools, and in 1871 entered the clerk's office as deputy under his father, serving two terms, after which he was admitted to the bar, and has ever since been actively engaged in the practice of law. In 1896 he was elected prosecuting attorney for Carroll and White counties, and since has served as deputy prosecuting attorney for ten years for Carroll county. In 1915 he published a new history of Carroll county, embracing the entire civil history for 91 years, and the history of the early settlements. As a Democrat he rendered service to his party as a campaigner and writer.

He was married to Miss Elizabeth R. Noland of Loudon county, Virginia, September 11, 1873, and has one son and a daughter.

BERNARD E. O'CONNOR

Prominently identified with the business interests of Indianapolis for many years, and having since his boyhood taken an active part in political affairs in Indianapolis, the name of Bernard E. O'Connor is familiar to the citizens of Indianapolis and vicinity.

Mr. O'Connor is a native Hoosier, born in Indianapolis, Indiana, on the 24th day of April, 1876. He attended St. Joseph's School of Indianapolis, and later pursued his studies at St. Viator's College, Kankakee, Illinois.

On the 22nd day of April, 1908, his marriage to Miss Clementine Martha Cazeneuve, of Bay St. Louis, Mississippi, was solemnized and their home established in Indianapolis. Here they have gathered about them a wide circle of friends to whom the hospitality of their home has been extended by its charming mistress.

Mr. O'Connor is an enthusiastic adherent to the principles of true Democracy. He was one of the organizers of the Wilson-Bryan League of Indiana and when the league was organized at Indianapolis, December 30, 1913, he was unanimously chosen as secretary and executive officer, which position he still holds. This league led by Mr. O'Connor and other Democrats was the powerful force behind the Jones direct primary election bill which became a law in the general assembly of 1915. Probably without the active work of the league the primary bill would never have become a law.

Some of the most important work has been done by Mr. O'Connor in Marion county and Indianapolis. He was a member of the grand jury which indicted fifteen Progressives and Democrats for fraud in connection with the primaries that nominated the Democratic county ticket which was defeated in the last election. It was due to the active work and investigation of Mr. O'Connor that this clean-up in Marion county was started, it being his position that political corruption should be uprooted, no matter in what party it existed, and that the best thing to do for his own party would be to make it clean.

This investigation, started in Marion county, resulted in a clean-up movement which extended to all parts of Indiana. Within about one year from the time the ball was set rolling by Mr. O'Connor in Marion county 116 political corruptionists of Vigo county, including the mayor of Terre Haute, had either pleaded guilty to crooked election work or had been found guilty in the federal court. Also investigations of a similar kind had been started in many other cities in the State.

Mr. O'Connor is secretary-treasurer of the wholesale grocery firm of M. O'Connor & Co., a leading concern of the wholesale district of Indianapolis.

JOHN T. OLIPHANT

John T. Oliphant, a leading citizen of the city of Vincennes, is also well known throughout the state as a successful, aggressive man, one of influence in the business and political world.

Mr. Oliphant is a native of this state, his birth having occurred in Monroe county on the 10th day of February, 1867. He attended the public schools of his home district and was graduated from the high school. Later his studies were continued at the Central Normal College of Danville, which he attended for a term of three years, following which he entered the educational field and taught school for three terms, one of which was at Cadiz, Indiana. He later made his home at Vincennes, where his business interests have since been centered, his friendships have been formed and his permanent home established. On July 7, 1892, he was united in marriage to Miss Etta R. Newby of Newcastle, Indiana.

Throughout his life, Mr. Oliphant has been an energetic worker, bringing to his business affairs a definiteness of purpose, combined with aggressive methods, which have made for unusual success. As president of the Vincennes Bridge Co., the Wasson Coal Co. and the Oliphant-Wasson Coal Co., he has been an active force in bringing these concerns to their present standard of efficiency in administration; and the characteristics which have accomplished so much in the management of these institutions have placed him in the directorate of the Second National Bank of Vincennes. He is a stockholder in several other large financial institutions, located in Chicago, Illinois, Bruceville and Vincennes, Indiana. He also is deeply interested in agriculture and is a heavy investor in farm lands, as well as having heavy holdings in the oil fields near Sullivan, Indiana, and in the state of Oklahoma.

Though he has borne such heavy responsibilities in a business way, Mr. Oliphant has maintained the deepest interest in municipal affairs and all movements touching the progress and development of the city and the moral uplift of the community at large. He is on the directorate of all the commercial bodies of Vincennes and has been an enthusiastic worker in the interest of the Y. M. C. A., contributing in a large way of his means as well as his time to make possible the erection of the building now occupied by this organization. He has also for a number of years served as trustee of Vincennes University, and has for many years been deeply interested in the financial affairs of that institution. He has also for some time held a position on the official board of the Methodist church, of which he is an active member.

Fraternally, Mr. Oliphant is allied with Vincennes Lodge No. 1, Free and Accepted Masons; the Chapter, the Knights Templar Commandery and the B. P. O. Elks.

Since attaining his majority Mr. Oliphant has been a loyal and conscientious worker for the cause of Democracy and has been a delegate to a number of state conventions. In the local organizations his influence has been weighty and he has lost no opportunity to assist in promulgating the principles of Jefferson.

OSCAR OLIVER

For many years the name of Oscar Oliver has been a familiar one in the business circles of Jefferson county and his activities in the ranks of the Democratic organization have contributed in no small measure to its success in that section of the state.

Mr. Oliver is a native of Jefferson county, his birth having occurred on the 15th day of April, 1860. His education was received in the schools of the county, and in the year 1880, on the 16th day of November, he was united in marriage to Miss Fannie Armstrong and their home was established in the city of Madison. In the fall of 1913 he was elected to the position of city councilman and assumed his duties with that body on the first day of the following January, his term of office to expire with the close of 1917. For a number of years Mr. Oliver has been engaged in the produce business under the firm name of O. Oliver & Son. At one time he was candidate for trustee of Milton township, but, though he led his ticket, no Democrat was that year elected in the county, so he was defeated.

DENNIS O'RILEY

The name of Dennis O'Riley is a familiar one in every household in the town of Remington, for he has been prominently identified with the business and political interests of the place for nearly a quarter of a century.

Mr. O'Riley is a native of the state of Ohio, his birth having occurred on the 15th day of February, 1868. He attended the public schools of Van Wert, Ohio, in which town his youth was spent; but in the year 1889 he moved to Frankfort, Indiana, where he remained until 1893, at which time he settled in Jasper county. Two years later he was united in marriage to Miss Janie Shearer, and she has since been a large factor in his success.

Immediately after his arrival in Jasper county Mr. O'Riley engaged in the bakery and restaurant business in Remington, and conducted the business until the year 1912, when he disposed of the concern. He has taken an active interest in party and municipal affairs, having served as city councilman for a term of twelve years, retiring on January 1, 1914. Three months later he was appointed postmaster of Remington, which position he still holds. In the year 1914 he served as chairman of the south precinct Democratic committee.

JUDGE CHARLES J. ORBISON

He was Judge Charles J. Orbison, sitting on the superior court bench at Indianapolis at thirty-six. He might have led political preferment at an earlier period, but he chose to confine himself to building his personal law practice.

Born in Indianapolis, September 28, 1874, the "age of discretion" found him gaining the principles of Democracy, and his regret was that he had to wait until he was twenty-one to vote the Democratic ticket.

When he consented to become the candidate of his party for superior court judge of Marion county, in 1910, he was elected and served four years. He had graduated from the Indianapolis high school in 1893 and from the Indiana Law School, which was a part of the University, in 1896. Before he was judge of the superior court he had been named a member of the Indiana state board of charities, a position which he held under several reappointments.

From 1916 to 1917 Charles J. Orbison served as special counsel of the state board of tax commissioners.

Being a Scottish Rite Mason, Shriner and Knight Templar, serving also in the offices of the grand lodge of Masons, he also identified himself with the Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Red Men and E'ks. With these he found time to serve as president of the Indiana Democratic club and under his direction successful membership drives were made over the state and many extensions and improvements were made in the club house.

EDWARD O'ROURKE

Judge Edward O'Rourke is one of the grand old men of the Democratic party in Indiana. In Allen county he is not only respected, but revered. He was born in New Jersey, October 13, 1841, but came to Indiana in his youth, and after receiving his literary education at the old Methodist College studied law with Worden & Morris. He was admitted to the bar in 1866, and has been actively associated with legal affairs in Allen county since that year. From 1867 to 1872 he was prosecuting attorney in Fort Wayne and in 1876 was elected to the bench as judge of the circuit court, a position which he filled for the long term of 36 years. Since retiring from the bench, he has been occupied in the practice of law. Judge O'Rourke has always been a Democrat, and if not as active as some it was because while he sat upon the bench he considered his judicial position incompatible with political activity.

In 1887 Edward O'Rourke married Ada L. Abrams, a native of Ohio, and they have four grown-up children.

MARTIN HOMER ORMSBY

The molding of the sentiment of a community lies largely in the hands of its press. Therefore in the hands of the journalist lies a responsibility which should be borne only by those of sterling worth and integrity.

In the county of Huntington this fact has been demonstrated by the Huntington Press, a paper published in the interest of true Democracy, which has been an important factor in every political battle and prior to 1914 won every political contest waged. Its editor, Martin Homer Ormsby, is a native of Indiana and was born on the 17th day of November, 1875. He attended the public schools of Bluffton and later continued his studies at Boston Latin School, Boston.

On the 17th day of November, 1899, Mr. Ormsby was united in marriage to Miss Erdine Bock, the ceremony being solemnized at her home in Argos, Indiana. Their home was established in the city of Huntington, where they have remained and gathered about them a wide circle of friends.

Mr. Ormsby has, throughout his career, labored zealously and loyally for the general upbuilding and progress of the community, forwarding the various movements which have arisen from time to time to this end and voicing through his paper those principles which make for clean citizenship and right thinking.

GEORGE R. OSBORN, M. D.

Few citizens of Laporte county are not familiar with the name of Dr. George R. Osborn, one of the most skillful physicians and surgeons of that locality.

Although the parents of Dr. Osborn were natives of this state, he himself was born in Iowa on the 17th day of February, 1875. At the age of two years, however, he was brought by his parents to Laporte county, and here he was reared. He attended the public schools of his district and later continued his studies at Valparaiso University. Then followed a course in the science of medicine at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, University of Illinois.

Following his graduation in the year 1906, he returned to the city of Laporte and entered into active practice.

During the year 1908 he served as secretary of the city board of health, but on the first day of the following January he assumed the duties of county coroner, a position to which he had been elected twice, serving four years. So efficient were his services in behalf of the public during these years that at the expiration of his two terms as coroner he was immediately appointed to the office of county health commissioner for a term of four years, this period to expire January 1, 1918.

Mrs. Osborn, to whom he was married December 24, 1895, was formerly Miss Adel Bunnell.

JOHN E. OSBORN

John E. Osborn, a prominent attorney of Greensburg, is a product of Decatur county, his birth having occurred within its confines on the 25th day of August, 1872. There also his childhood and youth were spent, his education being obtained in the public schools of his district. Later he took a course in law and he was admitted to the bar in May, 1897. During the period from December, 1891, to March, 1896, he served as deputy county auditor of Decatur county; and throughout his career has been prominently identified with the various movements for the furtherance of the Democratic cause in his community. A man of unusual ability as an organizer and director, he was early recognized as such by the leaders of his party and was appointed a member of the state central committee, assuming his duties on the first of January, 1908, and serving until January, 1912, representing the sixth congressional district. In the year 1910 he took a very active part in the campaign of Finley Gray as candidate for congressman from his district, visiting all the counties and building up the working organizations of the party.

Mr. Osborn in manner is sincere and direct, a convincing speaker and an able thinker. His wife was Miss Grace Gullifer, and they have won for themselves a wide circle of friends since their marriage. Fraternally, he is allied with the Elks Lodge of Greensburg, among whom he has a wide acquaintance and numerous friends.

CHARLES A. PADDOCK, M. D.

Dr. Charles A. Paddock, of Portland, was born in Randolph county on the 7th day of March, 1874, and attended the public schools of Winchester. After his graduation there, a two years' course was taken at the Ridgeville College. This was followed by a course at the Physio-Medical College of Indiana, from which he was graduated in the year 1901. Six years later he filled the chair of anatomy in the same college, teaching until 1938. Following his graduation from this institution, Dr. Paddock engaged in the active practice of medicine, and is at the present time a successful physician of Portland, notwithstanding the various other duties which he has assumed.

In the year 1909 Dr. Paddock was elected mayor of the city of Portland, receiving a majority of 320, the largest ever received by any candidate of either party in this city. At this time, also, the poll of the city showed a Republican majority of 120. At the expiration of his four-year term of office, in 1913, he was again nominated, the election being bitterly fought and his opponent being a life-long Democrat who headed a citizens' ticket composed of all opposing factions, and at this time Dr. Paddock increased his majority by five votes, being elected for a further term of four years.

Dr. Paddock is a member of the Portland Commercial Club, a member of the Jay County Medical Society, and in the year 1912 served as treasurer of the Physio-Medical Association. He is also affiliated with the Loyal Order of Moose, the Fraternal Order of Eagles, Knights of the Maccabees and the Woodmen of the World. Mrs. Paddock, to whom he was married on December 24, 1894, was Miss Pearl M. Edwards.

JOHN R. PAINE

The present postmaster of the city of Clinton, John R. Paine, came to his position well qualified for the fulfillment of the duties involved, and has throughout his service maintained a high standard of efficiency in his office.

Mr. Paine's life has been spent in this locality. He was born on October 15, 1869; attended the common schools of his home district, and later entered Clinton high school, from which he was graduated. His youth was spent upon the farm, until he attained the age of twenty-three years, but he was compelled to leave school before completing his education to assist in the support of his father's family. While but a boy he was appointed by Governor Claude Matthews to the position of messenger to the secretary of state.

In the year 1900 Mr. Paine assumed the duties of secretary and treasurer of the city of Clinton, serving in this capacity for a term of two years; and in the fall of 1909 was elected councilman-at-large, and for four years took an active part in the work of the city council. On March 10, 1914, he received the postmaster's commission from President Wilson, and his ability in the discharge of the duties pertaining to this office is well known.

For many years Mr. Paine was a retail hardware merchant at Clinton and has been active in the business life of the place. He is a member of Clinton Commercial Club and is affiliated with the fraternal orders of Free and Accepted Masons, Jerusalem Lodge No. 99; Royal Arch Masons, Vermilion Chapter No. 125; Clinton Commandery No. 148, Knights Templar, and the Independent Order of Eagles. On the 19th day of October, 1898, Mr. Paine was united in marriage to Miss Ella Scott.

JUDGE JOHN M. PARIS

To any citizen of Floyd county the name of John M. Paris is a familiar one, as he was actively in the service of the commonwealth, holding various positions of prominence for many years.

Judge Paris was born in the little town of Leavenworth, Indiana, on the 7th day of March, 1878, and his schooling was largely received in the public schools of this place. Following his graduation here he entered the law department of the University of Louisville, and completed the course in 1899, taking up the active practice of his profession and meeting with unusual success.

Six years after his admission to the bar he was elected city judge, serving in this capacity until the office was abolished by act of the legislature four years later. At the time of his election to this position the Democratic candidate for mayor and city clerk were defeated, but Judge Paris ran 1,050 votes ahead of his ticket and won the contest. In the year 1912 he was elected prosecuting attorney, and served for two years, being renominated in the fall of 1914 for the same position, but resigned in order that he might make the race for judge, his nomination to this position having taken place at a special primary held August 14, 1914.

Judge Paris was affiliated with the Jefferson Lodge No. 104, F. and A. M.; Chapter No. 7, Royal Arch Masons; New Albany Commandery No. 5, Knights Templar; the B. P. O. Elks; the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Manzinetta Tribe No. 276, Red Men, and Friendship Lodge No. 10, Knights of Pythias.

He was a self-made man, paying his college expenses largely through his own efforts. His wife was Miss Lucile Denton, and their marriage took place May 31, 1908.

ISAAC KANE PARKS

Isaac Kane Parks, one of the most prominent attorneys of northern Indiana, was born September 10, 1879, on the old Santa Fe Trail in eastern Kansas. After completing his studies in the common schools of his native state, Mr. Parks entered Kansas University, where he graduated from the law department in 1897. Coming to South Bend shortly after, he entered the law office of the late Senator B. F. Shively, where he remained for about three years. He then entered upon his journalistic career in the office of the Mishawaka Democrat. In April, 1907, he was appointed assistant prosecuting attorney for St. Joseph county by Joseph E. Talbot, prosecuting attorney. Mr. Parks was admitted to the bar in Kansas, and after coming to Indiana, though under legal age, he was allowed, through courtesy of the court, to continue his practice here. His first case in Indiana, tried before his majority, was against three leading lawyers, now holding responsible positions, one being on the federal bench and one a past attorney-general of Indiana. The suit involved a question of technical practice. The lawyers settled for the loss of their client.

Mr. Parks is a member of the Masonic order. He has always stood high in the councils of his party and been an important factor in the development of his community. He recently served as city attorney of Mishawaka.

JUDGE WILLIAM H. PAYNTER

Among the leaders in the Democracy of Washington county the name of William H. Paynter holds high rank. A man of broad experience, deep culture and unquestioned integrity, his influence in the councils of the party has been marked.

Judge Paynter is a native Hoosier. His childhood was passed and his schooling received in the public schools of Indiana. Following his graduation from the high school, he entered Indiana State University, matriculating in the law department, and graduating in 1880. In the same year he was admitted to the bar of Washington county and entered into the active practice of his profession at Salem. Here his loyalty to his clients, keen perception in regard to intricate questions involved and patience in research won for him a rapidly growing and lucrative practice.

On the 1st day of May, 1884, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Maggie Hobbs, the daughter of G. B. Hobbs, and their permanent home was established in Salem. Two children have been born to them, a daughter, now Mrs. Ora V. Leridan, and a son, La Rue; and they have drawn about them a wide circle of devoted friends, who have enjoyed their hospitality.

In the year 1880 he assumed the duties of prosecuting attorney and in this capacity served for four years. In 1895 he became county attorney, and this position was held until 1912, a remarkable record. Later he was elected to the position of judge of the 42d Judicial Circuit of Indiana, and the responsibilities of this position have been discharged with rare zeal.

Fraternally, he is allied with the Knights of Pythias.

WILLETT H. PARR

The gentleman whose name appears at the head of this article is a representative citizen of Lebanon, Boone county. He is a native of the Hoosier State, born on the 24th day of December, 1878. His childhood was spent in Boone county, where he attended the public schools, later continuing his studies at the State Normal School at Terre Haute and the Marion Normal School of Marion, Ind. On the 16th day of July, 1899, he was married to Miss Carrie B. Billingsly. In the fall of 1908 he was elected to the responsible position of judge of the circuit court of Boone county for a term of six years, and this position he has filled conscientiously with credit to himself and his constituents, who showed their faith in him by re-electing him to this office in November, 1914, for another term of six years.

WILLIAM T. PATTEN

William T. Patten was born in Sullivan county, Indiana, August 10, 1867. Following the county graded and high schools he graduated with a bachelor of arts degree from Indiana University in 1893. Prior to his attending college he taught school in Sullivan county, in 1887 and 1888. He moved from Sullivan county to Indianapolis in 1895 and engaged in the real estate business until 1908, when he was appointed chief deputy auditor of Marion county, serving for four years under Auditor Albert Sahn.

In 1910 he was elected auditor of Marion county, taking office in 1912 and serving until 1916. He was one of the most efficient officers who ever held the position in Marion county.

EDGAR ALMON PERKINS

From 1890 and for a good many years following, Edgar Almon Perkins was one of the leading Democratic workers of the State. For these same years he was also most conspicuous among organized laboring forces, serving from 1893 to 1913 as president of the state federation of labor for Indiana. He resigned in the latter year.

Two of his sons were in the war with Germany, Harry B. Perkins being commissioned a lieutenant of infantry at twenty-four, and Edgar A. Perkins, Jr., enlisting as a private at twenty-two. A third son who wished to go with his brothers, although married and the head of a family, was refused because of defective sight, having shot himself in one eye when a youngster.

Edgar Almon Perkins was born in Indianapolis in 1866. He began work as a printer in 1879, when but thirteen years of age, and this remained his business all his life, working steadily at the trade until 1913, when he was named to his first political office by Governor Samuel M. Ralston.

He was named the chairman of the legislative committee of the state federation of labor in 1893, and two years later was elected president of the same organization. From 1893 to 1913, at which time he retired as a federation official, all labor legislation that was proposed was either drafted by him or passed through his hands. Even after 1913, while in public office, he was consulted on all such matters though not in active charge. It was during these years that important labor legislation was enacted, Indiana taking the lead of the states in all such matters.

In 1913 he was named chief of the bureau of inspection of Indiana by Governor Ralston, having drawn the bill under which the bureau was formed. Two years later, in 1915, he was named a member and president of the state industrial board for one year, and at the end of the year was named for four years to the same position. He had also had an active part in the framing of the bill creating this department, and in drafting the rules under which the board worked, the Indiana board was recognized throughout the Union as a model, a large number of the states sending their members and working forces to Indianapolis to copy the rules and methods.

Mr. Perkins was also president for eight consecutive terms of the Indianapolis Typographical Union.

CHARLES HAMILTON PETERS

A resident of Starke county since his early childhood and for many years a prominent attorney at law in the town of Knox, Charles Hamilton Peters needs no introduction to the citizens of that locality.

Mr. Peters is a native of the state of Virginia, born in Harrisonburg, Rockingham county, October 8, 1861. In infancy, however, he was brought by his parents to Indiana. They located in Starke county, where his boyhood was spent and where his schooling was received. After a comprehensive course of study of the law, he was admitted to the bar of Starke county and entered into the active practice of this profession.

On April 9, 1882, Mr. Peters was united in marriage to Miss Ada Bell Dukes, of Winamac, Ind. Mr. and Mrs. Peters have a son, Glenn D. Peters, now also a practicing attorney, located at Hammond, Ind.

Mr. Peters has ever been a staunch supporter of the principles of Democracy, and has always exerted the weight of his influence in behalf of the cause.

HAL C. PHELPS

Hal C. Phelps, a valued worker in the Democratic party, was born at Bennett's Switch, Miami county, on the 24th day of December, 1876. His schooling was received in the public schools of his district, and later, in 1895, a year's course of work was taken at the Marion Normal College, of Marion. Then followed continued work at the Tri-State Normal College of Angola, and later a course of study at Hull's School of Manatan, Ohio. In the year 1900 he entered Vories' Business College at Indianapolis; and in 1907 he graduated from the law department of the University of Valparaiso. In the same year he was admitted to practice in the supreme court, and his work since as an attorney has evidenced marked ability in the profession.

During the period from 1908 to 1911 he served as acting deputy prosecuting attorney, and on the 2nd day of May, 1912, was appointed by Governor Marshall to fill the unexpired term of prosecuting attorney of the 51st judicial district of Indiana, comprised of Miami county. In the fall of this year he was elected to this position, and in this capacity has since served, having been again elected to the same office on November 3, 1914.

WILLIAM PICKETT

William Pickett has proven himself an active, aggressive citizen, a capable official and always a loyal Democratic worker. He was born in Logansport on the 30th day of June, 1873; and here his education was received in the public and parochial schools of the place. In his youth he was engaged in the clothing business, continuing until January, 1910, when he assumed the duties of city clerk. So ably did he administer the affairs of this office that he was re-elected in the fall of 1913, his term of office to expire January 1, 1918.

Mr. Pickett is unmarried, the son of Patrick and Mary Pickett, the former deceased. He is affiliated with the fraternal orders of Elks, Knights of Columbus and Eagles.

BERTRAM W. PICKHARDT

The name of Pickhardt is a familiar one to the residents of Huntingburg and vicinity, the family being a prominent one. Ernest W. Pickhardt, the father of the subject of this article, is the popular editor of the Huntingburg Signal; and in the literary atmosphere of a refined home the young man laid the foundation for a life of culture and usefulness.

Bertram W. Pickhardt was born on the 30th day of July, 1889, in the city of Huntingburg. Here his childhood was spent, and here he received his first schooling, attending the common and later the high school of the town, his graduation here being followed by a course in law at the Indiana University at Bloomington. In the winter of 1913, when but twenty-four years of age, he received the honor of being appointed enrolling clerk for the legislature; and the following June received from President Wilson the appointment of postmaster of the city of Huntingburg, he being at that time the youngest man ever appointed to a third-class office. Mr. Pickhardt, like his father, has, since attaining his majority, striven for the success of the Democratic party, being much in demand during the campaign as a speaker, and considered throughout this congressional district as a great orator. He is also an active member of the order of Woodmen of the World, among whom he is widely known and highly esteemed. The legal profession of the district has gained, in this young man, a brilliant recruit, and in his chosen work he will in all probability continue to bring credit upon himself and his constituents.

ERNEST W. PICKHARDT

Few residents of Dubois county and its vicinity are not familiar with the name and the work of Ernest W. Pickhardt, the present editor of the Huntingburg Signal, and deputy oil inspector.

He was born at Huntingburg on the 24th day of May, 1861, and his entire life has been spent as a citizen of this commonwealth. His education was received in its schools, and here his work has been accomplished. On the 11th day of December, 1884, he was united in marriage to Miss Caroline Moenkhaus, and to their home have come a daughter and three sons, completing a family circle which has stood for the best and noblest in life, true culture and refinement.

During the year 1885 he served as town clerk of Huntingburg; and in the fall of 1888 was elected as representative to the legislature of Indiana from Dubois and Martin counties. In 1890 he was re-elected to this position from a district composed of Dubois, Orange and Lawrence counties. In the year 1893 he was appointed a director of the southern prison at Jeffersonville by Governor Claude Matthews, serving for a term of two years, and has for four terms served as a member of the school board.

He is perhaps best known, however, by his work as editor of the Signal, which he published in German from the year 1889 to May 1, 1914, at which time the E. W. Pickhardt Printing Co. was formed and the publication of the paper in English was established. During the period between 1890 and 1905 Mr. Pickhardt was also the publisher of the Huntingburg News, this being issued in English.

He is a member of the Evangelical Lutheran church and is affiliated with the order of Woodmen of the World.

WILL H. PIGG

Having attained success in the educational field and later distinguished himself as an attorney at law, the name of Will H. Pigg of Martinsville needs no introduction to the citizens of Morgan county.

He was born in Sullivan county, Indiana, on the 20th day of November, 1871, and attended the public schools of his district. At the age of fourteen years he entered the business world, and earned his way through the higher departments of school. A course was later pursued at the Central Normal College of Danville, and his work in the educational field covered a period of nine years. A two-year law course was completed by him in seven and one-half months, and he was admitted to the bar of Morgan county in 1896. On the 1st of January, 1910, he assumed the duties of county attorney, a position which he held until 1915, with great credit and satisfaction to his constituents and the community at large.

His grandfather was born and reared in Tennessee.

Mrs. Pigg was formerly Miss Julia A. Reeves, of Hyde Park, Cincinnati, Ohio.

C. R. POLLARD

Seldom is it the good fortune of an individual to be honored by the offer of various positions in the service of the commonwealth until so many years of his life are spent in the service of the public that he is driven to refuse further honors. Such has been the unique experience of Judge C. R. Pollard of Delphi.

Judge Pollard is a true son of the South, born in Alabama, August 9, 1845, the son of Robert P. Pollard and Lydia Garrett Pollard. He attended the common schools of the city of Mobile, and later attended the Tuscaloosa Military Academy, being at the latter school at the beginning of the Civil war. He fought in the Confederate army, engaging in many of the great battles, and surrendering at Meridian, Miss., to Gen. U. S. Canby.

In 1865 he came to Delphi and served as deputy clerk from 1865 to 1867, inclusive. On March 18, 1868, he was married to Miss Lillie M. Piggman of Delphi, and three children were born of this union, one of whom, Mrs. R. M. Isherwood, is now living. In 1869 he was appointed prosecuting attorney of his county by Governor Hendricks, and in 1870 was elected to the same position, serving until 1872. In 1892 he was a delegate to the national convention which nominated Grover Cleveland to the Presidency, and in 1895 was appointed associate justice of the supreme court of Montana. Following his term of service there, he returned to Delphi, Indiana, and engaged in the practice of law, in which profession he has met with remarkable success. During his career he has been employed as attorney in 24 murder cases, including the famous Mabbitt case at Indianapolis in 1892, and assisted in the prosecution of the only man ever hung in Carroll county.

Judge Pollard is affiliated with the I. O. O. F. and K. of P. lodges, and is a member of the Episcopal church. He is also one of the most popular members of the Jackson club at Lafayette; and was for many years city and county attorney. Judge Pollard has a large practice, being engaged upon one side of every important civil and criminal case tried in his county, a great orator, and one of the best lawyers in the Wabash valley.

ROBERT E. PROCTOR

Robert E. Proctor was one of the young men of the Democratic party in Indiana who early came to a conspicuous place in the political affairs of the state. He was elected a member of the state senate in 1908, the same year Thomas R. Marshall was chosen governor, succeeding a long list of Republicans at the head of the state government.

In the two sessions of the general assembly in which he represented the Elkhart district, Senator Proctor was prominent as a leader, and his ability as a speaker kept him constantly to the front. Because of this prominence, and for his independence of action on all subjects, he was a special mark for the Republican press of Indianapolis and the state. He was always a Democrat who believed in the party of which he was a member, and was ready to fight for the things for which it stood.

Robert E. Proctor first acquired an acquaintance in state politics as the campaign manager for Colonel Conn of Elkhart, who was a candidate for the nomination for governor on the Democratic ticket in 1908. Colonel Conn not being the choice of any part of the regular party organization, young Proctor resorted to the use of printer's ink. He filled the newspapers of Indiana with lavish advertisements setting out the claims of his candidate to the support of the state delegates. But he fell short of the mark in results when the convention came to voting, for the delegates were not in sympathy with many of the advanced notions which the Colonel had advocated. To the members of the party who were selecting the candidate he looked too much as Governor Hanly had looked to the Republicans—one who might be the cause of much internal striving.

But Proctor succeeded in being elected to the state senate and was always one of the most active and effective advocates in that body. He was an able young attorney and successful in forcing many of his ideas on important legislation on his associates.

Robert E. Proctor was born in Elkhart, February 15, 1883. His father was Robert T. Proctor, a native of Ohio, and his mother had been Miss Catherine Cavanan, a native of Ireland. He was educated at St. Vincent's parochial school and the Elkhart high school, and secured his degree in law from the University of Notre Dame in 1904. Twenty-one years of age, he began practicing law at Elkhart, the year of his graduation. For eighteen months he was associated with C. C. Raymer, and then until 1912 he practiced alone, forming a partnership in the latter year with Verne G. Cawley, under the style of Proctor & Cawley.

He acquired the habit of hustling for himself while going through school, getting through the university by waiting on tables, acting as correspondent for various newspapers, serving as one of the editors of the Notre Dame Scholastic, the college weekly, and being employed in various capacities by the New York Central Railroad. The remainder of his time was spent in study and recitation.

He was a member of the Indiana State Bar Association, the Indiana Democratic Club, Knights of Columbus, Elks, Eagles and Moose.

He was married in 1905 to Miss Evalyn A. Smith, of Huntington, Indiana.

JAMES S. PRITCHETT

For many years an honored official of the city of Vincennes and a leading citizen of Knox county, the late James S. Pritchett was a native of this State, born in Warrenton, Gibson county, July 18, 1844. In his infancy, however, his parents moved to Illinois and there he remained and attended the schools of his home district until he reached the age of thirteen years, when he moved to Knox county with his family.

Following his graduation from the public schools Mr. Pritchett entered and was graduated from Hanover College. Then followed three years of work at the University of Vincennes, during which time he completed the regular four-year course of study.

On September 11, 1872, Mr. Pritchett was united in marriage to Miss Ella Wise. To that union were born three children, two of whom are now living.

Prior to his entrance to Vincennes University Mr. Pritchett taught school for eighteen months. After his graduation he became engaged in the practice of law. He evinced marked ability in the practice of this profession and became more than locally known as an orator. Indeed, it is said he was recognized as the leading speaker in his home county, and his services as an orator were greatly in demand on patriotic occasions, soldiers' reunions and the like, as well as during political campaigns. He also was well known as a friend of union labor, and often was called upon to speak at Labor day celebrations and similar gatherings.

For a period of sixteen years Mr. Pritchett served as a member of the city council. He later was elected to the office of mayor of Vincennes and served in that capacity for six years with great credit.

Fraternally, Mr. Pritchett was allied with the Odd Fellows, Red Men, Knights of Pythias and Elks. He often was a delegate to party conventions.

ROYAL E. PURCELL

Royal E. Purcell was for forty-two years editor of the Western Sun, published at Vincennes. He was born July 26, 1849, in a small farm house in Johnson township, Knox county, two miles east of Purcell Station, which was named for his father's uncle, Andrew Purcell, who lived on a farm at that point. He was the youngest of four children. His father died in 1850, less than one year after his birth. His education was secured in the very crudest of country schools. They were not public schools, but of the old subscription class where a teacher or an individual with small qualifications would secure a number of pupils and teach them for very small pay for two or three months of the year. When he was able to finish his common school education he attended the first public school in that section of the country at Sand Hill. He finished this part of his studies at home preparing himself for a higher education, securing a license to teach and getting a position at $1.75 per day, riding on horse back from his home to the school house where he taught. Between working on the farm and teaching this school he was able to secure enough money to take him through Hanover College. Upon leaving college young Purcell's ambition was to engage in newspaper work or journalism. Seeing no possible chance of entering immediately upon that work he went to Vincennes and studied law, later being admitted to the bar and taking the partnership with W. B. Robinson under the firm name of Robinson & Purcell. At the end of two years he found himself practicing alone and, according to his own story many years afterwards, he was earning approximately $100 per month, which made life worth while. It was at this point that he had an opportunity to enter journalism. Several friends came to him and announced that the Western Sun, the newspaper which he was destined to own for the remainder of his life, was for sale. The price was $6,000. His former partner and two other men agreed to advance the money and allow him to pay it back out of the profits of the business. He began as the editor of the Sun in 1876. It was a weekly paper at the time he acquired ownership and in 1879 he established it as a daily, putting up a building in which to publish it in 1881.

When Mr. Purcell retired a few years before his death, which occurred in 1918, his son, Royal E. Purcell, Jr., succeeded him as the editor and head of the paper. He was an active member of the Democratic organization in Knox county all his life. He served as president of the State Editorial Association, many times was chosen on the executive committee of the National Editorial Association and was an Indiana member of the Chicago World's Columbian Exposition in 1892 and 1893. He was postmaster at Vincennes in 1893 and 1897 and served two seasons as state senator, being elected in 1899 and 1901. He was trustee of the Vincennes University, member of the Board of Trustees at Hanover College, president and director of the Second National Bank at Vincennes, director of the Vincennes Light and Power Company, director of the Knox County Home Telephone Company, and connected with many other business enterprises.

O. A. PURSLEY

Orville Andrew Pursley was born in Fayette county, Ohio, November 6, 1885. His parents moved to Indiana when he was an infant and resided on a farm near Hartford City. His early life was spent in laboring on his father's farm in the summertime and attending the rural school in the winter. At an early age he graduated from the rural schools of Blackford county, where all of his early training was procured, and began at once to work his way through college in an effort to prepare for the legal profession. His preparation extended over a period of eleven years, as he was forced to spend part of his time in the schoolroom teaching in an effort to obtain money to defray his expenses in college. He attended the Marion Normal College, from which place he obtained his high school training, his B. S. degree and a diploma in the law and scientific course. He later completed his college training by obtaining the degree of bachelor of laws in the McKinley University of Chicago, Illinois.

He became active upon the side of Democracy with his majority and has been since that time precinct committeeman. In 1913 he was appointed deputy prosecutor, and in 1914 was elected city attorney by the common council of the city of Montpelier, Indiana, for a period of four years.

He is known as one of the most active workers in the party, as well as one of the leading young attorneys of his home county.

Mr. Pursley was married to Miss Crystal Van Gordon, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John M. Van Gordon, on November 8, 1907.

SAMUEL GORDON PURDY

Samuel Gordon Purdy is an active worker among the younger element of the Indiana Democracy and is also actively interested in the commercial life of Valparaiso, where he is well known as a leading electrical contractor.

Mr. Purdy is a native of this state, born on the 5th day of August, 1884. He attended the public schools of Valparaiso and graduated from the high school of that city. Early in life he became interested in the science of electricity and perfected himself along this line of work. In the year 1909 he was appointed electrical inspector for the Indiana Inspection Bureau, serving in this capacity until 1911. In the fall of 1913 he was elected to membership in the city council and has been an active member of this body since.

Mrs. Purdy, to whom he was married January 4, 1908, was Miss Maud M. Crowther.

ALEXANDER N. PURSLEY

One of the best-known party workers in Hartford City is Alexander N. Pursley, chairman of the Democratic county central committee, who has always been a Democrat, actively participated in politics even before he became a voter, and has since maintained an unflagging interest in the welfare of the party.

Mr. Pursley was born in Fayette county, Ohio, March 3, 1878, his parents being natives of Ohio. When he was nine years of age they moved to Indiana and settled on a farm in Blackford county. His education was acquired in the county schools, and he was married to Miss Mary J. Sloan on September 26, 1896. They have seven children, all of whom have unusual natural musical ability.

Mr. and Mrs. Pursley moved from the farm to Hartford City in 1897, when Mr. Pursley entered the retail grocery business, to which he gave the same thoughtful and energetic attention that he had given to farming, resulting in an ever-growing business. To an engaging personality, Mr. Pursley adds the natural qualities of a "booster" and evident executive ability. For the past three years he has been elected general manager of the Hartford City Merchants and Farmers' Festival Association. Served as a member of the city council from 1906 until 1909 and as township trustee from 1908 to 1914. He was also elected county chairman in 1912, and re-elected in 1914, and is president of the Indiana Trustees' Association. He is an active member of the Hartford City Commercial Club, Knights of Columbus, K. O. T. M., Red Men, Elks, Eagles and Moose.

JUDGE JAMES M. PURVIS

Judge Purvis has served with distinction on the circuit bench of the 36th judicial circuit, and has been for a number of years an honored official in the service of the commonwealth; and in the various positions to which he has been called he has demonstrated a keen intelligence, loyalty to the public interest and unflagging energy, which have placed him high in the esteem of the community.

Judge Purvis was born on the 4th day of July, 1863. He attended the public schools of Tipton county and later continued his studies at the Central Normal College of Danville. A course in law was acquired in local offices in the city of Tipton, Ind., and in the year 1888 he was admitted to the bar of Tipton county and entered into the practice of this profession in the city of Tipton.

On the 14th day of April, 1897, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Adonis B. Clark, to which union were born five boys, all now living, and their permanent home was established also in this city; and in the same year he served his county as representative in the state legislature. In the year 1907 he was appointed city attorney, and in this capacity served for three and one-half years, and later served as county attorney for a term of two years.

On the 30th day of August, 1912, he assumed the duties of his present high position, and as circuit judge has established an enviable record. His term of service expires January 1, 1919.

PERRY A. RANDALL

Perry A. Randall is known all over Northeastern Indiana as the great advocate of the proposed Chicago and Lake Erie canal, but his intense advocacy of the project is directed toward having the canal pass through Fort Wayne.

He has addressed committees of Congress on this subject and is untiring in his efforts to educate the people of his city and county on the canal and its value to commerce. Mr. Randall was prepared for college at the Fort Wayne High School, entered Michigan University, and was graduated in 1871 after completing the classical course.

He then entered the law department of his alma mater and graduated in 1873, in which year, also, he was admitted to practice. In April, 1873, he settled in Fort Wayne, where he is one of the leading attorneys. He is also proprietor of the Randall hotel. He is a highly educated man, an able speaker and one of the most public-spirited men in the state.

He has always taken a keen interest in the city of Fort Wayne and was one of the principal organizers of the electric works for the city.

WILLIAM F. RANKE

William F. Ranke has served as treasurer of Allen county, and has long been recognized as a representative citizen of Ft. Wayne and has held various positions of responsibility and trust in the service of the commonwealth.

Mr. Ranke is a native Hoosier, born in Allen county on the 20th day of January, 1865. He was educated in the German Lutheran schools, entered the M. E. College of that place for a commercial course and later entered the University of Michigan, matriculating in the pharmacy department.

In the fall of 1906 he was elected state senator from Allen county to the Indiana legislature, and in the assembly which followed, and in the session of 1909 was an active participant. In 1908 he assumed the duties of deputy county treasurer, and in the fall of 1915 was elected county treasurer.

In military circles he is widely known as captain of the Indiana Battery Spanish-American War, and captain 39th Infantry U. S. Volunteers, 1899, and post department commander of United Spanish War Veterans.

SAMUEL MOFFETT RALSTON

Samuel Moffett Ralston was born December 1, 1857, on a farm at New Cumberland, Tuscarawas county, Ohio, the son of John and Sarah (Scott) Ralston. In 1865 his parents moved to Owen county, Indiana, living there for eight years. They afterwards moved to Pontanet, Ind., where the father took a coal lease and sunk a shaft with the assistance of his son, but a short while afterwards they moved back to Owen county, near Lancaster, the postoffice being Patrickburg, where they resided on a farm.

In 1876, at the age of nineteen, the younger Ralston began teaching school, afterwards spending one term at Valparaiso, and graduating from the Central Normal College at Danville in 1884. In this year he began reading law with Robinson & Fowler at Spencer, Owen county, Indiana, and January 1, 1886, was admitted to the bar. He located at Lebanon, Ind., in June, 1886, forming a partnership with John A. Abbott, these two practicing together for two years. He then formed a partnership with Michael Keefe, this partnership existing until Mr. Keefe's death in 1899, from which time Mr. Ralston practiced alone.

Mr. Ralston was a presidential elector in 1892 and cast one of Indiana's electoral votes in 1889 for the re-election of Grover Cleveland as President of the United States. While living in Lebanon Mr. Ralston was President of the Lebanon School Board from 1908 to 1911.

He was a candidate for Governor of Indiana before the Democratic state convention in 1908, but was defeated for the nomination by Thomas R. Marshall, now Vice-President of the United States. At the Democratic state convention in 1912 Mr. Ralston was practically the unanimous choice of his party for Governor and was nominated and elected Governor in that year. He was inaugurated on the 13th day of January, 1913, his term expiring on the 9th day of January, 1917. During his administration the State debt, long a subject of discussion by political parties, was liquidated in full and the State for the first time in 82 years put out of debt; and upon leaving the office of Governor he turned over to his successor a cash balance largely in excess of three million dollars. Mr. Ralston takes pride in the character of the legislation enacted during his administration. It was progressive. He is content to let his record as Governor speak for itself. He was Indiana's first Centennial Governor.

On December 30, 1889, he married Jennie Craven of Hendricks county, Indiana. To them three children have been born, Emmet Grattan, Julian Craven and Ruth.

EDWARD B. RAUB

For many years a prominent attorney of Indianapolis and actively engaged in municipal affairs, Mr. Edward B. Raub has also contributed largely to the success of the Marion county democracy.

He was born on the 23rd day of December, 1871, at Chalmers, Indiana. He entered DePauw University, receiving the degree of Ph. B. in 1894. In the following year he graduated from the Indiana Law School and entered into the practice of law in Indianapolis. In 1903 he was appointed city attorney for a term of two years, and in the years 1910 and 1911 and again in 1915 held the position of county attorney for Marion county. From 1905 to 1909 he also served the party as chairman. At present, in addition to his work as county attorney, he continues his practice, serving also as general counsel for the Indianapolis Life Insurance Company.

He is affiliated with the college fraternity Delta Upsilon and the legal fraternity Delta Chi; also the Scottish Rite Masons, Indianapolis Consistory; Murat Temple Mystic Shrine; Raper Commandery Knights Templar; and is a member of the board of governors of the board of trade.

Mrs. Raub, to whom he was married December 28th, 1898, was formerly Miss Martha Drapier, of the city of Indianapolis.

JOHN RAUCH

Closely identified with the business life of Indianapolis for many years and later the incumbent of a position of great responsibility in the service of the commonwealth, the name of Mr. John Rauch is well known throughout Marion county and vicinity.

Mr. Rauch is a native of Franklin county, Indiana, his birth having occurred within its confines on the 4th day of August, 1850. Here, in the little town of Southgate, in Highland township, he received his schooling.

At the age of twenty-one years, however, he entered into the cigar manufacturing business in the city of Indianapolis, and here he has since remained, his business increasing in volume as the years have passed, and his influence as a business man of integrity and sterling worth growing also.

On the 18th day of May, 1875, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Mary Catherine Schoen of Cincinnati, and their home, then established in Indianapolis, has never ceased to extend hospitality to many devoted friends.

In the fall of 1910 he was elected to the position of clerk of the circuit court of Marion county, and assumed the duties of office on the first day of the following January. In this capacity he served for a term of four years, bringing to the work conscientious zeal and progressive methods.

Since attaining his majority he has been a consistent adherent to the principles of Democracy, and has labored faithfully and loyally during the various campaigns for the furtherance of the cause, rendering especially valued service to the local organization in late years.

HERMAN RAVE

If variety lends spice to life, Herman Rave must have been filled with peppery things that kept stirring. He said of himself that he was so accustomed to putting off until tomorrow that but for the interest manifested by his friends he would probably not have been a candidate for sheriff of Clark county until after election days had passed in 1898 and 1900. Since the friends interested themselves in his behalf he was elected and re-elected to the office by majorities which were unusual even in this county of Democrats. He declared the Republicans and Democrats seemed to have united to make him keep up with the days of the month.

Mr. Rave was born in the city of Kiel of "well born and honest parents" by his own admissions. He first attended the preparatory school of the university "where they tried to pound Latin" into him. In his own story, told in his easy chair and smoking his pipe, he explained this was not among the possibilities. "There must have remained some drop of the old Pirates of Kiel, the Victuallers of Victual Brothers as they were called, who very often went to assist the Baltic princes in their quarrels, or of the old rovers who made it uncomfortable for King Arthur and others, for at the age of thirteen I was permitted to go to Mexico. Had to return at sixteen and put in my martyrdom with tutورش in mathematics and learning, or supposed to be learning bookkeeping.

"United state next in 1867. Horrified Mother Steinway by declaring my intention of shipping on a lumber schooner. Instead, went to railroading with shovel and pick, and laughed at my indignant relatives, who thought I ought to be a railroad president, but gave me up for incurable. All this time I had a notion that the writing of verses was my mission, but my old habit of waiting until the next day saved the public that time.

"Cincinnati was next made happy, and there I worked at a number of things, until finally I went broke one winter and took a job to milk cows for Reuben Dailey, then owner of the Jeffersonville News, with whom I remained over twenty years. I turned the hand press in the afternoons and the rest of the time wrote the news of the town in verse and prose, and got subscribers. One day I woke up and found the Democrats had nominated me for sheriff, against my wishes, but was elected by the biggest majority cast in many years. They nominated and elected me again, this time the Republicans joining in the conspiracy to keep me working.

"It was funny, very funny. Instead of my treating the boys, they treated me and treated each other for me. I had no money in either campaign, so the boys spent theirs. I made my campaigns mostly on a bicycle, pitched hay for the farmers, told stories and talked very little politics, forgetting very often to tell them my designs on the office. Then the Democrats in the legislature gave me an extra six months' term. Watchaknowaboutthat?

"I quit politics to take a job firing a battery of boilers at Speers cement mills. Who ever heard of an officeholder doing a thing like that before? When I had got good and strong with a year of this the New Albany Ledger called me to handle some heavy editorials. Then I resigned and spent my time looking over some fool stocks that I bought with my salary when I was sheriff, because somebody who was a smart salesman told me how much money they would make for me. They all refused to rise by any ingredients I could ever inject into them; but why should I not always be happy with my pipe and arm chair, with no clock to order me around by striking the hours?"

JOHN M. RAWLEY

Few among the workers in the Democratic party in Indiana are more widely known or more highly honored by their constituents than Judge John M. Rawley of Brazil. Judge Rawley is essentially a Clay county man, having been born within its borders on the 6th day of April, 1862, attending its common schools, and eventually identifying himself closely with the political and business life of the community. He attended the Central Normal College of Danville, and on Christmas Day in the year 1901 was married to Miss Lenore Scofield. One child, a daughter, has come to their home, her birth occurring also on Christmas Day, 1903.

In the year 1896 he was elected prosecuting attorney on the Democratic ticket and re-elected in 1898. The ensuing eight years were spent in the practice of law, and during this period his acquaintance widened and his influence grew in the community. In 1906 he was elected circuit judge from Clay and Putnam counties, and in 1912 was re-elected for a term of six years, at this time receiving the remarkable majority of 2,160 votes in his own county.

Judge Rawley is a self-made man, having earned his education largely by teaching in the winter, spending his summers for eight years in school, studying diligently to perfect himself in the knowledge of his profession. He has, throughout his career, labored for the success of his party, and in 1902 and 1904 was county chairman of the Democratic committee. During the last state convention he represented the 5th Congressional District on the resolutions committee.

OREN A. RAWLINS

So closely has Oren A. Rawlins been identified with the business and political affairs of Jay county for the past score or more of years that his name is familiar to the majority of the residents of that community. He was born in Randolph county, March 5, 1871, and received his schooling in the district schools of that county.

On October 19, 1893, Mr. Rawlins was united in marriage to Miss Sarah G. Winters. He established his home in Portland, which has since remained the center of his interests.

Mr. Rawlins for many years has been a successful contractor and builder. He has been an active party worker since he attained his majority, has been a member of the county committee for nearly twenty years and served as county chairman in 1912. On July 1, 1914, he was appointed postmaster of Portland by President Wilson. He is an active member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

JAMES J. REEDER

James J. Reeder is a man of wide acquaintance throughout the county and has been closely identified with the development and growth of the community.

Mr. Reeder was born in Howard county on the 29th day of July, 1856, but came to Carroll county when but fifteen years of age, and since this time has taken an active interest in the municipal and civic affairs of his home township and county. He attended the public schools of Howard county, and later the common schools of his district in Carroll county, residing upon the farm of his parents in boyhood, and later engaging in the pursuit of agriculture for himself.

In the year of 1900 he was elected township trustee of Carrollton township, his term of office expiring in 1905. In December, 1909, he left the farm and moved to Camden, where he sold automobiles until June, 1910. At this time he assumed the duties of cashier of the Farmers' State Bank, and later became manager of the Farmers' Elevator. In 1912, however, he was elected clerk of Carroll county, a position which required his undivided attention. His term of office in this position will expire at the close of 1916.

Mr. Reeder is prominent in fraternal circles in Delphi and vicinity, having taken the degrees of Masonry up to the thirty-second, both ways; all degrees save the canton in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; the subordinate and uniform rank of Knights of Pythias.

In January, 1885, he was married to Miss Lilly C. Cornell, of Carroll county; and at the age of twenty-one became a member of the Presbyterian church. Five years later, however, his membership was changed to the Lutheran church where he is now an elder.

NORMAN W. C. REEVES

Many of our leading citizens have laid the foundation of a vigorous manhood in the life and labor of the agriculturist, and the subject of this article, Norman W. C. Reeves, is a representative of this class. He was born on the 16th day of June, 1855, on a farm in Rush county, this State, and in this environment he remained until he reached the age of thirty years. Here he received his schooling in the common schools and later attended the high school of Knightstown, Ind.

In the year 1885 he entered the drug business at Knightstown, and here his interests have since centered. Mr. Reeves is a lifelong Democrat and is descended from a line of Democratic ancestors. Although an active party worker, he never aspired to any office; but in the year 1912 he was elected representative to the legislature of the state from Henry county. He is a charter member of the Knightstown lodge of Knights of Pythias, and has held the position of master of exchequer since the organization was founded, in the year 1889; truly a remarkable record. He is also a charter member and treasurer of the uniform rank, Knights of Pythias.

JAMES REID

Judge James Reid needs no introduction to most of our readers, being a prominent citizen of Logansport, and for sixteen years a justice of the peace, and re-elected November 3, 1914, receiving the largest majority on his ticket. In his official capacity he has performed, in that time, many marriage ceremonies, five hundred and twenty-five prior to November 1, 1914; and has for this reason become known throughout the community as "the marrying 'squire." And the majority of lawsuits are filed in his court, more than seven hundred having been filed in the year 1914. Judge Reid was born and reared in White county, Indiana, moving to Logansport in the year 1882, since which time he has made this place his home. His birth occurred on the 27th day of July, 1856, and he has been twice married, his first wife being Miss Sarah

J. Smith, to whom he was united on the 20th of February, 1879; and the second Miss Mary L. Keis, whom he married October 19, 1903. He has for many years been actively engaged in the real estate, loan and insurance business, and at the present time is very actively engaged in colonizing and selling land in the fruit belt of Western Central Michigan.

JOHN G. REIDELBACH

An educator for fifteen years, an attorney at law for a decade, a practical agriculturist since his youth and a lifelong Democrat, is the record held by John G. Reidelbach, joint senator from Cass and Pulaski counties.

Senator Reidelbach is a native of Ohio, born on the 19th of August, 1872. He attended the public schools of this State until he reached the age of thirteen years, at which time he accompanied his parents to Pulaski county. Following his graduation from the public schools of Pulaski county he entered the State Normal at Terre Haute, and here laid the foundation of his work as an educator. Returning to his home county, he entered the educational field and taught in the county schools until the year 1904, at which time he was admitted to the bar and entered the active practice of law, having studied this profession at Valparaiso, Ind.

Born and reared on a farm, he has never lost his interest in agricultural affairs, and takes great pride in superintending the cultivation of three hundred acres of land in Pulaski county.

At the Democratic convention held by Cass and Pulaski counties at Logansport in April, 1914, he was nominated for joint senator by acclamation.

Mrs. Reidelbach, to whom he was married August 28, 1894, was formerly Miss Anna Higgins, and she has proven a worthy second in his various undertakings.

CHARLES G. REIFEL

The list of zealous Democratic adherents and prominent people of Franklin county would be incomplete were mention not made of Charles G. Reifel, a lifelong resident of this section and present auditor of the county.

Mr. Reifel was born on the 24th day of April, 1865, at Peppertown, Ind., and spent his childhood in this town, attending the schools of the place until he reached the period when a university course should be decided upon. At this time he entered the State Normal School at Terre Haute, taking a teacher's course of study.

On the 24th day of October, 1888, he was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Strasburger, and their home has since extended its hospitality to numerous friends.

In the fall of 1910 Mr. Reifel was elected to the position of auditor of Franklin county, his tenure of office to expire in 1914. At this time he was again nominated for this important service and again elected. During this period he has served with conscientious zeal, showing a progressive spirit in the administration of the affairs of his office.

He has, throughout his career, been a staunch Democrat, consistently voting the ticket and laboring for the furtherance of the cause at all times. He is secretary of the Democratic club of Butler township, and is also a member of the Indiana Democratic Club.

PATRICK REILLY

Patrick Reilly, one of the veteran business men of Hammond, was born in Verplanck's Point, N. Y., January 1, 1848, the son of James and Bridget Reilly, who were born in the old country.

Mr. Reilly received his early education in New York State. On October 23, 1863, at the age of fifteen, he enlisted in the United States marine corps and saw service for over five years as a drummer. He then re-enlisted and served four years, during which time he went to Europe on the Guerriere. On returning he continued in service as an employe in the Brooklyn navy yard.

In 1884 he came to Hammond to take a position as a superintendent in the Hammond Packing Company. Twelve years later he started in business for himself as a plumber, and was also connected with his sons, James and Edward, in the grocery business.

Mr. Reilly has been prominent in politics, representing the Democrats as councilman from the third ward for eight years, served as acting mayor for eighteen months, and was elected mayor of Hammond, which office he held for four years.

He is a member of the Knights of Columbus, Catholic Order of Foresters, Independent Order of Foresters of Indiana, A. O. United Workmen and the Elks.

He married Miss Mary A. McSweeney, and to this marriage have been born thirteen children, eight of whom are living.

JUDGE CHARLES REMSTER

To the citizens of Marion county and throughout the State the name of Judge Charles Remster is a familiar one. He served the people of Indianapolis and Marion county for a number of years as an honored public official.

Charles Remster was born on a farm near Veedersburg, Ind., on the 28th day of July, 1862. His boyhood and youth were spent on this farm, attending the common and high schools. Following this he took a course at Purdue University, remaining there for three years and three months.

After a course in the law, in 1889, he was admitted to the bar of Fountain county and engaged in the active practice of his profession. He demonstrated his abilities as a jurist and his name became known among attorneys beyond the limits of his county. So in 1895, six years after he began practicing, he removed to Indianapolis, and here, with greater opportunities, he soon acquired a very lucrative practice.

On the 1st day of April, 1907, he was appointed deputy prosecuting attorney for Marion county and for eighteen months served in that capacity. He brought to his work a clear insight into legal problems and an abounding energy which has always characterized his work and which established for him an enviable record.

At the expiration of his service as deputy prosecuting attorney Mr. Remster was elected judge of the Marion circuit court, where he remained for a term of six years. He discharged the duties of this position with conscientious loyalty to the public interests, administering justice as he saw it with no consideration other than impartiality and absolute fairness under the law. While it is sometimes a custom among writers to laud men extravagantly who have served in public office, and to incline to exaggeration of the good qualities, the service of Judge Charles Remster could hardly be spoken of too highly.

Few men have served in so important a capacity and gained in the years of service a reputation for ability, an unswerving effort to administer justice tempered with real human knowledge and sympathy, and left behind a cleaner page than did Judge Remster. His political opponents were most outspoken in their regrets when he retired from the bench in 1914 to engage in private practice. He left a record that makes it no easy task for others to maintain the same standard of efficiency, he having let it be known early in service that, while he was one of the most earnest of all the followers of Jefferson in his political beliefs, this should in no wise enter into the consideration of performance of duty as a public official.

In private practice he is a member of the legal firm of Smith, Remster, Hornbrook and Smith. He is an active and enthusiastic member of the Indiana Democratic Club and of the Masonic fraternity. Mrs. Remster was Miss Isabelle McDaniel. The marriage was in 1894.

FRANK J. RETTERATH

The present postmaster of the town of Goodland has been a resident of Newton county for more than half a century, and during this period has won the esteem of the community in which he resides.

Frank J. Retterath was born in the state of Ohio on the 10th day of March, 1860, and the following year was brought by his parents to Newton county for residence. Here he attended the public schools, enjoying meanwhile the wholesome environment of farm life and early learning the principles of the science of agriculture.

On the 18th day of February, 1885, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Margaret E. Lewis; and their home was established on a farm, and she has since been his faithful helpmate.

Throughout his life he has been a staunch adherent to the principles of Democracy and has rendered valued service to the party. On the first day of April, 1914, he assumed the duties of postmaster.

GEORGE J. RICHMAN

Hancock county has been singularly fortunate in her choice of superintendent of schools, for the incumbent of this high office possesses in a marked degree those qualities of learning, culture and aggressive policies which are requisite for the successful administration of its affairs.

George J. Richman was born in Hancock county on the 1st day of March, 1875, and attended the public schools of his district. Following his graduation from the public schools of Hancock county, in the year 1891, he entered the State Normal School at Terre Haute, and continued his studies at Butler College. Finally a course was taken in the Indiana Law School, from which he graduated in 1908, and was admitted to the bar of Hancock county. He was then engaged in the active practice of the law in partnership with Samuel J. Offutt of the Hancock bar until his re-election as county superintendent of schools in June, 1911.

Since his youth Mr. Richman has taken an interest in educational affairs, and in the year 1903 was appointed superintendent of the schools of Hancock county, serving in this capacity for a term of four years. In 1911, after a retirement of four years, he again assumed control of the school system of this community, and his success is evidenced by the high plane upon which the schools are conducted.

In the year 1900, on the 25th day of June, he was united in marriage to Miss Alice Meek, and their home in Greenfield has extended hospitality to a host of friends.

Mr. Richman is also interested in fraternal affairs in his community and is an active member of the Masons, the Knights of Pythias and the Modern Woodmen of America.

JAMES REED RIGGS

Prominently identified with the agricultural and commercial life of Sullivan county and vitally interested in municipal and political affairs of the community, the name of James Reed Riggs is well known throughout the district.

He is a native Hoosier, born on the 17th day of February, 1865, and educated in the schools of Sullivan county, having graduated from the Sullivan high school in May, 1882.

On the 11th day of September, 1895, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Bessie L. Lewman, and she has since been the presiding genius of his home and the able assistant in his various undertakings. To this union four daughters were born.

In March, 1896, he assumed the duties of auditor of Sullivan county, continuing in this position for a term of four years, and establishing an enviable record for business judgment and efficient administration.

Since his youth he has taken a deep interest in agricultural affairs, and is known as a progressive and successful farmer and a judge of live stock.

He is also a stockholder in a bank of Sullivan, a member of its directorate, and is the owner and manager of a modern clay products factory.

Fraternally Mr. Riggs is a thirty-second degree Mason, a member of the Indianapolis Consistory and also of the Terre Haute Commandery No. 16. He is also allied with the orders of Elks, Modern Woodmen of America and Red Men, and is highly esteemed by the many friends he has won in these organizations.

Throughout his career he has been known as a staunch adherent to Democratic principles and a loyal worker for the cause.

HON. JOHN WESLEY RINEAR

For more than three-score years the name of Rinear has been closely interwoven with the history of Wells county, and many members of the family have held positions of influence in various departments of the commonwealth. Charles Rinear, the founder of the family in Indiana, was a man well grounded in the attributes of true manhood; being a man of deep religious convictions, his word was as good as his bond. He leaves a record of which few can boast, of having had two sons in the state senate.

Hon. John Wesley Rinear, the oldest of these brothers, who is now an influential citizen of Wells county, was born March 4, 1842, near Cleveland, Ohio. In 1847 he moved with his parents to Huntington county, Indiana, removing to Wells county in 1854, where he was reared on the old home farm, attending school in the district schools of the neighborhood.

On September 25, 1861, he enlisted in Company A, 47th Indiana Volunteer Infantry. He was in the battles of New Madrid and Riddles Point, Mo., and Fort Pillow, Tenn., being severely wounded at the mouth of White river. He was discharged from the army soon after being wounded.

On the 2nd day of April, 1863, he was united in marriage to Miss Sarah C. First, and in 1913 they celebrated their golden wedding anniversary. They have one daughter, Hattie, the wife of J. B. Funt.

Mr. Rinear laid out the village of Liberty Center, in which he lives, in November, 1878. He served twelve years as justice of the peace of his township, and from May 2, 1877, until January 1, 1880, acted as postmaster of Liberty Center. In the year 1894 he was elected joint senator from Huntington and Wells counties, serving in the assemblies of 1895 and '97. He also served twelve years as a member of the county council, of which body he was president. In 1906 he was appointed trustee of the State Soldiers' Home at Lafayette, which position he still holds, having acted as treasurer of this institution during these years. He has for many years been a member of the Baptist church, I. O. O. F. and Grand Army of the Republic.

HON. ELIAS MONTGOMERY RINEAR

Prominently identified with the business and political life of the county of Wells is the second brother, Hon. Elias Montgomery Rinear.

He was born near Cleveland, Ohio, on the 9th day of March, 1844, coming with his parents to Indiana in 1847. His education was received in the common schools of Wells county.

On August 20, 1862, he enlisted in Company G, 101st Indiana Volunteer Infantry, in which he served until the close of the war.

On the 28th day of September, 1865, he was united in marriage to Miss Mary J. Hupp. In February, 1901, death claimed her. On September 15, 1904, he was married to Mrs. Laura E. Mentzer Campbell. He had two children, one daughter, Nettie, deceased, and one son, Dr. Edwin Rinear, of Mt. Vernon, Ind.

Mr. Rinear was twice elected commissioner of his county, and in the fall of 1914 he was elected joint senator from the counties of Blackford, Grant and Wells. On the opening of the legislature in 1915 Mr. Rinear immediately took a leading part in all the affairs of the senate. He was the author of the Rinear state-wide primary election bill. He also led in opposition to the adoption of the Strenberg amendments to the constitution. On June 6, 1915, Mr. Rinear died at the age of 71, death being caused by a breakdown from his work in the session of the 1915 state senate.

Mr. Rinear was for many years a successful druggist in the towns of Liberty Center and Warren, Indiana, but finally retired from active business life, except as a director of the Wells County Bank, of which he was a stockholder.

He was a past commander of Grand Army Post No. 33 of Bluffton, Indiana, and was affiliated with the Masonic Blue Lodge.

GEORGE FRANKLIN RINEAR

George F. Rinear, another member of this interesting family, is a native of Wells county, his birth having occurred on the 27th day of May, 1859. During his boyhood he attended the schools of Liberty Center, and here his youth also was spent. On the 23d day of February, 1883, his marriage to Miss Nannie Daugherty was solemnized, and their home was later established in the city of Bluffton, where Mr. Rinear has been prominently identified with the business and political life and growth of the place.

In the year 1902 he became a member of the city council, and this chair he has held continuously until the present time, being re-elected twice. For twelve years, also, he served upon the county central committee for the Democratic party, having been always a consistent adherent of true Democracy.

At the present time Mr. Rinear is active in the management of one department of the Red Cross Manufacturing Company, a stockholder in the Studebaker Bank, the Evening Banner and the interurban railroad, and is also an investor in the moving picture business. He has for many years been an active member of the Baptist church, and is affiliated with the Bluffton Lodge F. and A. M., I. O. O. F. and the Royal Order of Moose.

EMSLEY ROBERTS

Emsley Roberts, the present postmaster of the city of Mooresville, is a native of Morgan county, born in Eminence, on the 19th day of December, 1881. His schooling was received, however, in Owen county, where he attended the public schools and later entered the Spencer Normal College. Following his graduation from this institution he returned to Morgan county and became identified with the political and business life of Mooresville. In the years which have since elapsed he has been employed variously—in the hardware and grocery business, by the D. M. Parry Buggy Company of Indianapolis and as a railroad brakeman. On the 4th day of March, 1914, he assumed the duties of postmaster of the city, and his energies have since been devoted to this work.

Since attaining his majority he has worked faithfully and loyally in the ranks of the Democratic party, serving during two campaigns as precinct committeeman, and at other times as delegate to county and district conventions.

In October, 1908, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Hallie Suter, also of Morgan county. His parents, B. F. and Tamar Roberts, are, happily, both living. Fraternally, he is allied with the Odd Fellows Lodge of Mooresville.

WILLIAM B. ROBINSON

William B. Robinson, a pioneer of Knox county, has been closely identified with the growth of the Democratic party since he cast his first vote for Stephen A. Douglas in 1860. He was born on September 9, 1839, near Wheatland, attended the county schools and New Lebanon Academy, and was graduated from the State University in 1867, receiving the degree of LL. B.

Upon his return from the university Mr. Robinson engaged in the practice of law and presently was appointed deputy prosecuting attorney. Two years later he was elected mayor of the city of Vincennes and served in this capacity for two terms, or until 1873. From 1876 to 1884 he discharged the duties of clerk of the circuit court. He also acted as president of a bank for some years. His later years have been spent in farming, and six hundred acres of grain, fifty acres of fruit and a fine herd of stock evidence his success. He has voted the Democratic ticket at every election, and has attended conventions for nearly forty years, being a delegate to the national convention at Denver in 1908.

Mrs. Robinson, his able second, was Miss Margaret LaHue, daughter of ex-Sheriff James C. LaHue.

GILES W. ROBERTSON

Giles W. Robertson was born near Christiansburg, Montgomery county, Virginia, May 20, 1852. His paternal ancestors were Scotch and his maternal ancestors came from England. Being left an orphan by the death of both of his parents at the age of fourteen, he brought his two younger sisters to Union county, Indiana, where he worked on a farm in the summer and attended district school during the winter, completing his education at the State Normal School at Terre Haute. He was an industrious and apt student, and at the age of nineteen became a teacher. He now holds a life state license and has taught in the counties of Wayne, Fayette and Union. In 1891 he was elected county superintendent of Fayette county and re-elected in 1893. In 1878 he was married to Mary E. Heider of Lyons Station, Ind., and they made their home in Liberty. Mr. Robertson was nominated for auditor of Union county in 1902 and was defeated with the rest of his ticket, owing to the then large Republican majority in the county. He is now the secretary of the Union county Democratic central committee and has ever taken an active interest in the welfare of the party and the political affairs of his county, state and nation, holding this to be the duty of every citizen, since a free and enlightened republic like the United States can only be governed through and by means of political parties.

RICHARD M. ROBINSON

The present postmaster of the city of Vincennes, Richard M. Robinson, is a true product of Knox county, and is honored in his home community as an efficient and trusted public official.

He was born in this county on the 6th day of July, 1864, and attended the country schools of his district. From his boyhood he has taken an active interest in the pursuit of agriculture and breeding of fine live stock, and now operates extensively along these lines.

On the 11th day of February, 1891, he was united in marriage to Miss Anna Donahue, and she has proven a worthy second in his various undertakings.

In the year 1888 he was elected township trustee for a term of four years, the term being extended for a further year of service, and in 1904 assumed the duties of county treasurer. In this capacity he served for four years. In 1910 he became Democratic county chairman, and this position he held until February 18, 1914, at which time he resigned to assume the duties of postmaster of the city, a position to which he was appointed by President Wilson in January.

He is a stockholder and director in the Second National Bank of Vincennes and president of the Citizens' National Bank of Bicknell since its organization in 1896. He is also a stockholder in the German Bank of Vincennes, and president of the Vincennes Mississippi Land Co., an organization of Knox county farmers owning eight thousand acres of land in the Yazoo valley on which cotton is largely cultivated. He also holds numerous other interests throughout the states of Indiana and Texas.

He is an active member of the Vincennes board of trade and the Pastime club and is affiliated with the B. P. O. Elks.

JOHN L. ROBLYER

The present postmaster of the town of Flora has been an active Democratic worker since his boyhood. This gentleman, John L. Roblyer, was born May 6, 1874, on a farm in Carroll county, where he remained until he reached the age of eighteen years, attending the common schools of his district and the high school of Delphi. On the 3d day of July, 1898, he was married to Miss Grace Bowser, and to their home have come two daughters.

After leaving school Mr. Roblyer entered mercantile life, in the year 1893, as a clerk, and continued with the same firm until 1905, when he engaged in the general mercantile business for himself, being the junior member of the firm of Koonsman & Roblyer.

He comes of an old-line Democratic family, his grandfather having served Carroll county as sheriff for two terms when this county was comparatively new, being elected both times on the Democratic ticket, and has himself been a delegate to county, district and state conventions of the party. In June, 1913, he assumed the duties of postmaster of Flora, which position he still holds. He is affiliated with the orders of Masons and Knights of Pythias, by whom he is well known and highly esteemed.

JUDGE JOHN J. ROCHFORD

Nothing ever pleased Judge John J. Rochford so much as a good squared-away fight. It was sort of "born in him" and he never did anything to discourage or lessen the instinct. He never bragged about it and probably never fully realized it, but it "just came natural-like," and advancing age never kept him from "wading in."

He was born a Democrat, never changed, and, most natural to expect, he was a fighting Democrat all the time and always. He explained that he came by his belligerency and his Democracy in perfectly honest fashion, for while he was born on a farm in St. Lawrence county, New York State, both his father and his mother were natives of county Cork, Ireland. His mother came over in 1846 and his father three years later, and they were married in New York, making their first settlement on the Lawrence county farm on which Judge Rochford was born January 13, 1863.

The parents never moved from the farm, but John J., who was the youngest of the family, spent most of his time away at school until he graduated at Lawrence College in his twentieth year and at once "went on the road" as a traveling salesman for a Dayton, Ohio, house.

Young Rochford, even before becoming of voting age, took a live interest in politics, and his ambition was to become a lawyer; so he spent but two years traveling, but began reading law with Judge William H. Martin at Greenfield, Ind., beginning his practice of law in 1888 in Hancock county. Three years afterward Mr. Rochford removed to Indianapolis, and three years after his arrival he was the candidate of the Democratic party for prosecuting attorney, being defeated by Charles S. Wiltzie.

He became county chairman for Marion county in 1896, in the first Bryan campaign, and never after was he divorced from the Democratic party's organized activities, being for the first time elected to the bench in 1910, his first term continuing to 1919 as judge of the Marion county superior court.

In a political campaign, if Judge Rochford had been given the field as a candidate with no opposition, for the sake of a good campaign contest—if he knew he would lose—he would probably have called a convention of some sort to insure opposition.

CORNELIUS RODEMACKER

Cornelius Rodemacker is a native of the Hoosier state, born on the 22nd day of June, 1862, in Decatur, Adams county, Indiana, where his education was received in the public and Catholic schools. While a young man he married Miss Lena Ardner.

In June, 1914, Mr. Rodemacker removed to Ft. Wayne, Indiana, where he still resides and is engaged in business on Calhoun street. Throughout his life Mr. Rodemacker has been a consistent Democrat, having imbibed these principles from his father, who was also prominent in the councils of the party and served as district committeeman at Decatur. The son, Cornelius, has also attended county and state conventions of the party and taken an active part in each campaign for the furtherance of its principles.

GEORGE ROGERS

Closely identified with the business and municipal life of Knox, George Rogers is well known throughout Starke county as one of its representative citizens.

Mr. Rogers was born in Wayne county, Indiana, on the 6th day of November, 1861. He attended the schools of Marshall county, and in 1880 entered the high school of Plymouth.

On December 23, 1888, he was united in marriage to Miss Laura Stull, and their home was established in Knox. Here they gathered about them a circle of friends, his business career was started and his interests have since centered.

In the year 1892 he engaged in the lumber business in this city, and he is at present the sole proprietor.

In 1901 he was elected to membership of the town board and in this capacity served for two terms. In 1904 he served as county chairman of the Democratic organization, and in 1908 was elected to the position of township trustee of Center township for a term of six years. During this term the township voted to centralize; so in 1910 he built a modern centralized school building, the first centralized school in Starke county, and in 1914 was compelled to build an additional building, the immigration to Center township making it necessary to provide more room. This school is a commissioned high school, full four-year course.

Mr. Rogers is a progressive as well as public-spirited man, and during his term of service on the town board introduced the ordinance which provided for brick streets for the town.

JUDGE FRANK B. ROSS

As judge of the probate court of Marion county Frank B. Ross acquired a reputation throughout the State of Indiana as one of the ablest judges who ever sat on the bench. He served in this position for six years, after ten years of active and successful practice in Indianapolis, and at the time he was elected he was one of the youngest judges who had ever been chosen to so important a position in the county.

His success and the splendid record which was made in this court during his incumbency he modestly ascribed to hard work and nothing more. "Any lawyer with a reasonable knowledge of the profession," he would always explain, "would give full satisfaction as a judge in this or any other court if he would sit all day hearing cases and spend the time when other men were sleeping in study of the causes at issue and trying conscientiously to reach right and equitable conclusions. If I ever came near establishing a good record, such as some of my enthusiastic friends have been kind enough to say, it was in my case nothing more than six years of the hardest work a man ever put in, this manual part supplying what was lacking otherwise. Other men might have got along with much less labor and accomplished far better results."

However that may be, at the end of his term of office the newspapers which had opposed Frank B. Ross on political grounds when he was a candidate were loudest in his praises when he had reached the end of the six years, and during the time he was serving. When he retired from the bench to again resume his law practice he was selected a member of the faculty of the Indiana Law School, lecturing on probate law.

Aside from his service in public office Mr. Ross was always an active Democrat. He was always one of the workers in the organization whether a candidate or not. He believed in the principles of the party of Jefferson and Jackson and Woodrow Wilson. As a speaker in local state campaigns he was one of the most in demand, and during the many drives for finances for the winning of the war with Germany both as a speaker and organizer he was one of the most efficient, and so one kept most busy.

Frank B. Ross was born at Monticello, Indiana, September 24, 1875. His education was from the schools of his native city and the University of Valparaiso and University of Indianapolis. His first work after leaving school was as a teacher in the country schools in 1894 and 1895.

He graduated from the Indiana Law School of the University of Indianapolis, class of 1898, and began the practice of law in the office of John Worth Kern. In such an association it would have been impossible to have long lacked interest in politics or in the active work of helping the Democratic party win. Aside from the time while on the bench, he was nominated for judge of the criminal court of Marion county by the Democrats in 1906; and was defeated with the rest of the ticket. It was two years later that he was nominated for judge of the probate court and elected, serving for six years. From 1902 to 1904 he was secretary of the Marion county Democratic central committee and for several years was chairman of the Democratic city committee of Indianapolis.

Frank B. Ross and Miss Gertrude Paetz were married in 1905.

HOMER L. ROGERS

The position of county superintendent of schools is one which requires judgment and educational qualifications and the man who successfully carries on the work of training the minds of the children of a county is deserving the highest esteem of his constituents and the community at large.

In the person of Homer L. Rogers we find a man who has discharged the duties of this position in a highly creditable manner for the past seven years. He was born on the 30th day of September, 1885, and received his schooling in the common and high schools of the city of Knox, Indiana. Later his studies were continued at the University of Valparaiso and the Indiana State Normal at Terre Haute. Following his graduation from this institution he entered at once into the educational field, teaching in the schools of the county. At the early age of twenty-three years he was elected county superintendent of the schools of Pulaski county, assuming the duties of the position December 26, 1908. In 1911 he was re-elected by unanimous vote; and his progressive policies and good sense have placed the schools upon a high plane of service to the children and the community.

On the 12th day of August, 1907, his marriage to Miss Grace M. Leighty was solemnized, and their home, then established in Winamac, has been a center of hospitality and culture.

Fraternally, Mr. Rogers is allied with the Winamac Lodge No. 262, Free and Accepted Masons; the North Judson Chapter, Royal Arch Masons; North Judson Council, Eastern Star; Tippecanoe Chapter, I. O. O. F., and Rebekah Lodge No. 122. He is also an active member of the Methodist church.

He is very active in boys' and girls' club work and has accompanied five classes to Purdue, three to Chicago Stock Show and one class to Washington, D. C.

He has been a delegate to the last two state Democratic conventions and an active member of these bodies.

JOHN F. RUSSELL

John F. Russell was born in Indiana on February 14, 1870. On November 22, 1891, he was married to Ella E. Doles.

Mr. Russell graduated from the Greensburg High School in the class of 1888. During the whole of his active life he has been closely identified with the business, political and social life of the city and county.

He has been connected with the Democratic city and county organizations in various capacities for twenty years. For eight years he was secretary of the county organization and he is now serving his eighth year as treasurer. In 1911 he was elected to the city board of education by the common council. In 1914 he was re-elected. He was secretary of the board until late in 1914. It was while he was a member of the school board that Greensburg's handsome new high school building, the finest in the state, was built.

Mr. Russell represented the fourth congressional district on the resolutions committee in the Democratic state convention of 1914. On September 1, 1914, he resigned from the school board to accept the appointment by Governor Ralston as a member of the board of trustees of the South-western Hospital for the Insane, at Madison. He is secretary of the board.

Mr. Russell is president and manager of the Garland Milling Company, has been a trustee of the Greensburg lodge of Elks nine years, and served two terms as president of the Indiana Millers' Association. He is a director of the local charities and was president two terms. He was also president for two terms of the local commercial club.

JULIUS C. SACHS

An active member of the Marion county organization and a loyal worker for the success of the party is Julius C. Sachs of Indianapolis.

Mr. Sachs is a native Hoosier, born in Indianapolis on the 12th day of September, 1873. He attended the Sixth Ward school and later became engaged in the liquor business, for some time conducting a saloon on South Meridian street. He married Miss Minnie Hoffman, also of Indianapolis, who has ably assisted him in his various affairs.

Mr. Sachs has labored zealously at all times for the success of the Democratic party, and has served as precinct committeeman during a number of campaigns. He has also acted as delegate to county and state conventions and is an active member of the 13th Ward Democratic Club.

Fraternally, he is allied with the Eagle and Druid lodges.

JAMES RUSSELL SAGE

The present postmaster of Milroy, James Russell Sage, has been for a number of years an active party worker and is known as a leader among the younger element of the party, which forms so great a factor of its fighting strength.

Mr. Sage was born in Dubois county, Indiana. In childhood, however, he accompanied his parents to Rush county, and in Milroy his schooling was received. Following his graduation from the Milroy high school he entered Winona Technical Institute for further study in the higher branches. His father, Horace Sage, was an active Democratic worker, and the son has followed in his footsteps. He is a member of the Methodist church of Milroy and is affiliated with the order of Masons.

On September 14, 1910, Mr. Sage was united in marriage to Miss Mary L. Root.

ALBERT SAHM

"He never won his way by treading upon the prostrate form of a competitor," is the comment of one writer in discussing Albert Sahn's career of success. "He has occupied the position of a good and worth-while American citizen," was the testimony of still another writer.

"Our glorious victory was only accomplished by the unselfish and patriotic devotion of men like you, who made sacrifices for the great cause of Democracy and the ideal of true Americanism," was wired by Vance McCormick, chairman of the Democratic national committee, to this same Indiana Democrat following the election of Woodrow Wilson in 1916.

The compliments to Albert Sahn were all deserved. His fight for Democracy and Americanism as a member of the personal advisory committee to Woodrow Wilson in the campaign which merited the McCormick appreciation, was followed by a greater sacrifice for Democracy and true Americanism a few months later when Albert Sahn sent a son and son-in-law to France as members of Uncle Sam's army. Too young to fight in the Civil war, being but two years of age, his two brothers went to the front. Too old himself to go in 1917, he contributed two boys—a son and a son-in-law, who both left their wives, babies, business and all future prospects—waiving all and any claims to exemption. In other ways Albert Sahn served the people well and was himself a successful man of business.

He was but twenty-five when he was elected as a Democrat to the responsible position of county commissioner of Marion county. He made such an excellent record as a stickler for economy and square dealing that he was elected to a second term by an increased majority. He resigned because of the press of personal business demands upon his time—being engaged for a number of years in the manufacture of furniture; for over thirty years he was a merchant and manufacturer.

As a good Democrat and as a business man of marked distinction and sterling qualities, he was selected and appointed postmaster at Indianapolis. After four years he retired, in 1898, to attend to his personal business.

In 1900 he was again serving the people as chairman of the Indianapolis Board of Public Works. Here, as elsewhere, he made a record that will be of permanent value to the people of Indianapolis.

It was in 1908 that he became auditor of Marion county, and it was here that his efficiency was demonstrated to a marked degree through his introduction of many reforms in all the more important county auditing offices of Indiana.

He retired from this office to take the position of secretary and treasurer of the State Life Insurance Company of Indianapolis and was entitled to a full share of the responsibility for the building up of this splendid institution.

His belief in the principles of Democracy was sufficiently sincere to always place his services and resources at the disposal of his party with an enthusiasm that carried conviction to others.

Starting with an education that ended, so far as schools were concerned, at fourteen, he was one of the best educated of men in all the things that count for success. While he did not count or measure success by the dollar mark, he at the same time gained a competency.

HUME L. SAMMONS

The name of Hume L. Sammons is familiar to the citizens of Newton county, being that of a leading attorney and business man of the town of Kentland.

Mr. Sammons was born at Morocco, Indiana, on the second day of April, 1871. He attended the public schools of Newton county, and graduated from the high school of Milford, Illinois, with the class of 1889.

On the fourth day of July, 1897, his marriage to Miss Elizabeth Fenwick of Kankakee, Illinois, was solemnized, and their home was established in Kentland, where his interests have since centered.

He has served in the capacity of trustee of the town of Kentland for two terms, and on the first day of July, 1913, he assumed the duties of postmaster of this place, having received his appointment from President Wilson in June.

Throughout his life he has been a staunch adherent to the principles of Democracy, and has given freely of his time and energy for the furtherance of the cause.

WORDEN J. SANDERSON

The Democratic party has been well represented in Carroll county, and to the efforts of its county chairman, Worden J. Sanderson, its success has been largely due. Mr. Sanderson was born on the 9th day of March, 1888, in Michigan, accompanying his parents to Carroll county when eight years of age; and here he attended school, graduating from the high school at Flora. During the years 1909 to 1912, inclusive, he acted as deputy treasurer, assisting his father, prior to which he was engaged in the life and fire insurance business. His wife was Miss Edythe L. Clawson of Carroll county. He is a member of the Blue Council, Royal Arch Masons; the I. O. O. F. Encampment; the Uniform Rank, Knights of Pythias; also a trustee of the Presbyterian church, in the Sabbath school of which he has taught since the age of seventeen years.

GEORGE W. SANDS

George W. Sands is a young lawyer who has not only risen to the front rank among the attorneys of northern Indiana, but is known all over the state as a legislator and an orator of force and power.

He was born in Ohio, February 22, 1889, took both his literary and law courses at Notre Dame, and was graduated with the degree of LL. B. in 1910. In June of that year he was admitted to the bar, and immediately began the practice of his profession in South Bend. In the years that have elapsed since his majority he has been very active in the Democratic party; has been the chairman of his ward; delegate to the state convention, and sat in the state legislature during the year 1913. He takes an active part in campaigns and is always in demand as a speaker in St. Joseph county. Mr. Sands is a member of the B. P. O. E., the Woodmen of the World, Loyal Order of Moose, the Knights of Columbus and the A. O. H.

WILLIS A. SATTERLEE

The loyalty, energy and executive ability of Willis A. Satterlee have been prominent factors in the success of the Democratic party in Vermilion county during the past few years.

Mr. Satterlee is a native of the state of Illinois, born on the ninth day of February, 1878; but at the age of two years he accompanied his parents to Vermillion county, Indiana, and here his schooling was received. Following his graduation from the common schools of his district, he entered Clinton high school, graduating therefrom. Later a year was spent in Indianapolis at the Voris Business College, where a broad knowledge of business practice and commercial law were acquired. On the 20th day of December, 1909, he was admitted to the bar of Vermillion county and entered into the active practice of law. A thriving real estate business has also been carried on in this connection.

During the campaign of 1908 he served as Democratic chairman of Clinton township, and in 1909 was chairman of the Clinton city organization. In 1910 and 1911 he served as county chairman, and in 1914 was vice-chairman of the county. In the fall of 1910 he was elected to the position of prosecuting attorney for the 47th Judicial District and in this capacity served for a period of two years, being the first Democratic incumbent of this office; and his majority of 135 votes was received in an overwhelming Republican district.

On the 16th day of June, 1904, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Jessie M. Foltz, and she has since dispensed the hospitality of their home with rare grace and charm.

HENRY FRED SCHAAL

The present postmaster of Michigan City, Henry Fred Schaal, though a native of Germany, has for many years been an honored resident of this locality.

Mr. Schaal was born in Saxony, Germany, on the second day of June, 1851. There he was reared and received his schooling, attending the graded schools, and later continuing his studies at the Ann Real Schule, a college of Dresden. At the age of twenty-two, however, he came to America and settled in the city of South Bend. In May, 1877, he was united in marriage to Miss Augusta Raatz and their home was established in that city. In the year 1886, however, they moved to Michigan City, and this has since been their home. Here their interests are centered and their friendships have been made.

In the fall of 1896 Mr. Schaal was elected to represent Laporte county in the legislature of the state, and in the assemblies of 1897 and 1899 he was an active member, representing his community and his constituency with great credit. Having received the appointment to the position of postmaster of Michigan City, Mr. Schaal continues to render efficient service in that position.

CLARENCE E. SCHAEFFER

The present postmaster of the town of Howe, Lagrange county, has for many years been known as a successful and progressive farmer of this locality.

Clarence E. Schaeffer is a native of this state, his birth having occurred on the 7th day of October, 1883. He attended the public schools of his district, graduating from the high school at Lima. Then followed a commercial course at Valparaiso College; but his preference for the life of the agriculturist drew him to the farm, and here he has achieved his greatest success. On the first day of September, 1913, he assumed the duties of postmaster of Howe. He has, throughout his life, been an active worker for the interests of the Democratic party, serving upon election boards and contributing liberally of his time and means for the furtherance of the cause.

Mrs. Schaeffer, to whom he was married August 12, 1912, was Miss Fannie Kingsbury.

FRANK M. SCHNEIDER

The gentleman whose name appears above is a well-known citizen of Cedar Grove and a life-long resident of Franklin county. Frank M. Schneider was born on the 9th day of April, 1876, in the southern part of Highland township, his father being George M. Schneider, a well-known Democratic worker of that section. He attended the district school of the community, and was reared in the Catholic faith, to which he still adheres. Mr. Schneider is a man of genial manner and wide acquaintance, and among his colleagues bears the name of "Laughable Schneider," due to his native wit and ready appreciation of humor in others. Since he attained his majority he has voted the Democratic ticket and has been an active worker in the party organization of his section, and has attended various conventions of the party as delegate, including many state conventions at Indianapolis.

ISAAC C. SCHOONOVER

Judge Isaac C. Schoonover of Fountain county has for so many years been the incumbent of various positions of prominence and responsibility that his reputation is more than state-wide, and he is favorably known in the legal profession both as judge and jurist.

Judge Schoonover was born in Warren county on the 22nd day of October, 1849, and in boyhood he attended the county district schools, later continuing his studies at the academy at Williamsport. In the year 1871 he entered the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, and the following year was admitted to the bar and began the active practice of his profession.

On the 18th day of March, 1869, his marriage to Miss Margaret J. Yaeger was solemnized, and their home has since been the meeting place of a host of friends.

In the year 1877 he was elected mayor of Attica for a term of two years, and at the expiration of his term of office was re-elected three consecutive times, serving in this capacity in all eight years. Later he was elected city attorney, serving for a period of six years; and in the year 1906 was elected judge of the 61st Judicial Circuit, discharging the duties of this position for a term of six years, and, being re-elected, has continued in this office until the present time. At the time of the election of 1906, he was one of three Democrats elected in a Republican county, and in 1912 was the recipient of 125 more votes than any other Democrat on the county ticket.

In the discharge of the duties of judge he has taken a particular interest in the affairs of the juvenile court, and has established the custom of paroling first offenders.

Judge Schoonover is a member of the state and national bar associations and of the Covington Merchants' Association; is affiliated with the Attica Blue Lodge F. and A. M. and the Order of Knights of Pythias, Lodge No. 95, Covington Chapter.

He has for many years occupied a position of influence in the party councils, serving as delegate to numerous state conventions.

LOUIS S. C. SCHROEDER

Louis S. C. Schroeder, one of the most prominent citizens of Ft. Wayne, has spent many years in the service of the public. He is a product of Allen county, having been born within its borders on the 10th day of September, 1857; and received his education in the public and parochial schools of his district.

In the year 1879 his marriage to Miss Loretta Bradway was solemnized, and their home in Ft. Wayne has known the presence of a host of friends among the influential people of the place.

During the period from 1884 to 1888 Mr. Schroeder was revenue collector in the stamp department, receiving his appointment under the administration of Grover Cleveland; and in 1911 he took upon himself the duties of president of the city council, serving for a term of three years in this capacity. At present he is the superintendent of the Indiana free employment office.

Throughout his career he has been a zealous worker for the cause of Democracy, serving one term upon the city central committee, and giving six years of his time as secretary of the county central committee.

Fraternally, he is a 32nd degree Mason, belonging to the Mystic Shrine; a member of the Knights of Pythias and the B. P. O. Elks; and, by no means least among the positions of honor which he has held, he is president of the musicians' union of Ft. Wayne.

ALBERT J. SCHUH

Closely identified with the business and municipal life of Kentland is Albert J. Schuh. He is a native of this state, born on the 14th day of July, 1879. He attended the public schools of Newton county, graduating from the high school. Later he attended Purdue University.

On the 24th day of June, 1902, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Ida Larkin, and their home, then established in Kentland, has extended hospitality to many friends throughout the county.

In the year 1909 he assumed the duties of county treasurer, and in this capacity served for a term of four years, since which time he has conducted a garage under the firm name of Schuh & Son. He has been a valued worker in the ranks of the party, giving freely and loyally of his services. He has always been regarded as one of Newton county's most substantial citizens.

EDWARD C. SCHUETZ

In the year 1914 President Woodrow Wilson appointed for the city of Brazil a new postmaster, a man who had been in the service of the public for more than a score of years, receiving thereby a training which has rendered him unusually efficient in the administration of his present important duties.

Edward C. Schuetz, the gentleman to whom we refer, is a native of the Blue Grass State, born on the 5th day of December, 1867, in Cadiz, Ky. Mr. Schuetz at the age of five years was left by the death of his father with a widowed mother and several brothers and sisters. He completed the course in the common schools of Kentucky at Cadiz, and later, when time and means would permit, continued his studies at night schools. At the age of 16 years he began learning the printers' trade in the office of the Kentucky Telephone, then published at Cadiz, at which office he continued until 1889, when he came to Evansville and accepted a position in the composing room of the Evansville Journal, where he was enabled to grasp the many phases of journalism which a true newspaperman must know.

In 1891 Mr. Schuetz established the Cannelton Telephone, a Democratic paper, which assisted materially in carrying Perry county for Cleveland in 1892. In 1893 occurred his marriage to Miss Hester C. Tevlin, at Cannelton; and four children, two boys and two girls, have come to bless their union and brighten their home.

In 1894 they established their home at Carbon in Clay county, where Mr. Schuetz launched the Carbon Chronicle, a Democratic newspaper, continuing the publication until 1907, when he sold the plant and moved to Brazil.

In 1903 Mr. Schuetz was appointed truant officer of the county by the trustees. At the expiration of the first year, however, he resigned this position to make the race for representative to the general assembly of the state. In 1905 he was appointed to the postmastership of Brazil.

Mr. Schuetz has taken an active interest in the business life of the community, and a few years ago, during the commercial boom of Brazil, was one of the directors of the Brazil Factory Club. For three years, also, Mr. Schuetz represented the Southern Surety Company of St. Louis, as special agent, with headquarters at Brazil. His duties for this company carried him into eleven different states.

For the past eighteen years Mr. Schuetz has been an active member of the order of Red Men and Knights of Pythias.

WILLIAM C. SCHWIER

William C. Schwier, the incumbent of numerous positions in the service of the public of Allen county, has been, since his youth, closely identified with the business and political life of Ft. Wayne.

He is a native of this county, born and reared within its confines; in fact, in the same ward in Ft. Wayne in which he now resides. He attended St. Paul's Parochial School and later pursued his studies at Prof. White-leather's Business College. At the early age of fifteen years he entered the grocery business, and for thirty years continued in this occupation upon the same lot on which he was born. In the year 1913, however, he retired from this work, and since then much of his time has been spent in the public service.

He was for many years a member of the city council, and in the year 1906 he assumed the duties of president of this body, continuing in this capacity until 1910. In the fall of 1912 he was elected commissioner of Allen county for a term of three years, and so efficient were his services that, at the expiration of this period, he was re-elected for a further term of service.

Mr. Schwier has resided in the first ward of the city all his life, and has represented this district in four state Democratic conventions. Among his neighbors in this locality and throughout the county he is known as a man of integrity and honor, standing for clean politics and clean methods of government administration; and it is upon this basis that he has been elected to the various positions which he has so worthily filled.

CURTIS GILES SCOFIELD

The city of Brazil has produced many citizens of sterling worth and has given to the Democratic party of the State many loyal and enthusiastic workers, but few of these hold a more enviable position throughout the community than the gentleman whose name appears above. Mr. Scofield was born in Avena, Ill., on the 2d day of December, 1878. When he was six years of age, however, his parents came to Clay county, Indiana, establishing their home in Brazil, and here the son grew to manhood, receiving his education and graduating from the high school in the year 1896. Later he graduated with honors from the Indiana Law School of Indianapolis. He was married to Miss Anna Brattin.

In the year 1901, when he was twenty-three years of age, he was appointed deputy prosecuting attorney for Clay and Putnam counties, and at the expiration of three years in this position he was elected prosecuting attorney for the two counties, serving until 1907. He served from 1908 to 1915 as county attorney of Clay county, being appointed by the board of commissioners. In November, 1918, he was elected circuit judge for a term of six years.

Fraternally, he is allied with the Masonic order, taking the Royal Arch degree, and is also a member of the Knights of Pythias and of the order of Elks.

Though still a young man, he has attained an influence and prestige in the community accorded to few, and hopes to spend the remainder of his life in the city of Brazil practicing the profession of law.

CLARENCE O. SEFTON

Clarence O. Sefton, a lawyer of broad experience and successful practice, has been identified with the Gary bar since 1907.

Born in Louisville, Ills., December 9, 1876, he had the advantage of being reared on a farm. His parents were James S. and Elizabeth Sefton. His education was acquired at Orchard City College, Austin College, and in 1905 he graduated from the law department of Valparaiso College. During seven years of this time he taught school and his earnings from this defrayed most of his expenses while preparing himself for the law.

He practiced one year in Louisville, Ills., followed by a year in South Bend, and in 1907 came to Gary. In 1912 Mr. Sefton was Democratic candidate for the office of prosecuting attorney of Lake county, and, while he failed of election, he ran far ahead of the ticket, which was a great compliment to his personal standing.

ALBERT T. SERING

Albert T. Sering, the present postmaster of Liberty, has been for many years an active and effective worker in the ranks of the Democratic organization of Union county, and is well and favorably known in Union and adjoining counties as one of the minute men of his party and a sterling citizen of his community.

Mr. Sering was born in Union county on the 19th day of November, 1852. He received his education in the common and academic schools of his county, and is known as a capable business man and farmer. He had served his community as trustee of the Liberty corporation schools and in other positions of trust before he was appointed as postmaster.

On the 27th day of October, 1903, he was united in marriage to Miss Cordelia Barnes, and she has since presided over their home in Liberty.

Mr. Sering is a man of sterling character. He belongs to a family of good old Jeffersonian Democracy. An older brother, William D. Sering, was a gallant Union soldier, and lost his life in the service of his country.

Since attaining his majority Mr. Sering has been an active worker in the cause of Democracy, serving for a number of years as county chairman with great efficiency and good results to his party. He has also attended every state convention of his party for the past twenty-five years and several of the national conventions. In the year of 1914 he was appointed by President Wilson postmaster of Liberty, and the duties of this office have been discharged with conscientious zeal and results that are most satisfactory to the patrons of the office, and with an eye single to the efficiency of the postal service. He holds a high place in the esteem of his fellow citizens, irrespective of party, because of his known integrity as a citizen and his courtesy as a neighbor and friend.

WILLIAM A. SERVICE

William A. Service has for many years held a position of influence in the business and political life of Hancock county.

Mr. Service is a native of this State, born on the 30th day of September, 1866. He was reared in the wholesome environment of the farm and attended the country schools of his district. In the year 1888 he entered the State Normal School at Terre Haute, and here for four years his studies were pursued. Following his graduation from this institution in the year 1892, he taught in the Greenfield High School for a term of three years, having previously spent some time as instructor in the country schools. Later, also, a course of study was taken at the State University.

In the year 1906 he was elected clerk of the Hancock circuit court, and for four years he administered the affairs of this office with much credit.

On September 14, 1898, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Ella M. Corr, and two children have come to brighten their home—William Corr, now fourteen years of age, and Mary Helen, four years his junior.

Mr. Service was actively engaged in the mercantile business in the city of Greenfield for seventeen years, dealing in shoes and furnishings, and is also the holder of large farm interests. On the 6th of April, 1914, he received from President Wilson his appointment to the postmastership, which he now holds, and in this capacity he has served with zeal and intelligence.

He has taken an active part in Democratic affairs and served as county chairman in the campaigns of 1912 and 1914. He is affiliated with the orders of Knights of Pythias, Red Men, and Accepted Masons, and is a communicant of the Christian church.

JUDGE JOSEPH HOOKER SHEA

Jackson county has produced many citizens who have attained positions of prominence in various lines of endeavor, but perhaps none has gone forth from her boundaries of whom she is more justly proud than Judge Joseph Hooker Shea, for as citizen, legislator, jurist or judge he has never failed to uphold the dignity of the position held by him and to add luster to the fair name of the community from which he sprung.

Judge Shea is a native of Indiana, having been born in Scott county. He attended the public schools of his district and graduated from the high school of Lexington with the class of 1883. A course was then taken at the Indiana University, from which he graduated in the year 1889, receiving the degree of A. B. In January of this year he was admitted to the bar at Scottsburg, and here he began the active practice of his profession, bringing to his work that abounding energy and clear insight into complicated questions which are requisite for success in the legal profession.

In the year 1891 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the Sixth judicial circuit, and this position he held for the ensuing four years, administering the affairs of the office with characteristic diligence. In the fall of 1896 he was elected state senator from Scott, Clark and Jennings counties and in the deliberations of the assembly of 1897 he was an active participant. He was re-elected to the next assembly also, and held a position of still greater influence in this body.

In the year 1906 he assumed the duties of judge of the fortieth judicial circuit, and the ensuing six years were spent in administering the affairs of this position; and so ably did he discharge the duties of the office that he steadily rose in the esteem of his constituents. Therefore, it was a matter of congratulation, but not of surprise, when he received the nomination to the still higher position of judge of the appellate court and assumed these greater responsibilities in the year 1912. Here he remained, dispensing justice with conscientious impartiality and keen intelligence, and exercising daily those qualities which prove him a man of sterling worth and integrity, until his appointment by President Wilson as ambassador to Chile.

Judge Shea has at all times taken a deep interest in the various movements which have arisen for the betterment of his home city, Seymour, and the community at large, and is closely identified with the commercial and civic organizations of the place. He is also interested in farming and an advocate of good roads, farmers' institutes and the many movements and methods advanced for the improvement of the agricultural community and profession. He is also a stockholder in one of the leading banks of Seymour.

Not the least of the honors which has come to Judge Shea is the position of trustee of Indiana University, his alma mater, a position which he has held continuously since the year 1893. Particularly near to him are the needs and progress of this institution, and the character of its student body.

Needless to add, Judge Shea enjoys a wide acquaintance throughout the state and holds a high position in the legal profession of Indiana; and in the counsels of the Democratic party, to which he has stanchly adhered since his boyhood, he holds a position of influence.

EMORY B. SELLERS

The name of Emory B. Sellers is widely known throughout the legal profession of the state, being that of an authority, the incumbent of various positions of responsibility and trust in the service of the commonwealth and the author of several laws now on the Indiana statute books.

Mr. Sellers was born in Perry county, Ohio. He came to White county, Indiana, in 1865, where he has since resided. He was a prominent member of the senate of the state assembly of 1885 and again in 1887, and succeeded David Turpie as United States attorney upon the latter's election to the United States senate. He was also appointed by Governor Marshall a member of the national conference on uniform laws. Mr. Sellers is a member of the American and state bar associations.

ANDREW J. SHELBY

Andrew J. Shelby, one of the loyal workers in the Democratic party of Boone county, is a native of Hancock county, Indiana, his birth having occurred on the 17th day of September, 1866, near the city of Greenfield. Here, in the schools of the district, he received the basis of his education, later attending the normal school at Danville. At the age of twenty-four years he came to Boone county and established his home. His wife, who was formerly Miss Pearl Ball of Rush county, was called from his side on the 6th day of May, 1909, by the grim reaper, Death.

Mr. Shelby, though a conscientious citizen and loyal party worker, has never aspired to hold political office. He has, however, taken an interest in fraternal affairs, and is affiliated with the Order of Elks, Odd Fellows and Red Men, among whom he is widely known and highly respected. Mr. Shelby is a gentleman of broad intelligence, interested in the various movements for the physical and moral uplift and development of the community, and always a firm adherent to the principles of true Democracy.

Mr. Shelby is one of the leading and best known lawyers in Central Indiana, is counsel for all of the corporations doing business or having business in the courts of his county, and has for many years enjoyed a very lucrative practice.

JOHN B. SHELBY

Always an enterprising citizen and a leader in the business life of the city of Lebanon, John B. Shelby has demonstrated what can be accomplished by ceaseless energy well directed. This gentleman was born in Greenfield, Ind., on the 1st day of April, 1873, and has been a resident of this State since birth, receiving his education in the common and high schools of his district.

In the year 1900 he served as district attorney for Boone county, and has always, since attaining the age of maturity, been an enthusiastic worker for the cause of Democracy. For the past twelve years he has been engaged in the hardware business, gradually enlarging his line to include general merchandise, automobiles and other vehicles. In the fall of 1913 he was nominated and elected for the mayoralty of the city of Lebanon. His tenure of office covered a period of four years, beginning January 5, 1914.

BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY

Benjamin F. Shively, United States senator, was a native of St. Joseph county, Indiana, where he resided all his life. His father was Rev. Joel Shively and both his father and mother were natives of Pennsylvania, settling in Indiana in 1854. Benjamin F. Shively was born March 20, 1857. His early experiences were those of the average farm lad. After completing his course in the common schools of his neighborhood, he attended the Northern Indiana Normal School at Valparaiso, also graduating subsequently from the law department of the University of Michigan. He taught school from 1875 to 1880 after which he engaged in newspaper work.

In 1889 he married Miss Laura Jenks, daughter of the Hon. George A. Jenks of Brookville, Pa., who was solicitor-general of the United States under the first administration of Grover Cleveland.

In redistricting the state for congressional representation, in 1881, the Republican majority in the general assembly formed the 13th Indiana District to be "reliably Republican." When, in 1884, Major William H. Calkins received the Republican nomination for governor and resigned his seat in the congress to make the race, Mr. Shively was nominated for the unexpired term in the congress and as the Democratic candidate carried the district by a majority of 2,275. He again carried his district in 1886 by 1,046, in 1888 by 355, and in 1890 by 2,705.

In each of these campaigns the district was considered safely Republican. In all his contests his opponents were strong men and some of them men of rare force and ability. In his memorable series of joint meetings with Gen. Jasper Packard Mr. Shively splendidly vindicated the record and policies of his party and inspired the rank and file with his courage and enthusiasm.

In 1892 he declined further congressional honors. However, the memory of his wise, capable and aggressive leadership was never dimmed. In 1896, in face of the overwhelming defeat of the Democratic party in Indiana two years before, confronted with widespread commercial panic and business depression, facing apparently hopeless division in his own party, Mr. Shively accepted the nomination for governor and conducted a canvass which for courage, dignity, ability and brilliant aggressiveness recalled the best traditions of the old party leaders.

He was defeated, but his party recovered four congressional districts, nearly tripled its representation in the legislature and recovered over twenty counties which had been lost two years before.

In 1904 the Thirteenth congressional district recorded a Republican majority of 7,000. In 1906 Mr. Shively was prevailed upon to again take the congressional nomination for what seemed a hopeless race, but he succeeded in reducing the district Republican majority from 7,000 to 216, carrying Kosciusko county for the first time in its history, and made possible the recovery of the district by the Democrats in the election which followed.

In the first two terms in the congress he was the youngest member of that body. In the first week he addressed the house on an important measure of general legislation and at once commanded the respectful attention if that body. His capability, forceful and attractive manner in handling the subject enabled him to receive applause, breaking the precedent which demanded that "new members keep quiet." As evidence of the confidence and good will inspired from the beginning in his first term, he was elected secretary of the national congressional committee, a position which he held for succeeding terms.

He was selected to accompany Allan G. Thurman on his first speaking tour as candidate for Vice-President in 1888, and in all campaigns while in Washington he was called upon by different States to campaign for the Democratic party. Whether in the committee room, in the executive departments, in legislative work, on the floor of the house or in party council, he was always strong and effective.

He rose to membership on the committee on ways and means at a time when the tariff question was paramount, and at once became conspicuous in shaping the tariff policy of the 52d Congress. At the speaker's request, near the close of the first session of that congress, he prepared tariff arguments which were used during the campaign in all the States. Mr. Shively's addresses in congress on the tariff were of such a character as to challenge comparison with the best standard treatment of the subject within fifty years. The record itself justifies this statement.

In all his life Mr. Shively never conducted a defensive campaign. His campaigns were always aggressive. He never misstated the position of an opponent. His analysis of any subject treated was most complete and convincing. His knowledge of science and philosophy was profound. His advocacy was always dignified and vindicated and strengthened the cause of Democracy. He was never known in any speech to make a special appeal for votes for himself. He put his party and party principles first, and took his chances with the humblest man on his ticket.

When elected to the United States senate in the legislative session of January, 1909, the tariff and kindred questions were paramount. He proved to be a thorough student of these subjects and he was recognized upon his entrance into the senate as the best equipped man in that body to handle these questions from the Democratic standpoint. He had a vast fund of information. Immediately upon his entrance into the senate he was selected to lead in tariff debates. His speeches were circulated as the strongest Democratic doctrine obtainable.

Unfortunately, Senator Shively's health failed while he was serving as senator and he was unable to participate in many debates. Had his health not failed and his death followed, while he was yet senator, his political career appeared by no means ended. He was freely spoken of by members of the senate as presidential timber, his mental ability being sustained and enforced by a splendid presence before the people. His death, occurring shortly after taking his seat at the opening of his second term, to which he was elected by popular vote, was a serious loss to the State and to the nation as well.

WISE W. SHOWALTER

To the agricultural element of a community it must look largely for its wealth; and likewise the foundation of its manhood lies in the free, out-of-door life given its youth upon the farm.

Mr. Wise W. Showalter is an example of the type of man produced under the ideal conditions of an agricultural life—clean minded, conscientious and zealous in the performance of works which tend toward the best interests of the community at large.

He was born on the 8th day of March, 1856, a native of Indiana, and received his education in the common schools of Lagrange county. On the 23rd day of March, 1883, his marriage to Miss Ellen E. Schmidt was solemnized, and she was ever his helpful companion until death claimed her on the 29th day of June, 1910.

Most of the years of his life were spent in the pursuit of agriculture; but in the fall of 1904 he was elected to the position of township trustee of Jefferson township, Elkhart county, assuming the duties of that office on the 1st of the following January, serving in this capacity until January 1, 1908. In the fall of 1910 he was elected to the still greater responsibilities of county commissioner, his term of office to expire on the 1st of January, 1917.

ATWELL J. SHRINER

Atwell J. Shriner has spent many years of his life in the service of the public, and in each official position to which he has been selected he has served with loyalty and zeal. He was born at Andersonville, Franklin county, Indiana, on the 15th day of November, 1858, and attended the schools of Franklin county. On the 15th day of May, 1884, he was united in marriage to Miss Jennie W. Spilman, and they have since abode in the county of his birth.

Under Cleveland's administration he held the position of postmaster at Andersonville, and was superintendent of the Franklin county infirmary from September 1, 1901, to January 1, 1909. At the expiration of this period he assumed the duties of recorder of Franklin county, which position he held for four years.

In the spring of 1913 he received from President Wilson the appointment to the position of postmaster of Brookville, and on the 16th day of June of that year began his work in the postal service. He has for many years been an active Democratic worker, serving as precinct committeeman in Posey township and in Brookville, in all, sixteen years; and as county chairman from 1906 to 1913. He is affiliated with the orders of Masons, Knights of Pythias and Red Men.

EDWARD SIMON

A well-known party worker and prominent public official of Lake county is Edward Simon of Hammond.

Mr. Simon is a native of the State of New York, born on the 16th day of March, 1873. He attended the public schools of Buffalo and later entered the preparatory school of St. Joseph's College of that city. In the year 1892 he emigrated to Indiana, locating in Lake county, and later entered into the work of the Democratic local organization, giving freely of his time and energy for the furtherance of the cause. Four years later he was selected Democratic county chairman of Lake county, and in this capacity served throughout the campaigns of 1904, 1906 and 1908. In the year 1907 he was the representative from this county to the legislature of Indiana and served with distinction in the following assembly.

In the year 1912 he was elected to the position of auditor of Lake county, and in this capacity has demonstrated marked efficiency, progressive methods and conscientious zeal for the interests of the public. He has also taken a deep interest in the business affairs of Hammond, his home, where he is well known also as the manufacturer of La Vendor cigars.

Mrs. Simon, to whom he was married April 24, 1894, was formerly Miss Jessie E. Flaherty of Liverpool, Lake county, and as the presiding genius of their family, she has dispensed its hospitality to a host of friends.

Mr. Simon is a member of the progressive element of the community, deeply interested in the various movements for the betterment of the physical conditions of the locality as well as its moral uplift.

JAMES P. SIMONS

The gentleman whose name heads this article is well known throughout the county, having been for many years closely identified with the business life of the community, and having also been the incumbent of various positions in the service of the commonwealth.

James P. Simons, of Monticello, is a true son of White county, born there on November 9, 1856. He attended the public schools and completed his studies at the Burnettsville high school.

For two years Mr. Simons served as township assessor, the duties of that position being discharged with conscientious zeal. He then was elected to the larger responsibilities of county recorder, and in this latter capacity served for two terms of four years each, establishing an enviable record for ability and fidelity in the conduct of the affairs of his office. In February, 1916, on the recommendation of United States Senators Kern and Shively, President Wilson appointed him postmaster at Monticello. He also is widely known through his connection for twenty years with the White County Democrat, published at Monticello.

While serving as a member of the executive committee of the Indiana Democratic Editorial Association Mr. Simons prepared and presented to the association at its mid-winter meeting in February, 1908, the following resolution:

"With a firm belief in the righteousness of the Democratic principle of the rule of the majority, as expressed in a free and untrammelled ballot, we would add to the present laws regulating the liquor traffic a local option law giving to the people of each community opportunity to express their sentiments regarding the sale of liquor in their midst, freed from the turmoil, annoyances and business disturbances in many instances attending the operations of the present remonstrance law."

This was the first local option resolution presented in Indiana, and the law here suggested was intended to be supplementary to the remonstrance law then in force. The resolution was adopted by the Democratic Editorial Association and the principle was incorporated in the Democratic state platform a few weeks later. It created much discussion all over the State, led to the calling of the special session of the legislature in the summer of 1908, forced the Republicans to take a more radical position and resulted in the election of Thomas R. Marshall as governor in November.

Mr. Simons is affiliated with the fraternal orders of Masons and Knights of Pythias, and in the former has attained the Chapter and Council degrees.

Mrs. Simons was formerly Miss Sallie E. Johnson, daughter of Jeremiah B. Johnson, who was killed at the battle of Jackson, Miss., during the Civil war. They had two sons, Walter A. and George B., soldiers in the great world war, both sergeants in Battery C, 137th field artillery, in the famous "Cyclone Division."

HOMER J. SKEETERS

The present incumbent of the office of county superintendent of schools of Parke county, Homer J. Skeeters, is well qualified by nature and by education for the position which he holds. A man of good education, rare tact in his dealings with young and old, a thorough understanding of the various needs of the youthful mind, combined with an earnest desire for the best in methods of imparting knowledge—truly Parke county is to be congratulated in her choice of this official.

Mr. Skeeters was born in Indiana, on the 28th day of April, 1884. He attended the public schools of his home district, was graduated from the high school at Marshall and from Bloomingdale Academy, after which he entered the Indiana State Normal School at Terre Haute. Following his graduation from this latter institution he entered the educational field, teaching school with marked success.

In February, 1911, Mr. Skeeters was appointed to the position of superintendent of the schools of Parke county—and in June of the same year was elected for a further term of four years. During his incumbency of this office the schools in his charge have been maintained upon a high plane of scholarship and progressive methods have been adopted.

During his years in the State Normal School Mr. Skeeters became a member of the Forum Literary Society of that institution. He is also affiliated with the fraternal orders of Free and Accepted Masons, Knights of Pythias and Modern Woodmen of America. On November 9, 1901, Mr. Skeeters was united in marriage to Miss Madge K. Harrison.

SAMUEL SKEETERS

Samuel Skeeters of Montezuma is one of the early settlers of Parke county and is largely interested in its growth and development. He was born in Mercer county, Missouri, on the 30th day of August, 1851. When he was six months of age, however, his parents came to Indiana, locating in Parke county, where he was reared, attending the common schools of the county. At an early age he engaged in the pursuit of agriculture, and has labored with such success that he is now the owner of several hundred acres of choice land. He was, for a number of years, president of the First National Bank of Montezuma, but sold his stock on account of other interests.

In the year 1894 Mr. Skeeters was elected township trustee, and in this capacity served for a term of six years. In 1914 he was nominated for county commissioner for the Second district, Parke county.

DE FOREST L. SKINNER

De Forest L. Skinner, a pioneer in the ranks of Indiana Democracy and for more than seventy years an honored resident of Porter county, has contributed in no small measure, in the many years that have passed, to the success of the party in his district and in the state.

Mr. Skinner was born in Hardwick, Caledonia county, Vermont, on November 1, 1835. When eleven years of age he accompanied his parents to Valparaiso, Porter county, Indiana, where the family residence was established. There he attended the common schools and later entered into the business and political life of the community.

On April 19, 1861, Mr. Skinner was united in marriage to Miss Rachel Maxwell, a native of Wayne county, this state.

During the sessions of the Indiana General Assembly in 1874 and 1878, Mr. Skinner was an active participant in legislative affairs, serving the state as representative from Porter and Lake counties. In 1882 he again was nominated for this position, but was defeated by a small majority, both counties going Republican. In 1886 he declined the honor of a further nomination. In 1882 the late Governor Porter appointed Mr. Skinner a member of the board of commissioners to construct three additional hospitals for the insane, these now being located at Evansville, Richmond and Logansport. He served upon this board during the administrations of Governors Porter, Gray and Hovey. Later he was appointed by Governor Chase to the position of trustee of the State Normal School at Terre Haute, but this honor he declined. In 1893 he represented this State at the World's Congress of Bankers, which met in Chicago during the Columbian Exposition, having been appointed to this position by Governor Claude Matthews.

Mr. Skinner has held prominent rank among the leaders of the Democracy in this State, and in 1880 served as delegate to the national convention at Cincinnati, and in 1888 to the convention at St. Louis.

L. ERT SLACK

L. Ert Slack, who served the people of Indiana in various county, district, state and federal offices, both by appointment and election, a native Hoosier, born October 8, 1874, in Johnson county, was, from the time he was twenty-one years of age, favorably and extensively known throughout the state through his political activities. He obtained his early education in the schools of Johnson county, afterwards attending Indiana Law School and graduating in 1897, when twenty-three years of age.

September 6, in the year of his graduation, he was admitted to the bar at Franklin, the county seat of Johnson county, and at once appointed deputy prosecuting attorney. He held that position only one year, however, resigning November 15, 1898.

He stumped Johnson county for the Democratic ticket in the campaign of that year and never missed participation in a state campaign after that time. Following his resignation as deputy prosecuting attorney, he was appointed county attorney for Johnson county December 4, 1899, and served in that office for six consecutive years.

In the fall of 1900 he was elected a representative from Johnson county and served in the lower house of the general assembly in the session of 1901. He was re-elected to the same position in 1902 and in the session of 1903 received the complimentary Democratic vote for speaker of the house.

He was nominated for joint senator from Johnson and Shelby counties June 7, 1904, being elected and serving in the state senate during the sessions of 1905 and 1907 and in the special session of 1908. His splendid record in both the house and senate attracted the attention of the Democrats of the State and made him a conspicuous candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor in 1908. While at that time, preceding the assembling of the convention, and during the campaign, Samuel M. Ralston seemed most likely to receive the nomination, L. Ert Slack was conceded to be his most dangerous opponent in a large field of candidates. In that historic convention, after the second ballot, the Slack stock gradually rose, and when the fourth ballot had been taken it was apparent to everyone that the fifth was sure to be a Slack stampede, unless some very decided action was taken to prevent it.

It was at this point that Ralston withdrew, the Ralston forces not concealing the fact that they were favorable to Thomas R. Marshall. The Ralston withdrawal resulted in all other candidates, save L. Ert Slack and Thomas R. Marshall, doing the same thing. This left but the two candidates and by general agreement they withdrew from the hall during the call of the roll on the fifth, and what proved to be the final ballot. Marshall led by just fifty-six votes.

When the candidates returned to the hall to hear the announcement the whole convention rose to greet and cheer Slack when he was called upon to speak. In the final vote 76 of the 92 counties of the State gave some votes to Slack. He led in 43 counties and was given an equal division in many of the others.

In the senatorial contest in the legislative session of 1909, when Benjamin F. Shively was elected United States senator, L. Ert Slack received nineteen votes on the fifth ballot.

Mr. Slack was appointed United States Attorney for the district of Indiana, serving through the administrations of Woodrow Wilson.

JUDGE THEODORE ELLIS SLINKARD

Born one mile south of Newberry, Ind., October 1, 1866; received his education in the common schools of Greene county, Indiana, and at the normal schools of the county; taught school and began study of law with his brother, William L. Slinkard, in 1893. Was admitted to the bar and practiced law in Greene and surrounding counties until November 15, 1912, when he qualified as judge of the Greene circuit court, having been elected at the election held that month.

He was married to Miss Mattie Brawand of Linton, Ind., September 1, 1889, and they have a family of four girls.

Judge Slinkard opens court every court day at 8:30 a. m. and closes at 6:00 p. m., and is always to be found at his post of duty.

His home is on West Main street in Bloomfield, where any and all persons who desire to visit his family receive a royal welcome.

Judge Slinkard has always been an active worker in the Democratic ranks and in the party councils, and has a high standing with the rank and file of that party, as well as the confidence of opposing party organizations.

JOHN D. SMALLEY

John D. Smalley, present mayor of Hammond, has been a resident of Indiana for more than twenty years, is a veteran of railway service; has been an official of the city nine years, leaving city comptrollership to take present position. His administration has been more than praiseworthy and many improvements in municipal affairs can be traced to him.

Born at Upper Sandusky, Ohio; graduating from high school there in 1878, he went to Nashville, Tenn.; returned to Ohio in 1880 and entered employ of Pennsylvania railroad, being promoted from one position to another. In 1892 he came to Hammond as agent for the Erie railroad; in 1903 was promoted to be supervising inspector joint rates bureau office, Chicago; retaining, however, his residence in Hammond. May 1, 1905, he was appointed comptroller, and held this position until March 8, 1911, when he filled vacancy as mayor on resignation of Judge Lawrence Becker, and was regularly elected mayor in November, 1913.

J. W. SMITH

For many years J. W. Smith has been a successful farmer and a stock man and is now closely identified with the commercial affairs of the city of Gosport.

Mr. Smith was born on a farm in Owen county, October 2, 1859. In this wholesome environment his youth and boyhood were passed, and he attended the schools of Gosport. Early in life he entered the pursuit of agriculture for himself.

On February 23, 1883, Mr. Smith was united in marriage to Miss Rosa Vickery, also of Owen county. He established his home on a farm and there remained until the year 1911. He is well known throughout the county as a successful stock raiser and a shipper of grain.

Mr. Smith has been an aggressive party worker and has served as township committeeman and as delegate to county, district and state conventions. Fraternally, he is allied with the order of Free and Accepted Masons.

GLENN A. SMILEY

Glenn A. Smiley is one of the ablest and most popular of the young lawyers of Fort Wayne, and is also regarded as one of the staunchest Democrats in Allen county. He was born in Fayette county, Indiana, April 24, 1885, and was graduated from Indiana University in 1907 with an arts degree, and in 1910 with an LL. B. He was admitted to the bar in 1908 and has since February 11, 1911, been actively engaged in the practice of law in Fort Wayne.

Mr. Smiley takes a warm and lively interest in all public affairs, and is a member of the executive board of the state branch of the American Peace Society, first president of the Associated Christian Works of Fort Wayne, president of the Indiana University Alumni Association in Allen county, was the principal organizer of the Association of the Fort Wayne Coterie Club, and is first president of the Young Men's Forward Congress, of Fort Wayne, an organization which has for its aim civic betterment. His high character and recognized ability induced many of his friends to urge him to enter the Democratic primary in the spring of 1914 as candidate for state senator, and he received the second highest vote in a field of six candidates. It is believed by many that he could easily have had the nomination if he had pledged himself to oppose legislation favorable to state-wide prohibition. Such a stand would have been opposed to his principles, his Democracy and his freedom of action; and his refusal upon this occasion to interfere with the trend of public sentiment, even for his own benefit, must eventually redound to his credit in the promising career that lies ahead of him.

EDWARD SMITH

It is seldom the good fortune of a man to conduct successfully a business concern for forty years, but this is the record of Edward Smith, a leading citizen of Newcastle and proprietor of a thriving drug store since the year 1874. Mr. Smith was born in this state on the 6th day of April, 1859, and received his schooling in the public schools of his present home city. On the 25th day of September, 1882, he was united in marriage to Miss Mary E. Bouslog, and their home has extended its hospitality to many friends and acquaintances throughout the years that have passed. Six children were born to this union, the only son, Howard R., being a lieutenant in the aviation section, now with the United States forces in Europe.

Since attaining his majority Mr. Smith has been actively engaged in the furtherance of the cause of Democracy, and was a delegate to the national convention at Denver in 1908. In this year, also, he was appointed a member of the school board of the city, serving in this capacity for two years. In the fall of 1909 he was elected councilman, and this position he has since held, until his appointment, in 1914, to the greater responsibilities of postmaster of the city.

JOHN W. SMITH, M. D.

The present Auditor of Switzerland county has evidenced his versatility by having achieved distinction in various lines of endeavor. Dr. John W. Smith is a native of Ontario, Canada, born on the third day of February, 1867. Here he received his schooling, and after completing the grammar grades, attended St. Catherine's Collegiate Institute. Later a course in medicine was taken in the medical department of the University of Buffalo, of Buffalo, N. Y., and after his graduation from this institution he located in the city of Vevay and entered into the active practice of medicine in February, 1885.

On the 29th day of April, 1891, he was united in marriage to Miss Bettie DuFour.

Since coming to Indiana, he has taken an active part in the various campaigns, laboring loyally for the furtherance of Democratic principles. On the first day of January, 1913, he assumed the duties of auditor of Switzerland county, and in this position still serves with credit and distinction.

JOHN LAWRENCE SMITH

John Lawrence Smith was born in Connecticut, November 30, 1860. His father, a Union soldier, was killed in the Civil war in 1864. His mother died in Bellevue Hospital, New York, in 1866. In May, 1867, the boy was one of two hundred orphan children sent out from New York to find a home in the West. The first stop made by the train was at Williamsport, Ind., where the boy found a home. After much privation and many hardships he attained self-dependence and sought earnestly to acquire an education. Until nineteen years of age he worked on the farm and worked in the winter months for his board and attended three months' terms of school. In 1881 he attended the State Normal School at Terre Haute, and in 1882 began teaching. He taught for five years, and in 1887 bought the Vermilion County Democrat, editing the paper for five years. In 1893 he was appointed post-master at Dana, Ind., by President Cleveland. In 1895 he bought the Winchester Democrat, which he published two years, then sold out and bought a half interest in the Richmond (Ind.) Sun. In 1899 he returned to Winchester and again edited the Democrat until November, which he has pursued up to the present time.

Mr. Smith is devoted to the principles of the Democratic party and no campaign passes that does not call for a defense from his pen for the faith that is in him. He is credited with owning the largest private library in the state, a good proportion of which is made up of books by Indiana authors and pertaining to Indiana.

OMAR B. SMITH

Omar B. Smith, who bears the distinction of having been the first mayor of the city of Rochester, Indiana, has been for many years closely identified with the business life of that place. He was born in Indiana on the 1st of November, 1868, and attended the common and high schools of Rochester. On the 29th day of December, 1891, he was united in marriage to Miss Leila N. Copeland, and they have since made this city their home.

In the fall of 1909 the city of Rochester held its first municipal election under its present form of government, and Mr. Smith was chosen mayor, his term of office extending from January 1, 1910, to December 31, 1913.

He has for a number of years been engaged in the banking business, and is at present cashier of the First National Bank of Rochester, and president of the Fulton State Bank of Fulton, Indiana.

REUBEN E. SMITH

Reuben E. Smith was born in Owen county, Indiana, September 6, 1879, moving with his family to Clay county in 1882. He was educated in the common schools and in the Brazil Business University, graduating in the class of 1910. He was one of the weighers at the coal mines when he was elected in 1912 to the office of recorder in Clay county, serving in this position for four years. While he was recorder he was also secretary of the Democratic county central committee, and was always an active worker in the party.

R. CHANNING M. SMITH

R. Channing M. Smith of McCordsville, Ind., has for many years been identified with public affairs of Marion and Hancock counties and enjoys the esteem of a wide circle of acquaintances and friends in this section of the State.

He was born in Hanover county, Virginia, near the birthplace of Patrick Henry and of Henry Clay, on the 30th day of January, 1844. He attended the schools of this State until he reached the age of sixteen, at which time his parents came to Marion county, Indiana, settling upon a farm near the town of Acton, and here the son's schooling was continued. On the 3d day of June, 1875, he was married to Miss Elizabeth A. Teague. During their residence in Marion county he served as trustee of Franklin township one term and as assessor three terms. In the year 1891 he moved to McCordsville, where he has since remained. Here he conducted a general store until fire destroyed his stock in 1906. He held the position of township trustee of Vernon township, Hancock county, for six years, retiring in 1914. Mr. Smith is a life-long Democrat and descended from a long line of Democratic ancestors.

JAMES P. SNODGRASS

James P. Snodgrass, an active Democratic worker of Hendricks county and resident of Danville, was born in Clinton county, where his early schooling was received. Later his studies were continued at the Indiana State Normal of Terre Haute and Central Normal College of Danville. After his graduation from the latter institution he engaged in educational work, teaching in the public schools, and later occupying the position of principal of the Danville public schools, where he remained from 1909 to 1913. At the expiration of this period of service he assumed the duties of prosecuting attorney for the 55th judicial district, being elected to this position in 1912, and re-elected in 1914.

Since attaining his majority he has held a position of influence in the county organization, first in Clinton county and later in Hendricks, attending the various state and congressional conventions.

He is a member of the Christian church, the Indiana Democratic club and the fraternal orders I. O. O. F. and Masons.

J. FRANK SNYDER

The gentleman whose name appears above has had much to do with the moulding of public opinion in the community in which he has served as a newspaper writer and editor much of the time for the past thirty-five years. He has always stood for the highest ideals of morals in the community, fearless yet considerate in advocacy of things for the community's welfare and uplift.

He was born in the state of Ohio on the 14th day of December, 1852, but in his childhood accompanied his parents to Kosciusko county, Indiana. Here he attended the public school, completed his education, taught for several years, and later became interested in newspaper work. In the year 1879 he came to Lagrange county and established the Democrat, the leading organ of the party in that section of the state. During the first administration of President Grover Cleveland he was appointed postmaster of Lagrange and held the position for nearly five years. Most of the time since his entry into the county has been spent in newspaper work. During all these years he has been a consistent adherent of the tenets of Thomas Jefferson and has sought through the organs which he has controlled to promulgate the principles of true Democracy at all times. He, for a time, was one of the editors of the Lagrange Democrat-Call, which stands as the Democrat newspaper of the county, and which he established and has been running continuously in party service since 1879, thus exerting a marked influence in the community.

Mrs. Snyder, to whom he was married in Kosciusko county in the year 1878, was formerly Miss Gertrude Hoover, and as the presiding genius of his home her influence has been of inestimable assistance to him in his work. Together they have won a large circle of friends in the city where they have spent so many years of life.

ALBERT SPANAGEL

The present postmaster of the city of Lawrenceburg has been for many years closely identified with the business and political life of the place. He was born in Lawrenceburg on the 20th day of June, 1873, and there his education was received.

On the 14th day of September, 1902, Mr. Spanagel was united in marriage to Miss Jeanette Emmerson. To this union have been born four children, George, Lewis, whom death called at the age of four; Emmerson G., Elizabeth and Harry B.

For twelve years Mr. Spanagel was engaged in the men's furnishings business. During the period between 1910 and 1914 he served in the city council, and in the latter year was appointed postmaster at Lawrenceburg.

WILLIAM W. SPENCER

William W. Spencer, who for many years has been a prominent figure in Democratic politics in Indiana, was born in Jefferson county, this state, October 7, 1851. He came of a family which had showed its loyalty and love for the principles of Democracy, so it was only natural that he should follow in the footsteps of those who had gone before.

Mr. Spencer served his first political apprenticeship as a ward committeeman in Marion county in 1880 and the value of his work in that capacity led to a demand that he become a candidate for the position of Democratic county chairman. He was successful as a candidate and successful as a chairman, so successful, in fact, that he was re-elected without trouble. He served his party again as city chairman on two different occasions. And not regarding this service as sufficient to a cause he loved, he gave his time and effort to the work of legal advisor to the Democratic state committee for many years.

Reward, the only reward he ever sought in the way of official position, came when the Democrats sent Mr. Spencer to the Indiana house of representatives, and when they returned him to this position to give further service to the cause. The value of Mr. Spencer's service in this connection was so widely recognized that he has since repeatedly been appointed by Democratic and Republican officials to assist in the interpretation of laws and in other legal work along civic lines.

Mr. Spencer for many years has made his home in Indianapolis, where he is engaged in the practice of law.

ALFRED A. SPHUNG

Alfred A. Sphung, a well-known citizen of North Judson, has had a somewhat varied career, but throughout his life has stood for the principles of Democracy and for the best in municipal government. Mr. Sphung is a native of the Dominion of Canada, born on the 15th day of February, 1853, but was reared in the States, having moved with his parents in his boyhood to the state of Michigan, where he received his schooling. As a youth he entered the employ of a steamship company, serving on the Great Lakes. During a shore leave spent in Chicago he made a hasty trip to Valparaiso and was so well pleased with the place that he decided to remain in Indiana.

In the year 1880 Mr. Sphung was united in marriage to Miss Elmira Jane Adams. After their marriage he and his wife established their home in Starke county, and there they have since remained. Mr. Sphung served for some time as a member of the town board and in 1909 was elected trustee for a term of four years, at the expiration of which period he was re-elected. During this term of service he ever evinced the most conscientious zeal and loyalty in the service of the public and conducted the affairs of his office in a clean, progressive manner.

Mr. Sphung is widely known as a successful dealer in biological material.

WILLIAM F. SPOONER

To the citizens of Porter county William F. Spooner needs no introduction, the various positions of responsibility he has held in Valparaiso, including that of mayor of the city for a period of eight years, having given him a wide and agreeable acquaintance throughout that section of the state.

Mr. Spooner is a native of the state of Massachusetts, born on the 25th of May, 1848. He attended the parochial schools of his home district, later entering Holy Cross College at Worcester, for a course of study in the higher branches. In the year 1869 he came west and located in Chicago, where he became actively interested in the political affairs of the old second ward. In 1882 he moved to Valparaiso, entering there the grocery business in partnership with his brother-in-law,

M. S. Harrold, who then was city treasurer, elected on the Democratic ticket. Mr. Spooner soon became actively engaged in the business and political life of the place and in 1899 was elected alderman for a two-year term. In 1902 he was elected to the high office of mayor of the city, and in that capacity served until 1906. In 1910 he again was elected to this position for a further term of four years, and served with much credit to himself and to the party. During the period from 1908 to 1914 Mr. Spooner served also as county chairman for the Democratic organization, and has in every possible way been true to the traditions of Massachusetts Democracy, it having been said of him that he is unchangeable in his party fealty.

On August 18, 1874, Mr. Spooner was married to Miss Anna Harrold of Chicago, who has been a worthy second in the labors that have shaped her husband's career.

ALEXANDER SPYCHALSKI

An active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party and one who has contributed valuable services to the local organization is Alexander Spychalski, the present clerk of Michigan City.

He is a native of this State, born on the 3rd day of December, 1888, in Laporte county. His education was received in the St. Stanislaus school of Michigan City, and since his graduation he has taken an active part in business and political affairs of this community. During the various campaigns through which he has passed since attaining his majority Mr. Spychalski has lost no opportunity to labor for the furtherance of the interests of Democracy.

On the 5th day of January, 1914, he assumed the duties of city clerk, his term of office to expire January 1, 1918. Prior to his election to this position of responsibility he was employed as bookkeeper with the Midland Chair & Seating Co.

He is a member of the Knights of Columbus, Catholic order of Foresters and member of St. Stanislaus church.

JOSEPH H. STAHL

Prominently identified with the educational and political life of Fountain county is Joseph H. Stahl. Mr. Stahl was born in Owen county, Ind., on the 9th day of January, 1879, and there his boyhood days were spent. He attended the public schools of Patricksburg and after completing the course offered there entered the State Normal School at Terre Haute, graduating in 1906. In the meantime he taught in the public schools of Owen county, and later was assistant in German and chemistry in the Martinsville High School, principal of the Hymera and Thorntown high schools and superintendent of the Newtown schools, and has always taken an active interest in all matters pertaining to educational advancement.

In the year 1911 he entered the Indiana Law School at Indianapolis, and the following year was admitted to the bar and began the active practice of law, finding in the legal profession a broad field for the exercise of his keen intelligence and abounding energy.

In 1912 he was elected representative for Fountain county, receiving a majority of thirty-six above the combined vote of two other opponents. During his service in the legislature, he was active in its deliberations, serving on important committees and as chairman of the committee on education. He was widely known as the father of the Stahl-Yarling vocational education bill.

He was appointed as business manager of the teachers' and young people's reading circle in 1914 and has taken a deep interest in this work.

On the 22nd day of June, 1906, he was married to Miss Mary Luella Riffle, and she has since presided over his home, extending its hospitality to their many friends. They have a daughter, Gayle Katrine, to share the comforts and add cheer to their home.

Mr. Stahl is an adherent to the Lutheran faith and a past chancellor of the Knights of Pythias lodge at Newtown.

WILLIAM H. STEMM, M. D.

The name of Dr. Stemm is a familiar one to the citizens of Jennings county, being that of one of their number who has won distinction as a physician and surgeon, and also as an honored public official.

Dr. Stemm is a native of the state of Maryland, having been born in the town of Hancock, situated on the Baltimore & Ohio railroad. During his boyhood he attended a private school in Washington, D. C., and graduated from the high school of Fredericktown, Ohio, with the class of 1880. His studies were further continued at the University of Cincinnati, from which he graduated in the medical department in March, 1887.

On the first day of June, 1885, his marriage to Miss Mary New of Vernon, Ind., was solemnized, and their home was established in the city of North Vernon. To this union two children were born: Mrs. Victor C. Lochard and John Dudley Stemm. He entered into the active practice of his profession and has won a position of prominence in medical circles of the state. In 1907 he was unanimously elected first vice-president of the Indiana State Medical Association. He has been a member of the executive and finance committees of the association for the past ten years. He is president of the Jennings county society for the study and prevention of tuberculosis.

In 1910 he was elected mayor of North Vernon, serving for a term of four years. In April, 1910, he was elected chairman of the Jennings county Democratic central committee and was elected to succeed himself twice; he has given freely of his time and energy to discharge the duties of this position.

Dr. Stemm is a life-long Democrat and has attended county, congressional, state and national conventions. He is affiliated with the orders of Masons, Knights of Pythias and Odd Fellows, amongst whom he has a large circle of friends.

His son, John Dudley Stemm, at the age of twenty-two years, was nominated and elected to the office of county surveyor in 1914.

JOHN WESLEY STEVENSON

To the citizens of the town of Knox and vicinity the name of John Wesley Stevenson is a familiar one, its bearer being a former official of the township and a business man of the place.

Mr. Stevenson was born in this state on March 6, 1863. His schooling was received in the public schools of Knox and he has since remained in that town, where his friendships have been formed and where his business has been built up.

On October 20, 1895, Mr. Stevenson was united in marriage to Miss Florence Montgomery, who has proved a faithful assistant in her husband's various undertakings.

For a period of six years Mr. Stevenson served as assessor of his home township, while thus serving bringing to the administration of the affairs of that office conscientious zeal and energy. In the year 1914 he was again a candidate for this position. He also is widely known as a local dealer in metropolitan newspapers, serving the people of his home town with Chicago, Indianapolis and South Bend papers.

Politically, Mr. Stevenson is a staunch Democrat, consistently voting the ticket and working for the cause.

James L. Stewart, whose residence is near the city of Kokomo, is a loyal worker in the cause of Democracy in Howard county.

Mr. Stewart is a native of Johnson county, Indiana, born on July 18, 1865. He accompanied his parents to Howard county in his childhood, and there his schooling was received. After his marriage to Miss Lillie J. Sedan he established his home near the site of his former abode. Mr. Stewart was reared in the wholesome environment of the farm and is still interested in the pursuit of agriculture.

Since attaining his majority Mr. Stewart has been a zealous worker for the cause of Democracy and has served faithfully as precinct committeeman and as committeeman of the second district.

GEORGE W. STIDGER

George W. Stidger of Kokomo was born in the State of Ohio on the 6th day of January, 1839, but in his childhood accompanied his parents to the State of Iowa and later to Tennessee, in both of which States he attended school. On the 11th day of June, 1877, he was united in marriage to Miss L. L. Henderson. He has been a diligent worker in the ranks of the Democratic party and served in the city council for five and one-half years, at the expiration of which time he assumed the duties of mayor of the city. His administration was marked by progress, always keeping in mind the best interests of the people, and many reforms were undertaken and completed.

H. E. STINGER

One of the most active Democratic workers of Franklin county for many years is H. E. Stinger, a citizen of Brookville and a native of the county. He was born June 6, 1866, on a farm nine miles east of Brookville, and attended the district schools of Springfield township. On the first day of January, 1891, he was united in marriage to Miss Clara C. Kimball, and to them have been born nine children, the youngest of whom bears the name Woodrow Wilson. In November, 1905, Mr. Stinger was elected sheriff of the county, assuming the duties of office January 1, 1906, his term of office expiring with the close of 1909. He served his party as precinct committeeman for twenty-five years. He served as doorkeeper of the house of representatives of the general assembly of Indiana for three sessions, and has been a regular attendant at the state conventions of the party. Fraternaly, he is allied with the Knights of Pythias, among whom he has a wide circle of friends.

J. M. STINSON

J. M. Stinson was born in Missouri on March 27, 1875. When but a lad he moved with his parents to Kentucky, where he grew up. At the age of eighteen he borrowed twelve dollars to get to Valparaiso, Indiana, where, without funds, he entered the college at that place. Working his way through, he was graduated at the end of four years, in 1897. In that same year he located in Hammond and has there won success in both law and business. He was admitted to practice in the federal court June 5, 1901.

Mr. Stinson represents several banks and other large businesses as an attorney. He is president of the Gary Granite, Brick & Stone Co., president of the Clarence I. Hoffman Construction Co. and president of Employes Real Estate & Investment Co. at Indiana Harbor. Mr. Stinson is a member of the Hammond Country Club, the Garfield Club, Chamber of Commerce and the Hammond Motor Boat Club. He is prominent in Masonic circles, being a Knight Templar and Mystic Shriner. He also is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, Elks, Modern Woodmen and Royal League.

On August 11, 1897, Mr. Stinson married Florence Anna Wolcott of Glidden, Iowa, and to this union two children have been born.

DR. CHARLES I. STOTELMYER

Dr. Charles I. Stotemyer, a prominent physician of Hagerstown, was born on a farm in Frederick county, Maryland, September 7, 1859. There he received his early schooling, and after his graduation from the high school entered the state normal school for further work. At the age of eighteen years he entered the educational field, and for eight years taught in the public schools. In the year 1885 he became engaged in newspaper work, publishing a weekly paper in Wolfsville, Md., and there served as postmaster under President Cleveland. Three years later he entered the University of Maryland, from which institution he was graduated in 1892. He also took a clinical course at Johns Hopkins University. Upon the completion of this medical course Dr. Stotemyer came to Indiana, locating at Hagerstown, where he has since been actively engaged in the practice of his profession.

In the year 1884 Dr. Stotemyer was united in marriage to Miss Ellen Hayes, who died in January, 1886, leaving two children. In 1892 the Doctor married, secondly, Miss Sarah A. Brown of Wayne county.

In the fall of 1909 Dr. Stotemyer was elected trustee of Jefferson township, his home township, for a term of six years. At the expiration of this period he entered the field as candidate for joint senator from Wayne and Union counties.

Dr. Stotelmeyer is affiliated with the Masonic order and with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is a member of the Wayne, Western Wayne and Jefferson township Democratic clubs.

EVAN B. STOTSENBURG

Evan B. Stotsenburg was born at New Albany, Indiana, May 16, 1865, the son of John H. and Jane F. (Miller) Stotsenburg. His father had been a practicing attorney at New Albany since 1852, continuing there to his death, which occurred June 7, 1909.

Evan B. Stotsenburg, after completing the grade and high school course at New Albany, attended the University of Louisville and Kenyon College, Ohio. He was admitted to the bar May 17, 1886, practicing afterward with his father at New Albany. Following his father's retirement and death he continued to practice alone until 1900, when he formed a partnership with John H. Weathers which still continues. He represented his county in the 59th General Assembly and was state senator from 1905 to 1913, in 1911 being president pro tem of the senate. His excellent judgment made him always a leader in the two bodies during his terms.

In 1915 Governor Ralston appointed Mr. Stotsenburg as attorney-general, to fill out the term of Richard M. Milburn, who died while in office.

He was a member of the Floyd county and State bar associations, a Mason, El'k, Knight of Pythias and one of the best Democrats in the State of Indiana. He was always one of the strongest campaigners in the State for the Democratic cause and in several campaigns was selected to make the keynote addresses.

Mr. Stotsenburg was married to Zenobia Borden in 1892.

WILLIAM MARTIN STROBEL

A gentleman who has devoted his time and energies to the upbuilding of the cause of Democracy in Clay county is William Martin Strobel. He was born in Jackson township, Clay county, on the 19th day of September, 1881, the date of the burial of President Garfield. His education was received in the public schools of the county, and later in the State Normal School at Valparaiso. After his graduation, he taught school for a number of years, later taking up clerical work, which he has followed for the past twelve years. He was formerly city councilman for the first ward in Brazil, and in the fall of 1912 was elected clerk of the circuit court, his term of office to expire in 1916. His wife was formerly Miss Mary E. Salladay and to them has been born one son. Mr. Strobel is affiliated with the Masonic and Elks lodges.

FREDERICK STRITTER

Frederick Stritter, an active worker in the ranks of the Democracy of Vanderburg county since the year 1890 and the very efficient incumbent of the office of county recorder, is a native of Germany, his birth having occurred on the 23d day of March, 1849, in Wetterau. When but two and one-half years of age, however, he was brought to America by his parents, at which time they located in the East. After a short interval they emigrated to the State of Kentucky and still later settled in Mt. Vernon, Ind. Here the son Frederick received his schooling, but his education has continued until the present, as he is by nature studious and seeking at all times to enlarge his fund of knowledge.

On the 16th day of January, 1884, he was united in marriage to Miss Amelia K. Schmitt, and later their home was established in Evansville.

During the Civil war Mr. Stritter was thoroughly in sympathy with the cause of the Union, and during the years immediately following this struggle he was a member of the Republican party, running for the office of Secretary of State in 1887. However, in 1890, being a strong adherent of a tariff for revenue only and not being in sympathy with the Republican high tariff ideas of the day, he returned to the ranks of Democracy, and since this time has labored zealously for the advancement of the cause.

Although a staunch adherent of Democratic principles, he has not been known as an office seeker, and it was not until the year 1910 that he actively entered the race for public office. In this year he was elected to the position of county recorder, and in this capacity is now serving his second term, and so far the affairs of the office have been administered with great efficiency and loyalty to the interests of the public.

FREDERICK V. STUCKY, M. D.

Dr. Frederick V. Stucky, physician and druggist of Gosport, was born in that city February 12, 1862. He attended the public schools of his home town and after graduating from the high school entered Earlham College for work in the higher branches. Later a course in medicine was pursued at the University of Louisville, from which he was graduated in the year 1884. Returning to Gosport he entered into the active practice of his profession and there he has since remained.

Dr. Stucky is now a member of the board of pension examiners. Three times he was elected to the office of coroner, but in each instance refused to qualify for that service. He holds membership in the county and state medical associations and in the state pharmaceutical society. He also is affiliated with the Methodist church and with the Masons and Knights of Pythias.

On December 27, 1888, Dr. Stucky was united in marriage to Miss Magnolia Campbell.

SILAS E. SWAIM

Silas E. Swaim, for a quarter of a century the editor and publisher of the Hammond Daily, is known throughout northern Indiana as a leader in the ranks of the Democracy of that section and the consistent promulgator of the principles of Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. Swaim was born in Boone county on the 6th day of January, 1865, and attended the public schools of Zionsville, and later the Ladoga Normal. Early in his career he launched into the field of journalism at Zionsville, and finding here the profession for which he seemed best fitted, he has remained with rare tenacity of purpose. In the year 1890 he established the Hammond Daily, and this organ has been long known and respected for its unvarying position on the side of right and justice and its progressive attitude on questions affecting the development of the community.

On the 1st day of February, 1911, Mr. Swaim was appointed deputy oil inspector, and in this field he has also rendered valuable service to the commonwealth.

Mrs. Swaim, to whom he was united in marriage on the 15th day of September, 1888, was formerly Miss Flota B. Wood, of Zionsville, Ind., and has been associated with Mr. Swaim and a co-worker in all his newspaper career.

Politically, Mr. Swaim has never wavered from the Democratic principles, and in the various campaigns through which he has passed his services to the party, by personal effort and through the columns of the press, have been invaluable. He is considered the best informed man in regard to Democratic affairs in Lake county.

Fraternally, he is allied with K. of P., I. O. O. F., Maccabees and Woodmen.

ALLEN SWOPE

For many years a public official of Seymour and a leading citizen of Jackson county, Allen Swope is so well known that little introduction is needed in speaking of him in that community.

Mr. Swope was born in Vernon township, Jackson county, on the 14th day of January, 1856. He attended the public schools of his district and later continued his studies at Wabash College. After his marriage to Miss Laura Bain, also a native of Jackson county and Vernon township, he established his home in the city of Seymour.

In the year 1880 Mr. Swope was elected trustee of Vernon township, and so faithfully did he perform the duties of that office that he was twice re-elected. In the year 1892 he was elected representative from his county to the state legislature, and again the faithful performance of the duties involved gained his re-election twice. In November, 1909, he was elected mayor and in 1914 was appointed postmaster of Seymour.

ANDREW M. TAFF

A true representative of Jefferson county, born and reared within its borders and for many years identified with the business and political life of the community, Andrew M. Taff is highly esteemed as a representative citizen.

Mr. Taff was born on the 16th day of January, 1855, near his present home, and attended the public schools of Jefferson county, later continuing his studies in the high schools of Scott and Clark counties. He has always taken an active interest in farming and has for many years been the proprietor of a successful livery and undertaking business in the town of Deputy. On the 25th day of April, 1878, he was united in marriage to Miss Emma Mills.

On the 1st day of January, 1911, Mr. Taff assumed the duties of auditor of Jefferson county, and for three years his time was devoted to this work. He has always taken an active part in the work of the Democratic organization in his community and has given freely of his time and means for the best interest of his party.

SENATOR THOMAS TAGGART

If nothing were ever written of the accomplishments of Senator Thomas Taggart in a political or in any other way until he were induced to talk of them or discuss them personally, then nothing would ever be written. A great part of his schooling in a successful political and business career was to keep his own counsel, to talk of these things only when he talked to some purpose looking to accomplishment. Once accomplished, he was ever too busy with new efforts to stop to discuss what was in the past.

So it happened that whatever was to be told must be from those who had associated with him, or whatever the memory of the writer might revive. With all this there never was in this or in any other State a more interesting personage or career in either business or politics to the general reader, whether acquaintance or not.

It would be overlooking the greatest element that shaped his career of success if the writer did not stop long enough to observe that his spirit of absolute unselfishness and his efforts to serve others, without ostentation, were one of the most potent factors in his phenomenal success. Few men ever had so many friends who were always happy to claim such friendship. To these he assigned a large part of the credit for what he was able to do. But while he exaggerated this notion in his own mind, he was never inclined to discuss it for the one reason, no doubt, that it might presuppose he had accomplished something unusual.

Sufficient of early history to recite that when he started his business journey at Xenia, Ohio, cleaning out the depot lunch room and beating the old-fashioned gong "when the train comes in," he started as a bare-foot, dirty-face lad, for in that day they were not known as "kids." He was just a plain, uninteresting, freckle-face youngster, when the freckles could be seen under the foreign substance—for one thing he freely admitted, always, was far from caring whether his face was ever washed.

One day some nice woman who thought she saw something out of the ordinary in young Taggart took the trouble to tell him how much nicer he would look if he had a clean face. It sort of set him to thinking, and he began to "spruce up" and he became the cleanest "fixture" in the lunch room. About the same time the man who was bossing the place told him about the corners of the room not being scrubbed clean, and from that time he got busy cleaning the corners and found how much nicer things looked.

He learned something then that stayed with him the rest of his life, and he never forgot the importance of impressing the same notion upon his employes at the French Lick Springs hotel. One of the greatest of the characteristics of that place is the absolute cleanliness of the grounds and magnificent buildings. They are not only so clean that they would make the gold dust twins or the sun-bonneted Dutch maidens with mops and brooms really ashamed of their untidiness, but the peculiar thing is that the guests about the place never saw any of the cleaning being done. Just how he manages that part of it is the Taggart invention which is different from most other hotels.

But to return to the individual. Naturally, in such a publication as this, a great part of the history of the Democratic party in Indiana must reflect and recite the individual doings of Thomas Taggart. He is a large part of the party history. He must be so from the very nature of things. Yet were the publication incomplete without some direct reference after this fashion to some of the things he did, taking largely some of those which more than anything else serve to illustrate the character and business superiority of the man.

Briefly, forced to earn in order that he might live, education of the school-room variety must take the second place. It was because a certain young public school teacher thought she saw something unusual in the youngster's ability, and his wish to be taught, that she agreed to give him her evenings, or a part of them, for study and recitation of the common-school branches. While working in the Xenia Depot lunch room he got through this teacher whatever he got in the nature of "school learning." The rest of his substantial and practical education came from hard knocks.

When this young man had grown, and when he became United States senator from Indiana, one of the first letters to reach him, and one of the most prized, was from that school teacher. "She is married now and has a fine family of her own," he remarked as he re-read the letter, "but I will address her by her maiden name—the name by which I knew her in my kid days." This letter was laid aside to be answered with pen and ink.

From gong-beater and the freckle-face pusher of brooms and mops, he went by various stages to the management of the lunch room and was glad to raise himself. Then he was transferred to northern Indiana as manager of a larger lunch room, and still later to Indianapolis to run the lunch room in the union depot. That was not only an important step upward, but it was where he started to interest himself in the active political game. The old depot was a sort of center for the leaders who formed the working organization, and Thomas Taggart was soon one of them. Sooner than they had anticipated he was their leader. They were glad to follow him, for he had shown them how to do things that spelled success.

His ambition extended beyond the management of the lunch room even of the Indianapolis union depot, and he opened the Grand hotel, which not only remained the center of the Democratic party activities of the state for a number of years, but also was a most successful hotel property under the Taggart management. It was the beginning of the Taggart hotel successes.

It was about this time that Mr. Taggart decided to become a candidate for office on his own account. He had spent a number of years and much efforts putting others into official positions. That had been his pleasure. He became the candidate of his party for the office of auditor of Marion county. Twice he was elected; each time with an increasingly bitter fight from the opposition press, since his popularity was developing into a dangerous thing for the opposing party to meet.

When first nominated for auditor he was none too flush with funds. So the story has been told that one of those big-hearted, old-fashioned and frugal Irish women who had been in his employ for a long time, one much older than himself, and at least more thoughtful for the future comforts, had saved a good part of her earnings; that she came forward and placed her savings at his disposal with: "Tommy, my boy, you have no money to make your race. You have always spent all your money to get things for the other boys. You are going to be elected sure. Use this to help make it sure."

He took the money. He probably never used a cent of it, but put it in the bank to keep for her. He would not have hurt her feelings by refusing her the happiness of participating in his success. When he became United States senator there was another letter in the mail to congratulate him. It carried a postmark from some place over in Illinois. He read it through several times, for it was brief, and his only comment was, "There is a dear old soul," as he laid it aside for a special answer. It has been told, though not by Senator Taggart, that the woman who wrote the letter is living in a pretty little home over in Illinois, in the town of her nativity.

In his last race for county auditor Mr. Taggart's opponent the morning after a friend and neighbor one who could ill afford the expenses of his campaign. The morning after election day the two of them met on the rear platform going down town. "How much did it cost you, Bill?" was one of the Taggart questions. They rode on down town together. They went to the bank together and in some manner "Bill," no matter about his real name, knew that his bank account had been made whole. He went to his job that morning feeling much better satisfied with the outlook for the wife and kiddies.

During his second term as auditor Mr. Taggart became candidate for mayor of Indianapolis, resigning his county office to make the race. Three times he was elected mayor, and each time with increased newspaper abuse and increased majorities. The newspaper comment on the result on one occasion, following the campaign in which President Benjamin Harrison was called upon to take part and did take part in the fight against him, was that "it was impossible, even with the influence of the president thrown into the fight, to break the solid vote of the Democrats or to keep hundreds of Republicans who are special friends and admirers of Thomas Taggart from voting for him. He led his ticket by at least several hundred." This from the paper that fought him most bitterly.

When Mr. Taggart decided for the time being to retire from holding office and devote himself to his personal affairs, taking over the French Lick Springs hotel properties, the newspapers which had fought him politically rejoiced in the clearing of the political situation and proceeded to do all in their power to destroy or prevent his business success. Nothing known to the art of destroying other men's legitimate business was ever overlooked by these agencies to make whatever he did a failure. He never knew a business failure. The abuse by the press was because he would not retire from political activities of all sorts. Despite the destructive methods used against him, and because of the business acumen of Thomas Taggart, his success grew to one of the most remarkable in rapidity and size of development that has ever been accomplished in the hotel world.

His power in political things never decreased. His one diversion was politics and doing things for his friends. He liked "to help the boys along," as he expressed it. His influence in party affairs for years was national. No other man was ever more continuously and conspicuously a factor in shaping the doings of both state and national conventions. No other man ever did these things more successfully or with so little ostentation or apparent effort. He always chose to make himself the least conspicuous worker about any convention, but his hand was the deciding power in shaping results. In the conventions which named Grover Cleveland, the men who attended from other states have told many times how "Tom Taggart was the general who kept things moving to results."

In 1904 at St. Louis, where Parker was named as the party candidate, Mr. Taggart incurred some eternal enmities because of his opposition to others who, he believed, would be less desirable to the voters of the nation than Alton B. Parker.

In 1908 Mr. Taggart was again the recognized leader of the Democratic national convention at Denver. That was when John Worth Kern was named as the running mate of William Jennings Bryan. At the time of holding the convention Mr. Taggart was national chairman. As a token of their appreciation of his "know-how" in doing things that amount to something, the other leaders who had followed presented him a Rocky Mountain "canary"—one having the largest ears, the most determined looking disposition and the loudest "hee-haw" of the species. They delivered it to his room on the ninth floor of the Brown Palace hotel during his absence, and tied it to the bed.

The convention at Baltimore, one of the most important in the history of the country, as later developments demonstrated beyond any chance of dispute, is best described by William F. McCombs, to whom was ascribed the credit for nominating Woodrow Wilson, and to whose persistent efforts the results were of course due, notwithstanding all that was said of the Bryan performances. But McCombs did not claim it all by a whole lot. He paid tribute to the generalship of Thomas Taggart.

Sitting in the lobby of the big French Lick Springs hotel, some months after Woodrow Wilson had been elected and when the second nomination was the thing before the people, Mr. McCombs pointed to the little office away across the big space and remarked: "There is the real general who made Woodrow Wilson president and Thomas R. Marshall vice-president. I was there and I ought to know. I was given lots of credit for nominating Wilson because I had carried on the fight long before the convention met. Without the seasoned generalship of Tom Taggart in the convention it might never have happened as it did. He knew when and how to make the move and turn. He had worked through the long hours and days and nights, being never far in the foreground, shaping things in such a way that at the proper moment he could control the finishing moves. The big convention had never got to the point, in all the excitement and turmoil, where the proper thing to do could not be shown them.

"The night before the nomination was made I had gone to my room entirely worn out. Sleep had been the last thing to think about. I was afraid if I went to sleep something might happen to my candidate's chances. It was about ten o'clock that night when a boy came to my room and asked if I would please go to the room of William Jennings Bryan. Of course I went, wearing only my bathrobe. When I went in I shall not forget the sight. Bryan standing with his profile facing me; and never turning. His hair was all in a frenzy. Suspenders down. Big trousers bagging at the knees and sagging from the belt. Loose, spreading carpet slippers. Brown Nebraska undershirt. You can imagine the picture as the army of stenographers and secretaries scurried to cover.

"Without turning his face toward me he drew his lips in a tight straight line and proceeded:

"McCombs, Wilson can never be nominated. Clark can never be nominated. Marshall surely can never be nominated. We must put forward a progressive Democrat for the presidency."

"Bryan," I answered him, "I could reach out my hand and touch the progressive Democrat you mention. You have sent for the last man in the convention you ought to have called. If this is all you have to say it is not even interesting. Good night." He made no response and I left him standing looking at the wall.

"I went straight to the room of Tom Taggart. I told him what had passed between Bryan and me. Then I simply said: 'How does Wilson look to you at this time as our man for president?' His answer was: 'McCombs, how does Tom Marshall look to you for vice-president?' 'Fine,' I assured him, 'as the running mate of Woodrow Wilson.' We agreed. The next day, Taggart having his forces entirely ready for action, Wilson was soon nominated.

"Then, as we had agreed, and as both of us like to keep our agreements, I walked through the aisles of the convention, visiting each delegation, and passing the word that Wilson wanted Tom Marshall for his running mate, having Wilson's word to that effect in advance, and the whole job was soon over. It was over and a good job, because Tom Taggart is the sort of general that knows how, and who does things in the proper way and at the proper time."

Added to this testimonial, here is a part that comes by repetition from neither of the principals, but is related by one of two others present. Mr. Taggart was at lunch in the Denison hotel at Indianapolis with two of the Indiana delegates to the Baltimore convention. They had just reached home. Thomas R. Marshall, who was still governor of Indiana, and had just been nominated for vice-president, crossed the dining room to shake hands with the party, saying as he did so: "I want you to know, Tom Taggart, that I know and fully appreciate that you nominated me for vice-president; that it was your work alone that placed me on the ticket; and I want to thank you most heartily."

Mr. Marshall also appreciated that his first entrance into politics as the party nominee for governor of Indiana was due to the efforts of Mr. Taggart. The effort had been to nominate Samuel M. Ralston in the state convention of 1908, and Mr. Taggart had believed it a good thing to give the several candidates some preliminary votes of a complimentary kind. In doing so the combinations were slipping and Mr. Ralston was prevailed upon to retire from the contest, Mr. Taggart taking the floor for Thomas R. Marshall and nominating him on the next ballot. Mr. Taggart was the power dominating and organizing the forces that made possible the election of Marshall that same year. It is violating no confidence to say that Governor Marshall fully expected the nomination for the presidency at Baltimore in 1912, when Mr. Taggart led his forces. He set his mind on the bigger job the day he became governor of Indiana. The effort to make him the presidential nominee resulted in his nomination for second place.

In the Democratic organization Thomas Taggart has served in all capacities, from precinct committeeman to national chairman. For a number of years he was a member of the Democratic national committee and he served as chairman from 1904 to 1908.

In 1916, upon the death of United States Senator Benjamin F. Shively, Governor Samuel M. Ralston named Thomas Taggart his successor. In a few months Senator Taggart attracted more favorable national attention than many senators, accounted great, have attracted to themselves in years of service. He did it by taking hold of the affairs of the government in the same manner he had been used to doing things in his own business. He opposed wasteful extravagance wherever and whenever he found it, and there was little of it that he did not see.

He opposed the use of appropriations intended as "fence building" schemes, no matter for what party or for what member. The fact that Democrats or Republicans opposed or supported a bill was not his reason for doing so. He looked upon it as business and took pride in doing things in business fashion. People who expected him to do politics in his public duties, where such a course would conflict with business principles, were mistaken. He was commended by the press of the whole country with no regard to politics. Even his bitterest political press opponents at home had to recognize, and did recognize, his good work and gave him commendation.

The bitterness with which certain partisan newspapers fought and abused Thomas Taggart was unabating for years, and was a tribute to his power and success as a great leader. On one occasion, in 1914, when Mr. Taggart protested, with some determination in his protest, to assaults by the Indianapolis News which he considered beyond all limits of legitimate journalistic license, that newspaper was constrained for the time being to desist and was good enough to give editorial expression to the editor's honest convictions, a leading editorial saying, among other kind things:

"In such a campaign as that in which we are now engaged people are in danger of losing their sense of proportion, and of comparative values. The personal element, for instance, is likely to be very considerably exaggerated. There are voters who favor a certain ticket simply because they like the men supporting it, or who oppose another ticket because they dislike its backers. There are few men in Indiana, to take one case, who have a greater asset in their personal qualities and characteristics than Mr. Taggart. He is widely popular, stands high in business relations, is of kindly disposition, and true to his friends in personal relationships. And all these are admirable qualities."

ARTHUR W. TAYLOR

Arthur W. Taylor, of Stillwell, is a prominent business man and faithful worker for the interests of the Democratic party.

Mr. Taylor is a true product of Laporte county, having been born in the locality of his present home, November 10, 1873. He attended the schools of his home district, and when he attained manhood's estate entered into the business life of Stillwell.

On January 6, 1896, Mr. Taylor was united in marriage to Miss Mollie M. Tobin.

In the fall of 1908 Mr. Taylor was elected county commissioner for a term of six years, assuming the duties of the position in a similar line of work, having served as township trustee of Pleasant township from January 1, 1905, to January 1, 1909.

Mr. Taylor has been prominently identified with the business growth and development of his home community and is the proprietor of a flourishing general store and grain business.

JOHN S. TAYLOR

John S. Taylor, a well-known attorney of Sullivan and an active worker in the party ranks, is known as a leader in the younger element of Sullivan county Democracy.

Mr. Taylor was born on a farm in Sullivan county on the 22d day of March, 1887. Here his boyhood was spent, and his schooling was received in the public schools of Sullivan. Following his graduation from the high school of this place he entered Indiana University for further study, and in the year 1910 received from that institution the degree of bachelor of arts. Returning the following year, he completed a course in the Law Department, graduating in 1911 with the degree of LL. B. In the same year he was admitted to the bar of Sullivan county and entered into the active practice of his profession, demonstrating from the first marked ability in the interpretation and application of the law and unremitting energy in research for the benefit of his clients.

In the year 1913 he was appointed to the position of deputy prosecuting attorney of the Sullivan circuit court, and, at the expiration of a year, was reappointed to the same office. In this work also he established a record for efficient and loyal service.

Politically, he has, since boyhood, been a strong advocate of Democratic principles and has rendered valued service to the local organization, serving in 1912 as secretary of the county central committee.

Religiously, Mr. Taylor is an active and consistent member of the Christian church. Fraternaly, he is a member of Alpha Tau Omega, the college fraternity, and is also allied with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Lodge 147, and with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, Lodge 911.

MICHAEL CHARLES THORNTON

It has often been said that the self-made man is the successful man, and the truth of this has few more fitting exemplifications than that furnished by the career of Michael Charles Thornton, of New Albany. Mr. Thornton is a native of Floyd county, and was born on the 21st day of September, 1871. He attended the parochial schools of New Albany; but at an early age was compelled to give up his studies for a time and enter the arduous struggle of life in a factory. His father died when he was but nine days of age and the duties of a bread-winner fell upon the shoulders of the son as soon as he was able to bear them. He learned the trade of glassblower, and his inherent ability as a leader was soon demonstrated, as he became prominent in labor circles at an early age. Later he entered a law office, for five years engaged in the study of the legal profession, and became actively interested in political life and political activities.

On the 31st day of December, 1895, his marriage to Miss Edith W. Tuley was solemnized, and their permanent home was established in New Albany. In the years 1906, 1908, 1910 and 1912 he was elected to the state legislature as representative, and while a member of that body was distinguished as an active and original worker. He was for a number of years a member of the cities and towns committee, and was known as the father of the street improvement law, the Lincoln's birthday law, and numerous other measures for the general good of the community at large. In the year 1906 he delivered the nominating speech which placed Senator Shively's name before the house as United States senator.

In the fall of 1914 Mr. Thornton was nominated for joint senator from Floyd and Harrison counties. He is at present engaged in the life insurance business and is affiliated with the B. P. O. Elks, Red Men and Knights of Columbus.

WILLIAM J. TEN BARGE

The present postmaster of the city of Poseyville is a member of an old-line Democratic family, one which at present contributes 6 votes to the party at each election. These are Mr. Ten Barge and five brothers. Their father was a Democrat before them.

William J. Ten Barge was born in Gibson county on the 15th day of January, 1882. He attended the schools of this county and graduated from the high school of Haubstadt in the year 1899.

On the 30th day of November, 1905, he was united in marriage to Miss Henrietta Dewig, and their home was established in Poseyville. Here they have since resided, drawing about them an ever-widening circle of friends.

Since attaining his majority he has been an active worker in the ranks of the Democracy of Indiana, and in the various campaigns through which he has passed has rendered valued service to the local organization. For six years he served as district committeeman, giving without stint of his time and energy for the furtherance of the cause.

On the first day of July, 1913, he was appointed postmaster of Poseyville, being the first Democratic postmaster appointed in this district under the Woodrow Wilson administration. In this position he has served with characteristic energy, devoting his entire time to the position and striving for the best in mail service.

He is an active member of the Knights of Columbus, Evansville Council, and the Catholic Knights of America; and is a heavy stockholder in the Conservative Life Insurance Company and the Columbian Life Insurance Company of Indiana.

B. W. TILFORD

B. W. Tilford, city clerk of Martinsville, is a true product of Morgan county, born within its confines on the 8th day of November, 1859. He attended the public schools of Martinsville and was graduated from the high school. Later he entered the Indiana Medical College at Indianapolis and was graduated from that institution in the year 1881. Immediately thereafter he entered upon the practice of medicine, but after a few years' practice he engaged in the drug business, and was for twenty years thus employed. At the expiration of this period he became superintendent of the Colonial Sanitarium, which position he still holds. From 1886 to 1888 he discharged the duties of city clerk, and in the fall of 1913 was again elected to this position. He is also keeper of records and seal for the local lodge of the Knights of Pythias at Martinsville.

In August, 1887, Mr. Tilford was united in marriage to Miss Laura J. Drake.

JUDGE JOSEPH NEWTON TILLET

The son of a Virginia Democrat who came to Indiana in 1834 and became a pioneer in Indiana Democracy, Judge Joseph Newton Tillett has also consistently adhered to the tenets of the party and has rendered valued service to the organization.

Judge Tillett was born in Miami county, Ind., November 25, 1865. His early schooling was received in the schools of Peru and following his graduation from the high school there in 1883 he entered Wabash College. In 1888, following his graduation from that institution, he began the study of law in the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. In 1890 this course was completed and he entered the practice of law at Peru. Two years later he was elected prosecutor and in 1894 was re-elected to that position. In 1902 he was elected judge of the circuit court of Miami county for a six-year term, and at the expiration of this period was re-elected.

On August 10, 1893, Judge Tillett was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Baldwin, of Washington, Indiana.

M. C. TOWNSEND

M. C. Townsend, of Hartford City, takes a place in the foremost ranks of educators, his efficient work being recognized by his election as the superintendent of schools of Blackford county in 1909, and by his re-election in 1913. His present term will extend until 1917. Mr. Townsend is also president of the Blackford County Chautauqua Association. He is also well known among educators as the author of the "Co-Operative School Register," which is used in a large per cent. of the schools of the Central States. He taught school eight years before his election as county superintendent of schools.

Mr. Townsend was born August 11, 1884, and is a native of Indiana. His education was obtained in the public schools of Blackford county and at the Marion Normal College, from which he graduated in 1907.

On December 25, 1910, he was married to Miss Nora Adele Harris, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. B. C. Harris, of Marion, Ind. They have two children—a boy, Maxwell, born January 10, 1913, and a girl, Lucile, born December 29, 1914. Since he was quite young, Mr. Townsend has taken an active interest in advancing the principles of the Democratic party, and has been an industrious worker in its behalf. In 1912 he was secretary of the Blackford county Democratic central committee, and in 1913 was chairman of the Hartford City campaign. He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and Elks lodges.

MORGAN J. TUCKER

The roster of prominent Democrats of Vermilion county would be incomplete were mention not made of Morgan J. Tucker, the present mayor of Clinton.

Mr. Tucker was born in Tipton county, Indiana, on the 10th day of April, 1849, and received his education in the public schools of his district. At the age of four years he was left fatherless, and the mother was left with ten children. Hence, at an early age young Morgan was compelled to shift for himself, and his first position was upon a farm, with the munificent salary of eight dollars per month, with board and washing. Thus launched upon a business career, however, his rise was rapid. At the age of eighteen he came to Terre Haute, taking employment with the firm of T. B. Johns, working in charge of a gang of men cutting timber on the banks of the Wabash river. At the expiration of seven years he located in Clinton, and this has since been his home and here his interests have centered. For thirty-two years he was in business for himself in this city, but finally retired to enjoy the fruits of his labors, living upon the income of his investments in farm lands and bank stocks.

On the first day of the year, 1912, he assumed the duties of mayor of Clinton, and in the fall of 1913 was re-elected for a term of four years by a majority of sixty-six in a Republican stronghold. During the past twenty-five years he has represented Clinton Democracy at the state conventions, and came within three votes of being elected to the Baltimore convention in 1912.

He was elected to the national convention at St. Louis in 1916, and was married to Miss Delia Day Jan. 26, 1916, of this city.

He is an active member of the K. of P. Lodge.

SAMUEL L. TRABUE

Samuel L. Trabue, Rushville, Indiana, son of Samuel H. and Mary McKee Trabue, was born in Rush county, June 29, 1878.

He was educated in the local schools, later attending Valparaiso College, receiving his LL.B. degree in 1900. He was admitted to practice in the Rush Circuit Court and in the Supreme and Appellate Courts of Indiana, and the United States Supreme and Circuit Courts in 1901.

He voluntarily enlisted and was inducted into the F. A. C. O. T. S. at Camp Zachary Taylor, being honorably discharged December 5, 1918.

He is an active member of the Scottish and York Rite Masonic bodies as well as the Shrine, Elks, Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias lodges and the Presbyterian church.

He has always taken an active interest in political affairs.

DR. THOMAS S. TURNER

Dr. Thomas S. Turner is an honored member of the medical fraternity of Boone county and an active citizen of Lebanon. He was born in Madison county, Indiana, on the 14th of May, 1863. He attended the common schools of Grant county and, after reading medicine with Dr. D. B. Snodgrass at Marion, attended the Indiana Eclectic Medical College, completing his medical course in the Eclectic College of Cincinnati. Before completing his medical course he entered the practice of medicine at Milledgeville, Boone county, and located there permanently in 1885. Meeting with success, he took a keen interest in politics, casting his first vote in 1884 for Cleveland and Hendricks. He was afterward elected trustee of Harrison township and served in that capacity for five years.

Dr. Turner located in Lebanon about eighteen years ago, and has been a resident of Lebanon ever since. He was elected on the Democratic ticket as councilman from the second ward, and served two years in that capacity. In September, 1913, he was appointed pension examining surgeon for Boone county. He is a member of the National Eclectic Medical Association, and of the Indiana Eclectic Medical Association, serving as president of the latter organization in 1912. He is a member of the Free and Accepted Masons, Knights of Pythias, and of the Central Christian church of Lebanon, Ind.

HARRY L. UNGER, LL. B.

Harry L. Unger, a prominent lawyer of Plymouth, Marshall county, Indiana, was born at Etna Green, Kosciusko county, Indiana, a son of Sylvanus S. and Frances M. Unger. His father was born in Columbiana county, Ohio, where he was married to Mary Stauffer. To this union there were born two children: Mary, who passed away at the age of twenty years, and J. Francis, who is now a railway conductor and resides in Pittsburgh. Their mother passed away when they were quite young, and the father came to Marshall county, Indiana, and engaged in the lumber business south of Bourbon. He married Frances M. Helsel, who was born at Johnstown, Pennsylvania, and settled near Bourbon with her parents when she was quite young. After their marriage, they took up their residence in Etna Green. To this union were born Harry L., the subject of this review, and Dottie, who is the wife of Jesse A. Zehner, proprietor of the Zehner Mills, Plymouth, Indiana.

When Harry L. Unger was five years of age, his parents moved with him to a farm east of Etna Green. The dwelling on this farm was made of logs and Mr. Unger is proud of the fact that his home during his childhood was a "log cabin." While living on this farm he entered school and in his class with him was only one pupil, Ernest Lutes, and, strange to say, this class of two produced a lawyer and a preacher.

When Mr. Unger reached the age of eight his parents moved with him to a farm about seven miles west of Plymouth, Marshall county, Indiana, near Donaldson, where he attended school until he graduated, and he then took up the teachers' course and a commercial course at the University of Valparaiso, Valparaiso, Ind. He taught school in Marshall and Kosciusko counties for six years.

While Mr. Unger was quite young his father was elected justice of the peace and lawsuits were held at his home. It was these lawsuits and the arguments of attorneys participating therein that created a desire in him to become a lawyer, and he looked forward to the time when he could take the part and assume the duties of a lawyer. Mr. Unger has always been a great student, a hard and industrious worker and a lover of good books. He is the owner of a splendid private library in his home and a splendid law library.

Upon leaving the farm he began the study of law in the office of Jacob O. Kantz at Nappanee, Ind., where, owing to the large office business of Mr. Kantz, he gained much practical knowledge and valuable experience. He entered the Indiana Law School of the University of Indianapolis, Indianapolis, Ind., and, after completing the course, graduated with the degree of bachelor of laws in 1904, and was admitted to practice in the supreme and appellate courts and the United States district court of the State of Indiana. He then formed a partnership with his former preceptor, Jacob O. Kantz, at Nappanee, was admitted to the Elkhart county bar and continued with Mr. Kantz until July, 1905, when he decided to cast his lot in the West. He started out in search of a suitable location; but after looking about for some time, decided to return to his old home county, and on October 24, 1905, opened his law office in the city of Plymouth, Marshall county, Ind.

He had all the experiences common to young lawyers, but his friends gave him their business and he succeeded. In 1906 the Democratic county central committee used his office for headquarters. The campaign was a busy one. He made friends and acquaintances all over the county, and at this election, in compliance with the unwritten law of the legal fraternity of Marshall county, that young attorneys must take the office of justice of the peace, he was elected to that office.

In 1908 he resigned his office of justice of the peace after being nominated prosecuting attorney for the 41st judicial circuit of the State of Indiana on the Democratic ticket, to which office he was elected, and re-elected in 1910. He filled this office two terms with credit to himself and honor to his party.

In public office as in his daily life and business affairs, he has always been a man whose honor and credibility was unquestioned and whose word is truth. He is numbered among Marshall county's leading lawyers and has a large and growing practice. He has always been very active in political affairs, a conscientious believer in the principles of Democracy. His ancestors came to America before the Revolution and he is a true, loyal and patriotic American citizen.

In the year 1903 Mr. Unger was united in marriage with Zora A. Rosenberger of Nappanee, Ind. They are the parents of one girl, Béatrice Marcelle, and three boys, Harry L., Jr.; Robert A. and Dale F.

Mr. Unger is a member of the Masonic lodge, order of Knights of Pythias and Court of Honor, a member of the Grand Lodge, Knights of Pythias, grand domain of Indiana, and at the present time deputy grand chancellor for the second district of the grand domain of Indiana, order of Knights of Pythias.

FRANK S. VAWTER

The name of Frank S. Vawter is familiar to the citizens of Tipton, being that of a leading druggist for a quarter of a century and the present postmaster of the city.

Mr. Vawter was born on the 2d day of April, 1879, four miles west of Tipton, in the same county. He attended the common and high schools of this city, graduating from the latter. Early in life he engaged in the drug business, and for twenty-five years continued in this work.

On the 1st day of December, 1896, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Lena B. Green, and their home, then established in this city, has been a center of hospitality.

Receiving the appointment to the position of postmaster of the city, in this capacity he has served with conscientious diligence and zeal.

Since attaining his majority he has been an active party worker, serving through numerous campaigns as precinct committeeman and delegate to county and district conventions.

Fraternally, he is allied with the orders of Masons, Elks and Odd Fellows; is also an active member of the Tipton Chamber of Commerce and the state and national associations of druggists.

FREDERICK VAN NUYS

Having once decided to go outside its own membership in selecting a state chairman, the Democratic state central committee in 1918 looked about for the liveliest wire available in Indiana for the job. The man selected must possess a peculiar combination of ginger, the sort of pep that meant keeping things stirred and boiling in every part of the party machinery from the bottom up, coupled with an ability for efficient organization that was built to win.

That was no easy task that the committee set to do. To find all these peculiar qualifications covered by one hat was the primary task. When located he would be a man of more than average success in his own business, and so he had to have one other peculiarly fitting ingredient in his make-up. He must be so thoroughly enthusiastic in his grounded belief in the principles on which the Democratic party is built that he would be willing to sacrifice personal interests for the time being and devote his time, thought and energies getting the fighting forces together for victory.

That was a whole lot to find and a whole lot to expect. But he was found and he was willing when unanimous decision went to Frederick Van Nuys. He brought all that was originally required in the specifications, and more, to the big job. For he was also one of the best public speakers in Indiana. He knew why he is a Democrat, and when he was through telling it to his audience the members of that audience usually knew why they ought to be good Democrats if they were not.

He always had a message worth while and he always delivered it with peculiar force. His capacity for personal work was limited only by the number of hours in the day, and he possessed that peculiar characteristic of being able to impart his enthusiasm to the other fellow.

One result early developed was that the Republicans had thrown all their carefully mapped-out and published campaign plans into the scrap heap thirty days after Chairman Van Nuys started, and they had to adopt an entirely new method of procedure to meet the Democratic offensive. For, as chairman, Van Nuys was on the offensive from the moment the engine started. His policy at the bottom of the whole business was: "Always make the Democratic party deserve to win and leave the people to finish the job."

Mr. Van Nuys had been previously induced to become the secretary of the Democratic state central committee, working with Chairman Charles A. Greathouse, this position not anticipating or requiring the same continuous and strenuous performance demanded of the chairman. Chairman Greathouse had then been called upon by President Woodrow Wilson to undertake one of the most important war duties, that of managing the federal vocational educational department which should equip the wounded and maimed members of the American fighting forces, during and after the terrible world war, for positions in the industrial and commercial world where their injuries would be the least possible impediment to success. So Charles A. Greathouse retired from politics to enter war work.

Previous to assuming the chairmanship of the Democratic state central committee, the understanding being that he might retire at the end of the 1918 campaign to devote all his energies to war activities, Mr. Van Nuys had acquired a State acquaintance and reputation as a lawyer and party leader. He had an extensive law business at Anderson, Ind., where he had resided and practiced his profession for a number of years. He had served four years as prosecutor for Madison county, and in 1912 he was sent to the state senate from the same county, serving through the sessions of 1913 and 1915, in the last session being the unanimous choice of the Democratic majority for president pro tem. of the senate and majority floor leader.

In both these sessions Senator Van Nuys was conspicuous as a leader, always standing for or against any proposed legislation as he measured it for the general good. It must be a measure that "deserved to win" if it received his support, just as he made it known as state chairman that the Democratic party "must deserve to win."

At the conclusion of his service as state senator Mr. Van Nuys removed to Indianapolis, where his legal practice continued to grow, he being recognized as one of the leaders among successful and able lawyers of the State.

During the term of his service as state chairman Mr. Van Nuys was one of the most active men in the State in all war work. He added to his political exertions the additional task of making speeches all over the State, and wherever and whenever called upon to do so, in war loan drives of all sorts, forgetting politics in his appeals to patriotism, whether connected with the raising of war loans or contributions or otherwise. No man in the State made a greater number of such speeches or spoke to larger audiences, for his oratorical abilities resulted in unusual demands.

Mr. Van Nuys graduated from Earlham College, at Richmond, Ind., and from the Indiana Law School at Indianapolis, beginning the practice of law in 1900.

Without being exact in recording the date of this writing—July, 1918—it would not be safe to assume that this information would remain historically accurate, "Mr. Van Nuys is a bachelor."

H. KARL VOLLAND

H. Karl Volland, the popular mayor of Columbus, Ind., was born in the city over which he now presides as chief executive on the 20th day of May, 1875.

He is the son of Frederick and Mary Volland, two of Columbus' most highly respected German citizens. In public and private schools of the city of Columbus H. Karl Volland obtained his education and was graduated with honors on the completion of the high school course in the spring of 1896. He was employed as a clerk in his father's hardware store, now one of the oldest in the State, from that time—1896—until the 1st day of September, 1902, when he entered upon the duties of city clerk of Columbus, having been elected to that office on the Democratic ticket in the month of May of that year, all of the other city officers elected being Republicans. The Democratic candidate for mayor that year was defeated by 80 votes and Mr. Volland was elected by 142, which shows that he ran 222 votes ahead of his ticket. This is certainly a splendid compliment to his personal worth and the high regard in which he is held by his fellow citizens.

In 1905 he was unanimously elected by the common council for a term of three years as a member of the board of education of Columbus, serving with distinction and in turn as secretary, treasurer and president of said board. He was the first alumnus to hold membership on the board of education. He is the life president of the High School Alumni Association as well as of the class in which he graduated in 1896.

It is conceded that he has done more to stimulate interest in the educational advantages offered by his alma mater than any graduate who ever left its portals.

In 1896, while attending school and before reaching his majority, he was elected a Democratic committeeman and helped carry his precinct and ward for the Democratic candidate for alderman by a large majority. In 1898 he was elected secretary of the Democratic city central committee. In 1906 he was elected to the position of bookkeeper of the People's Savings and Trust Company of Columbus by the directors of said institution, holding that position with credit and honor until June, 1907, when he was obliged to resign on account of ill health. Having recovered his health sufficiently, Mr. Volland returned to the hardware business in 1908 and was connected with it until the spring of 1913, when he announced himself a candidate for the Democratic nomination for mayor of his native city.

In the nominating primary which followed in May of that year he was opposed by two other candidates, but he was easily nominated, receiving twice as many votes as his opponents combined. In the election that followed in November he was elected to the office of mayor by one of the largest votes ever given a candidate for that office. With four opponents of as many different parties, he received a handsome majority over all, carrying every candidate on the ticket into office with him.

Mr. Volland is one of the youngest mayors Columbus has ever had. The policy of his administration is business, economy and law enforcement, and he is fulfilling every campaign pledge so made. His administration of the city's affairs is giving universal satisfaction and is receiving the endorsement of all good citizens.

He helped organize the first Indiana mayors' association and is a member of its executive committee. At the annual meeting of the Indiana Municipal League, held July 6, 7 and 8, 1915, he was unanimously elected as president. He is the local treasurer of the Evangelical Lutheran St. Peter's Church, with which church he has been affiliated since his birth. He is a member of the Commercial Club and the Retail Merchants' Association and many other clubs and organizations of his city, and he always displays a deep interest and is active in all matters pertaining to the progress and welfare of his native city. In 1910 he was married to Miss Lillian Marie Rost, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herman L. Rost, of the same city. One child has been born of this union, a son, who has been named H. Karl Volland, Jr.

Mr. Volland has always endorsed the principles of the Democratic party and has labored earnestly and faithfully for its welfare and for the adoption of its platform. He was one of the original Woodrow Wilson-for-President admirers and Democrats in Indiana.

He has a bright future before him. He comes of a family closely connected with the aristocracy of Germany. Mr. Volland is a true American patriot, a great admirer of his country's flag and all that that emblem represents and stands for.

Should he decide to devote much of his time to political labors he will undoubtedly win further successes and distinction, because, added to his keen insight and capability as a political manager, are a stalwart devotion to the general good and unquestioned loyalty to the right.

WILLIAM H. VOLLMER

Few men who have ever lived anywhere have been possessed of so many excellent qualities that accumulated and perpetuated warm friendships such as those enjoyed by William H. Vollmer of Vincennes.

Starting as a farm hand on the "thin lands" of Knox county, with nothing to depend upon but his meager wage, with few educational advantages outside of the "school of hard knocks," he rose to a position of wealth and influence and leadership in the community.

His friends were in number corresponding with his acquaintances. There was a sincerity and genuineness in all he did, a cordiality unassumed in all his intercourse, a business and personal integrity and stability from which he never swerved, and with it all a generosity and the heart of a big man of human sympathy and charity for all men that drew others to him.

While his business interests were concentrated largely at Vincennes, thus holding him pretty closely to his home city, he had a large acquaintance and was deservedly popular all over the State. He was a consistent and constant Democrat in politics always, but not of the narrow sort who would view with suspicion or distrust the men of the opposition. He respected the honest opinions of others in politics as in all other things, just as honest men of opposing views respected his.

It was at the end of the second year of the administration of Governor Thomas R. Marshall that William H. Vollmer was elected treasurer of state. The same year William H. O'Brien was elected auditor of state. Two abler and more conscientious men could not have been found in the State of Indiana to undertake the difficult task of straightening out a deplorable condition of state finances. They were also lifelong and congenial friends.

The retiring Republican administration had accumulated a debt of three millions of dollars, had allowed all the state institutions to become dilapidated, both as related to buildings and equipment. The state institutional and educational accounts were all overdrawn, all the state revenues had been anticipated and disbursed a year in advance, and there was not $10,000 cash in the treasury.

William H. Vollmer and William H. O'Brien put their joint ability to the task. In the six years following their induction into office the State made greater strides than in any period in its hundred years of history. State institutions were rebuilt and properly equipped and the State's unfortunates were cared for as they should be, and as they had not been for years before. New institutions were built, equipped, paid for and occupied. The Republican debt of three millions was entirely wiped out.

With the co-operation of Charles A. Greathouse, who was state superintendent of public instruction, the three worked together to a development of a system of schools and educational advancement in Indiana which has no equal in any other State in the Union, and it was all paid for and a surplus of appropriations remained in the treasury.

It is a monument to the memory of William H. Vollmer and his service to the people as state treasurer that at the end of the six years mentioned these institutions were turned over in first-class shape, in better condition than they had ever been, with better buildings and better equipment than ever before, all on a financial basis that would perpetually sustain them, if not disturbed; that, with not a penny of debt, the James P. Goodrich administration came into office with five millions of accumulated cash balance on hand. The master financial ability of William H. Vollmer and William H. O'Brien had done this much for the people of Indiana.

William H. Vollmer was born near Freelandsville, Knox county, Indiana, on the 24th day of October, 1856. He was the son of Frederick and Hannah (Baker) Vollmer. After leaving school in 1872, having in the meantime worked as a farm hand, he entered the grocery business as a clerk. In 1888 he embarked in the firm of Vollmer & Recker. In 1896 he was elected county treasurer of Knox county and re-elected in 1898. He formed a co-partnership with C. C. Winkler in the commission business and at the time of his death they conducted the largest melon commission firm in the country. To their credit is largely due the development of the melon industry in Knox county. This firm handled the crop of several counties.

Mr. Vollmer was married May 3, 1882, to Miss Julia Ritterskamp. One son was born to them December 25, 1895, dying at the age of six years.

Mr. Vollmer was interested in many forms of business. He was vice-president and director of the Aetna Trust Company of Indianapolis, was a director of the American Oil and Gas Company of Oklahoma, was president and director of the Citizens' Trust Company of Vincennes, a large stockholder in the German National Bank of Vincennes, director of the Vincennes Y. M. C. A., trustee of the Vincennes University, president of the Blackford Window Glass Company, director of the Vincennes Furniture Manufacturing Company, director and one of the organizers of the Reel-Osterhage Lumber Company and of the Brock-Willis Monument Company, president and director of the Southside Elevator Company, a former member of the Vincennes School Board, serving a term as its president; a former director and president of the Vincennes Board of Trade and a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and held stock in numerous other corporations. He held large farming interests in Knox county also.

Mr. Vollmer was a lifelong member of the German Evangelical Church, a member of the Elks, of the Pastime Club, Rotary and Harmonie Verein clubs. He was elected to Masonry, but died before he was able to take his initiation.

In politics Mr. Vollmer was always an active Democrat. He served as county chairman for three campaigns. After his service as county treasurer he was called upon by his friends to enter the race for state treasurer. He did this and was elected in 1910 and re-elected in 1912.

After the death of Dr. Archer, the chairman of the Second congressional district, Mr. Vollmer was elected district chairman by the Democratic central committee. He was a thorough organizer and a most efficient chairman. His persistency to details made his campaigns victorious.

Mr. Vollmer died at the Good Samaritan Hospital in the city of Vincennes, Ind., on January 6, 1917, following an operation. He was sixty years of age at the time of his death.

HON. S. E. VORIS

S. E. Voris was born in the city of Dayton, Ohio, in 1854. His schooling was received in the common schools of Butler county, Ohio, and here the early years of his business career were spent.

In 1887 he removed to Indiana, locating in Crawfordsville, where he engaged in the insurance business. With characteristic zeal, energy, and indomitable perseverance he entered into the business life of the place, and took an active interest in political and municipal affairs.

In 1893 he was appointed postmaster of the city of Crawfordsville, serving in this capacity until 1897. In 1904 he was elected to the high position of mayor, and for six years his best efforts were given to the work, carrying on a progressive and very efficient city government. Mr. Voris was the first Democrat to be elected to this high office. In 1910, and again in 1912, he was elected to represent Montgomery county in the state legislature, and served in the sessions of 1911 and 1913. Here he took an active part, serving with credit to himself and constituency, and one of the crowning achievements of his labor was the introduction and passage of the bill which made the penal farm a reality.

Fraternally, he is allied with the Knights of Pythias, Elks, is a 32nd degree Mason, Knight Templar, member of the Mystic Shrine, and supreme treasurer of the Tribe of Ben Hur.

HON. FRANCIS J. VURPILLAT

Descended from a line of Democratic ancestors, and the son of a leader in party affairs, Hon. Francis J. Vurpillat has continued the work and has rendered valuable service to the party.

He was born on the 26th day of August, 1871, and received his schooling in the public schools of Winamac. Later he attended Notre Dame University, graduating in 1891 with the degree of bachelor of laws; and the following year returning to receive the degree of bachelor of letters.

On the 5th day of June, 1894, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Iva Bunnell of Frankfort, Indiana, and the home then established by them in Winamac has been a center of hospitality and culture.

In the year 1896 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the 44th judicial circuit, and was twice re-elected, devoting six years to this work. Later he was appointed county attorney for Pulaski county, and was also city attorney of Winamac for one term.

In the fall of 1908 he was elected to the bench of the 44th judicial circuit, including Starke and Pulaski counties, and his decisions as judge have been rendered with justice and impartiality. He is a son of Joseph D. Vurpillat, ex-county treasurer and a pioneer in the Democracy of the state.

Judge Vurpillat is now a resident of South Bend, Indiana, having accepted a permanent position as judge of the court and lecturer in the law department of Notre Dame University.

JAMES S. WALES

James S. Wales, the present mayor of Alexandria, has, for many years, been prominently identified with business and municipal affairs of this locality. He was born in Kosciusko county, Indiana, but during his boyhood accompanied his parents to Union county, where his schooling was received. In 1893 they located in Madison county, and here his interests have centered. In 1894 he was elected city treasurer, and in this capacity served until 1910, at which time he was appointed deputy county treasurer. In 1914 he was elected mayor of the city for a term of four years. He has been actively interested in the business life of the place, serving for a number of years as assistant cashier of the Alexandria Bank and conducting a thriving real estate and insurance business. He has served the party many times as precinct committeeman and as delegate to the various conventions.

Fraternally, he is allied with the Orders of Masons, Odd Fellows, Elks and Knights of Pythias and has held official position in all.

JOHN J. WALSH

For many years a leader in labor circles of the state, and at present a member of the state bureau of inspection, the gentleman whose name appears at the head of this article is a well-known figure in the city of Indianapolis.

John J. Walsh was born at Vincennes, Indiana, on the 27th day of April, 1874. He was educated in the parochial schools of that city and graduated therefrom in the year 1888.

On the 6th day of June, 1900, he was united in marriage to Miss Daisy A. Davis, and she has since been the presiding genius of his home.

Early in life he became interested in mechanics, and so rapidly did he advance in the knowledge of machinery that he soon became known as an expert and was the holder of several important positions in the mechanical departments of railroads entering this state. He also took a vital interest in problems affecting the laboring men of the state, and their confidence in him and his judgment was soon evidenced by his election to important positions in their organizations.

During the 1911 session of the legislature he served as chief doorkeeper of the house of representatives; and on the first day of July of that year he was appointed head of the department of buildings, factories and workshops of the state bureau of inspection, his term of office to continue for a period of four years.

Mr. Walsh is an active member of the order of Knights of Columbus and of the International Association of Machinists. He has, throughout his career, been an enthusiastic worker in the interests of the Democratic party and has rendered valuable service to the various local organizations of the community.

ESTAL E. WALKER

The name of Estal E. Walker of North Vernon is a familiar one to the citizens of both Jennings and Brown counties, for he has held positions of trust in both counties. He was born in Brown county January 5, 1879, attended the common schools of his native county and continued his studies at Lexington, Ky. He married Miss Kathryn Rubottom of Columbus, Ind.

During his residence in Nashville, Brown county, Mr. Walker held the position of city clerk for a term of four years and for two years also discharged the duties of deputy treasurer and deputy auditor of that county. Later he made his home in North Vernon, and there also he held the position of city clerk for a term of four years. He has for a number of years been engaged in the hardware business in that city.

WILLIAM WALKINSHAW, M. D.

Dr. William Walkinshaw, though a native of Canada, has for many years been a distinguished resident of the town of Stillwell, Laporte county, and his interests in and labors for the advancement of the community in which he resides are worthy of note.

Dr. Walkinshaw received his education in the schools of his native Canada. After completing his studies in the regular school grades he entered Queen's University, where he pursued his studies in medical science and was graduated.

On January 18, 1893, Dr. Walkinshaw was united in marriage to Miss Anna Maude Copley, and together they came to Indiana and established their home, he entering into the active practice of his profession, in which he has been successful.

On January 1, 1913, Dr. Walkinshaw assumed the duties of coroner of Laporte county and in that capacity served until the beginning of the year 1915, since which time he has devoted his time and energies to his large and growing practice.

JAMES B. WALLACE

James B. Wallace of Newcastle is a native of the State of Ohio, but he received his schooling in the schools of Union City, Ind. He was born on July 25, 1872, and in 1901 became a permanent resident of Henry county. Mr. Wallace has been twice married, his present wife, to whom he was married in the year 1913, having been Miss Margaret New, a resident of Hancock county.

On December 22, 1909, Mr. Wallace assumed the duties of treasurer of the city of Newcastle, and so efficiently did he administer the affairs of this office that at the expiration of his term of service he was elected to discharge the still greater responsibilities of treasurer of the county. The fact is worthy of note also that he is the first Democratic treasurer ever elected in the city or county. Mr. Wallace has been an active Democrat and has further served his party as a delegate to the state convention. He is also widely known as a successful dealer in general merchandise.

AARON M. WALTZ

Aaron M. Waltz of Hartford City was born at Hagerstown, Indiana, May 6, 1864. Following a public school education, he attended Valparaiso Normal College in 1882-83. He read law, was elected a justice of the peace and was appointed prosecuting attorney by the Republicans. Coming to Blackford county in 1890 he became Democratic county chairman in 1891. Was roll clerk in the Indiana state senate in 1893, and was again county chairman in 1896 and in 1898. He was elected prosecuting attorney the same year and re-elected in 1898. He was a delegate to the national convention in 1900 and contingent elector in 1912. He was county attorney in 1912-13 and re-appointed for 1914-15. Since 1891 Mr. Waltz has been connected with the Democratic county committee as chairman or as a member of the executive committee. He has been frequently a delegate to the Democratic state convention, and has served on the committee on rules and organization, and the committee on credentials. He is an active member and past exalted ruler of the Elks and is a member of the I. O. O. F. and the Modern Woodmen.

FRANK E. WATSON

The present postmaster of the city of Corydon, appointed by President Wilson April 21, 1914, for a term of four years, is a man eminently fitted to assume the responsibilities of this position, being a man of broad experience and thoroughly conversant with the community and its needs.

Mr. Frank E. Watson was born in Indiana on the 11th day of July, 1877, and attended the public schools of his district, later taking a course of study at the Central Normal College of Danville, from which he graduated.

On the 19th day of November, 1903, his marriage to Miss Henrietta Marshall was solemnized, and their home has since extended its hospitality to a host of friends. In the same year, also, he was appointed county auditor, serving under this appointment for a term of nine months, at the expiration of which he was elected to this position for a term of four years, being at that time the youngest auditor elected in the State. Later he became interested in the First National Bank of Corydon, and is now a director in this institution. His energies at present, however, are centered in the administration of the affairs of the postal service, in which he finds deep interest.

Mr. Watson is a lifelong adherent to Democratic principles, and has devoted his time and services for the furtherance of the influence of this party, attending the various state conventions as delegate for many years. He was appointed by Governor Ralston as delegate to the good roads convention at St. Louis in April, 1914.

Fraternally, he is allied with the order of Knights of Pythias and the Modern Woodmen of America, among the membership of which he has a wide acquaintance.

LOUIS LATOUR WATSON

Louis Latour Watson, an early pioneer of the state of Indiana and a loyal worker in the ranks of the party for three-quarters of a century, still lives in the memory and in the hearts of many citizens of Vincennes.

He was born in Vincennes, then but a trading post, on the 13th day of April, 1809. Here his boyhood and youth were spent, sharing the hardships and joys of the early settler, knowing nothing of our present school system, but managing to acquire an education sufficient to enable him to compete with the more fortunate younger generation.

On the 6th day of November, 1832, he was united in marriage to Miss Lydia E. Fellows, and their home was established in Vincennes. Here their lives were spent, loyal to the home of their birth and rejoicing in its growth and progress until death called them.

After the coming of the railroad he entered the employ of the Evansville and Crawfordsville road, serving as station agent and contractor, and was later purchasing agent for the Ohio and Mississippi railroad. During the administration of President Taylor, 1849 to 1853, he held the position of postmaster of Vincennes, and was later elected county assessor and city councilman, in both of which capacities he served the commonwealth efficiently and loyally.

Always a devoted worker in the ranks of the Democratic party, he rendered valued service to the local and state organizations, and his memory is revered by a host of younger workers.

On the 4th day of May, 1902, death called him from his home at Vincennes; but the record of his work and his sterling qualities will long continue in the community where his life was spent.

He was born and died at Vincennes, and at his death was the oldest native.

S. HORACE WEBER

S. Horace Weber was born on the 13th day of April, 1889, at Oakville, Delaware county. He attended the public schools of Muncie and was graduated from the high school with the class of 1906. A course of work was then taken at Indiana University, followed by teaching school in Delaware county for seven years, five of which were as principal. He then located in Muncie and engaged in his chosen work, surveying. In 1912 he was elected surveyor of Delaware county, the first Democratic surveyor ever elected there, and, though but twenty-four years of age, his work in this department was so efficiently administered that he was re-elected at the close of a two-year term.

On December 10, 1914, Mr. Weber was united in marriage to Miss Helen C. Stephens. Mr. Weber is a member of the Elks lodge at Muncie and is a 32d degree Mason.

SAMUEL B. WELLS

A leader in the Democratic organization of Scott county, for many years a prominent attorney of Scottsburg, and a journalist of wide influence, Samuel B. Wells needs no introduction to the citizens of Scott county and vicinity.

He was born in Jefferson county, Indiana, on the 28th day of September, 1860. He attended the public schools of his district, and after his graduation, in the year 1885, entered De Pauw University at Greencastle for the purpose of taking a course in law. Graduating from this institution with the class of 1887, he was in the same year admitted to the bar in Jefferson county, and in 1889 removed to Scott county and entered into the active practice of his profession.

In the year 1887 was solemnized his marriage to Miss Rachel P. Marshall of Olney, Ill., and their home was established in Madison until they removed to Scottsburg. Here their friendships have been made and their interests centered.

During the period from 1900 to 1904 he held the position of prosecuting attorney of the sixth judicial district, and discharged the duties involved with much credit. In the fall of 1910 he was elected representative from Scott and Jennings counties to the state legislature, and in the assembly of 1911 was an active participant.

Mr. Wells is widely known, also, as the editor of the Scott County Journal, a paper whose principles are proverbially sound and progressive.

CHARLES W. WENINGER

The present auditor of Starke county, Charles W. Weninger, has been for many years closely identified with the business life of North Judson and is a recognized leader in all movements for the betterment of the community in which he resides.

He is a native Hoosier, born on the 23rd day of May, 1873, and educated in the schools of North Judson. At the age of twenty years he was appointed deputy postmaster of North Judson, and in this capacity served for a term of four years. He also held the position of town clerk for two terms and was a member of the North Judson school board for a term of two years. In the year 1900 he served in the capacity of township trustee, and in the fall of 1912 was elected to the position which he now holds, that of county auditor.

Aside from his labors in the public service, he has taken a very active part in the business life of the place, and is now president of the First State Bank of North Judson, president of the Perpetual Building and Loan Association, and an active real estate and insurance man.

On the 29th day of September, 1897, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Maude Collier, and she has since been the presiding genius of his home, dispensing its hospitality to their many friends and creating the true home atmosphere.

RICHARD A. WERNEKE

The name of Richard A. Werneke is known throughout the State as one of the most active and efficient workers in the ranks of the party.

He is a native of the Hoosier State, born on the 1st day of May, 1883, and his schooling was received in the public and parochial schools of Terre Haute.

On the 10th day of September, 1910, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Nina C. Wynn, and she has since presided over their home with rare grace, dispensing hospitality to a host of friends.

At the early age of twenty years he served the party in the capacity of precinct and county committeeman, and again in 1905 was connected with the local organization. In the year 1912 he was elected to the important position of prosecuting attorney of Terre Haute, and the year following he assumed the duties of chairman of the city central committee. During his incumbency of this position, for the first time in the history of Vigo county, every candidate on the Democratic ticket was elected. Although one of the youngest public officials ever elected to office in the county, his abilities as prosecuting attorney were so marked that he was re-elected in 1914.

Throughout his career, since he attained his majority, Mr. Werneke has borne a prominent part in every Democratic movement in the county, and has served the party as delegate to all conventions, being recognized as one of the strongest leaders in the organization.

JESSE F. WEISMAN

Jesse F. Weisman, a leading attorney of the city of Linton, has for a number of years been well known to the citizens of Greene county. He is a native of the Hoosier State, his birth having occurred near the city of Anderson on the 15th day of May, 1881. He attended the public schools and was graduated from the high school at Oxford, Ohio, later attending Miami University, and completing his legal education at the Cincinnati Law School, followed by his admission to the bar of Greene county and his entrance upon the active practice of his profession.

On the 22d day of December, 1906, his marriage to Miss Bertha A. Riddle was solemnized, and she has since presided over his home and dispensed its hospitality.

In 1906 he assumed the duties of city attorney of Linton, which position he held for eight years, retiring in 1914. In the fall of 1912 he was elected representative from Greene county to the general assembly of the state and in the legislature of 1913 he was an active member, always guarding the interests of the people in legislative matters.

Since boyhood he has been actively engaged in the service of the Democratic party, working with the local organizations and at all times seeking to promulgate the principles of true Democracy.

FERNANDO WOOD WESNER

Fernando Wood Wesner, whose photo appears herewith, is a native of Washington county, as were also his parents, and is of German-Irish descent. For many years he has been closely identified with the political life of Jackson county and esteemed as one of her worthy, progressive citizens.

Mr. Wesner was born and reared on a farm, attending the country schools until the age of 17, when he became a teacher. For several winters he followed this profession with great success. He is a graduate of Eikso Academy, Salem, Indiana, class of 1892, in the scientific course. For a time he attended the Normal College at Mitchell, Indiana, taking a teachers' course, and did two years' work in the law and literary departments of Indiana University, in a special course. He has been in the active practice of law at Seymour, Ind., since February, 1899. During his residence in Seymour he has held the offices of city commissioner, city judge, and deputy prosecuting attorney for Jackson county.

On the 17th day of June, 1903, he was married to Miss Lura Maude Hamer, a native of Seymour, and the most estimable and intelligent young woman. To this union a daughter and son have been born.

Mr. Wesner is a sterling Democrat and stands high in his party councils.

JOHN WESSEL, JR.

John Wessel is well known to the leaders of Democracy in Allen county and Indiana as one of the most active among the younger workers in the party. He has also, by his progressive policies and aggressive methods, won for himself an enviable position in the business life of the community. He was born on the 19th day of November, 1882, and after graduating from the common and high schools, attended St. Joseph's College at Rensselaer, Indiana, graduating with the class of 1902.

Later, after having taken up his business life, he showed a deep interest in political matters; and was appointed reading clerk of the house of representatives of the 66th and 67th general assemblies of the state of Indiana. During the campaign of 1912 he was appointed secretary of the Allen county central committee, working zealously and loyally for the success of Woodrow Wilson and the other candidates on the Democratic ticket.

As a business man he has been remarkably successful, showing throughout his career unusual ability in organization and management, and, though still a young man, holds the responsible position of secretary and manager of the Ft. Wayne Municipal Electric Light and Power Works.

HENRY E. WHITE

The career of Henry E. White has been a varied one, and his versatility has been demonstrated in a marked degree by his successful endeavors in various lines.

He was born in Pulaski county, Indiana, on the 18th day of December, 1866, and his schooling was received in the public schools of Starke county. Later, however, a course of study in the higher branches and in law was taken at Valparaiso University. For a period of five years he taught in the public schools of Starke county, and for one year was the proprietor of a store. Later he engaged in the lumber business in North Judson, Indiana, and for six years his energies were devoted to this work. He was one of the organizers and the first cashier of the Fountain Square State Bank of Indianapolis, and for one year was cashier of the Bank of Starke County, of Hamlet. He has been actively interested in the municipal affairs of North Judson, and was for two terms a member of the school board of that place. In the year 1898 he was elected clerk of the Starke circuit court and at the expiration of his first term of four years was re-elected to this position. For six months, also, he served as deputy in the circuit court of Kosciusko county.

Mrs. White, to whom he was married August 3, 1893, was formerly Miss Estelle E. Collins of Wayne township. They have three sons: Rex Seymour, Victor Ehdy and Maxwell Richard.

RICHARD WHITE

Since attaining the age of twenty-one years Richard White has been closely allied with the workings of the Democratic party in Dearborn county and has served as precinct committeeman in every campaign since the year 1895, as well as attending every state and district convention and finally being present at the Baltimore convention which nominated Woodrow Wilson for President in 1912.

He is a product of Dearborn county, born in the city of Aurora on the 15th day of December, 1876. In his childhood he moved, with his parents, to the town of Cochran, and here he was educated in the public and parochial schools of his district. Here also he held his first position in the service of the public, being elected clerk of Cochran for two terms. Later he served as deputy assessor, and in the year 1906 was elected sheriff of Dearborn county, which position he filled with great satisfaction to the people, and much credit to himself. The ensuing three years were spent in the city of Washington, D. C., having received the appointment of assistant sergeant-at-arms under Stokes Jackson for the 62nd and 63rd Congressional Assemblies. At present he holds the position of pure food inspector.

Mr. White enjoys an exceedingly wide acquaintance and numbers among his friends many of the most prominent statesmen of our state and country.

WILLIAM O. WILSON

To the citizens of Posey county the name of William O. Wilson is a familiar one and one held in high esteem, this gentleman having served the commonwealth in various positions of responsibility and trust.

Mr. Wilson is a native Hoosier, born on the 22nd day of September, 1878, and educated in the public schools of his district. Following his graduation from the high school of Mt. Vernon he entered the Indiana State Normal School at Terre Haute, and after receiving a year's work in this institution entered Indiana University for further study. Following his graduation here after having completed a three years' course of work, he entered the educational field, and for a number of years taught in the schools of Posey county with marked success. On the 24th day of August, 1905, he was elected county superintendent of schools and in this capacity served until February 16, 1914. During this period his work was characterized by marked intelligence and zeal for the advancement of the school system and the progress of the children of the community, and the high plane of scholarship which was set before the youthful mind as a standard did much to place the schools of the community upon their present foundation.

In the year 1914 he was appointed to the position of postmaster of Mt. Vernon, and in this capacity has continued to render efficient and intelligent service.

On the 29th day of June, 1910, was solemnized his marriage to Miss Harriet Brinkman, and their home, then established in Mt. Vernon, has extended hospitality to a host of interesting friends.

During his years in college he became affiliated with the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity; is now affiliated with the Free and Accepted Masons, Royal Arch Masons and B. P. O. Elks, all of Mt. Vernon.

HENRY WIMBERG

Closely identified with political and business affairs of the city of Evansville for many years, the name of Henry Wimberg ranks high in the roster of prominent Democratic workers in Vanderburg county.

Mr. Wimberg is a native of Germany, born in the city of Oldenburg on the 30th day of December, 1851. Here his boyhood was spent and his schooling received. In 1875 he was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Emge, and she has proven a devoted companion and helpmate.

Mr. Wimberg's residence in Evansville has been fraught with various activities in the service of the commonwealth.

He was elected to membership in the city council and for six years took an active part in the deliberations of that body. He has also served on the police and fire board for a period of three years, and has been actively interested in the various movements which have arisen from time to time for the general progress and development of the community.

Mr. Wimberg is also widely known as president of the Evansville Brewing Association and as president of the Vendome Hotel Company. He is regarded as one of the progressive business men of Evansville.

HUGO WINTERHOFF

The Fatherland has sent to our shores in the years that have passed many citizens who have risen to prominence in our own country through their interest in business and civic affairs; and this is clearly exemplified in the case of Hugo Winterhoff. This gentleman was born in Germany on the fifth day of June, 1864, and in his childhood he attended the schools of his native state. In the year 1881, however, when a lad of sixteen, he came to this country with his parents, settling in the city of Elkhart, Indiana, and here his schooling was continued. On the 14th day of September, 1894, he was united in marriage to Miss Clara L. Haslanger, whose home was in South Bend, Indiana; but on the 7th of March, 1913, death deprived him of the companionship of his helpmate.

In the fall of 1911 he was elected on the Democratic ticket to the important position of county recorder, assuming the duties of his position on the first day of the following January, his term of office expiring on the 31st of December, 1915.

In the years since he attained his majority Mr. Winterhoff has performed much valued service in the ranks of the Democratic party, and is deserving of the high esteem in which he is held by his constituents and the community at large.

FRANK H. WOLFE

Any reference to the active workers in the ranks of Shelby county Democracy should include mention of the name of Frank H. Wolfe.

Mr. Wolfe was born in Decatur county, Indiana, May 22, 1881. He attended the schools of his home district and at the age of twenty-four years he located in Shelby county, where his permanent home was established after his marriage to Miss Ives Pyle.

During the Spanish-American war Mr. Wolfe served as a sergeant-major. Later he began the study of law and was admitted to the bar of Shelby county. During the campaign of 1914 he was an active participant in the work of the Democratic organization and was the party's nominee for prosecuting attorney.

ALPHONSO C. WOOD

Alphonso C. Wood was born on the 23rd day of January, 1874, in Steuben county, Indiana.

He attended the public schools of his county and later continued his studies at the Tri-State College of Angola, from which institution he graduated in the classical course in July, 1895. In 1896 he entered the law department of the University of Michigan, and after completing a three-year course was admitted to the bar and has been engaged in the active practice of law ever since. In 1901 he was elected town clerk of the town of Angola for a two-year term, was re-elected in 1903, and at the expiration of this term of office he was appointed city attorney for the city of Angola. From March, 1909, until November, 1910, he held the position of secretary to Congressman Cyrus Cline, of the 12th district of Indiana. In February, 1911, he was appointed deputy oil inspector, which position he held until March, 1915.

He is an active party worker, holding the position of secretary of the county central committee from 1900 until 1908, at which time he was elected county chairman, which position he has since held.

His marriage to Miss Mayme Moffett occurred June 28, 1899. They have one son, Theodore Thomas Wood, born February 2, 1905.

DE VERE YEOMAN

The gentleman whose name appears at the head of this review is among the ablest of the younger workers in the ranks of the Democratic party in Jasper county. He is a native of this state, born on July 25, 1887.

After his graduation from the public schools of his home district Mr. Yeoman's studies were continued at Purdue University, and later a course was taken in civil engineering at Valparaiso College.

On July 1, 1911, Mr. Yeoman was united in marriage to Miss Blanche McCarthy of Rensselaer, and in that city their home was established. In the beginning of the year 1913 he assumed the duties of county surveyor, and in that position he brought to his work that abounding energy and conscientious zeal which make for assured success. He is an active worker for the success of Democracy and is well known among the members of the county organization.

CHARLES A. YOTTER

The gentleman whose name heads this review has long been known in Steuben county as an active worker in the ranks of the party and a staunch adherent to Democratic principles.

Charles A. Yotter is a native of the state of Iowa, born on the 16th day of January, 1864. In the year 1887 he came to Indiana for the purpose of continuing his schooling at the Tri-State College at Angola, having previously attended Denmark Academy and Iowa Wesleyan University, both in Iowa. In the year 1892 he was admitted to the bar of Steuben county and in that county has since been actively engaged in the practice of the law, having his home and office at Angola.

Mr. Yotter has been a consistent party worker, making political speeches since 1888, but has not been an aspirant for public office.

Mr. Yotter has been twice married. On October 19, 1897, he was united in marriage to Miss Gussie B. Best, who died in 1900. On January 1, 1902, he married Miss Rena S. Sears.

PHILIP ZOERCHER

Since the year 1889, when Philip Zoercher was little more than a boy, he has held various positions in the service of the commonwealth, and in all of these has demonstrated unusual ability and loyalty to the interests of the community at large.

He is a native of this locality, born in Tell City on the first day of October, 1866. Here his boyhood and youth were spent, attending the public schools of his district; following the completion of the high school course, his studies were continued at the Central Normal College of Danville, Indiana.

In the fall of 1888, when he was but twenty-two years of age, he was elected representative from Perry county to the legislature of the state, and so well did he serve and such ability did he display in the assembly of 1889 that he was returned for the session of 1891. In this same year, also, he founded the Tell City News, and this thriving paper was continued under his control until the year 1900, when he disposed of it to his youngest brother.

From boyhood he was an enthusiastic worker for the cause of Democracy, and in the year 1892, at the state convention, he was appointed a delegate to the national convention from the first Indiana district. The following year he was appointed postmaster of Tell City and in this capacity he served for four years, throughout the second administration of President Cleveland. During these years, however, he again found time to take up the study of the law, which he temporarily dropped when he took up newspaper work, as he had been a member of Judge Clark's law class at Danville, Indiana, in 1889-90; and was admitted to the bar of Perry county in November, 1890. In 1898 he was appointed deputy prosecuting attorney for Perry county and in the year 1900 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the second judicial circuit. At the expiration of his term of two years in this office, he again engaged in private practice, building for himself a lucrative and increasing clientele.

In November, 1912, he was elected court reporter for the supreme court, and his services in this work have been invaluable to the court. Judge Monks, formerly on the supreme bench, stated that the reports as now issued, with annotations, are the best ever produced in the history of the state, a rare tribute to the intelligence and conscientious zeal displayed by Mr. Zoercher.

Throughout his career he has been a consistent adherent to Democratic principles and has sought at all times to further the cause; and when making the race for representative in 1888 he was a most eloquent speaker during the campaign, meeting his opponent in joint debates and otherwise rendering valuable service to the local organization. His debate with E. T. Franks at Cannelton in 1892 is still remembered by many.

He is also vitally interested in fraternal affairs, and is affiliated with the Tell City Lodge No. 203 Knights of Pythias; Tell City Lodge No. 206 I. O. O. F.; Allemania Encampment No. 156; Tell

City Lodge No. 623 F. and A. M.; Indianapolis Consistory 32nd degree A. and A. Scottish Rite and Tell City Chapter No. 272 O. E. S.

Mrs. Zoercher, to whom he was married on the 26th day of June, 1892, was formerly Miss Martha J. McAdams, and their home life has demonstrated her true worth as a helpmate.

LOUIS ZOERCHER

The present postmaster of Tell City has for many years been a prominent citizen in that locality and an important factor in shaping the thought of the community, having been a leader in the field of journalism in that locality.

Louis Zoercher was born near the site of his present home on the 16th day of May, 1880. He received his education in the schools of Tell City, and when he attained to manhood's estate engaged in business. He entered the service of Congressman W. E. Cox in the capacity of private secretary, and in this work demonstrated unusual skill and tact.

Later he assumed control of the Tell City News, a paper founded by his elder brother and published by him until the transfer was effected. He is also proprietor of the Jasper Herald, and through these organs has been a dominant factor in political affairs in the community. In this work he has pursued progressive policies, standing firmly for all movements which make for the betterment of the community, physically and morally.

On the 7th day of June, 1905, Mr. Zoercher was united in marriage to Miss Alice Patrick, and their home, then established, has extended hospitality to a host of friends.

On the 4th day of April, 1914, he received from President Wilson his appointment to the postmastership of Tell City, and in this capacity his aggressive methods are evident.

He is affiliated with the fraternal orders of Free and Accepted Masons, Order of Eastern Star, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Allemania Encampment, and the Modern Woodmen of America.

FRED E. ZOLLARS

Fred E. Zollars is known not only in Fort Wayne, but throughout the county as an able lawyer and a staunch Democrat who is always ready to do all he can for the success of his party, but never looks for any personal preferment. He was born in Fort Wayne, received his literary and preliminary legal training at Miami University, completed his legal studies with Zollars, Worden & Zollars, and was admitted to practice in 1897. Mr. Worden dropped out in 1902 and the firm became Zollars & Zollars. In December, 1909, Judge Zollars died, and in April, 1910, the present firm of Leonard, Rose & Zollars was formed. It is one of the strong legal firms of the state. F. E. Zollars gives to the cause of Democracy what time he can spare from a very active legal career. He has been affiliated with Democratic committees for years and has been a delegate to several state and congressional conventions. His advice on political matters is highly respected by his fellow Democrats, and he is held in constant touch with the party in Allen county. He is a 32nd degree Mason and a member of the Shrine; also of the Elks and order of Moose.
